One or two little assumptions appear in these particular letters that are worth examining. In both there is the suggestion that something very material is lost when a legal obligation is substituted for private charity. If, indeed, charity were charity, if St. Paul could recognise in its modern dress the virtue that he named, if the voluntary distribution of aid to sufferers were conducted in the spirit of that famous address to the Corinthians, if the virtue vaunted in these letters were indeed that which suffereth long and is kind, which is not puffed up, doth not behave herself unseemly, seeketh not her own—then, indeed, there would be immeasurable loss in its disappearance. But if the choice is between the arbitrary dispensation of gifts to those who not merely reckon the pence, but through the pence largely control the lives that they patronise, we may be excused if we think that the substitution of the official is net gain. The charity in question here is twice cursed. It demoralises those who give and those who receive.

There is a further point. "Coram Latrone" is frank enough to recognise in his "benevolence" a definitely political weapon. He would "teach the poorest class of voters that there are other considerations to be taken into account beyond the weekly dole that will find its way into some of their pockets." There are the coals and blankets, the presents, the Christmas box, the casual employment on "agricultural improvements" in slack times. The present dependence of so many on semi-benevolent aid of this description is to be made the means of frightening them away from a policy tending to raise them as a class to real independence. In this sign will the wealthy win. In the sign of charity they will stop the poor from efforts tending to make them independent of charity. No better illustration could be given of the function of what is styled philanthropy in our social system. It is the anodyne which keeps suffering from breaking out into unrest, and the control of which makes the favor of the rich a necessity and secures them in political power. It is a thousand pities that words of glorious coinage should be so debased in the usage of day to day. There are among us, in the etymological sense of the term, wealthy philanthropists beyond all praise, men whose time and brains are given freely, along with their worldly goods, for the mitigation of suffering and the advancement of good causes. These men are not vocal, nor do they figure so largely in those popular subscription lists which give the passport to favor and to titles. Among the wealthy they form a comparatively small proportion. Whoever is long engaged in public movements in any centre will soon find that, whatever pressing human need arises, it is the same set of men and women who come forward time after time, do the work, and bear the burden of the expense. Like a stage army they pass over the scene of action again and again, and give rise to the illusion that they are a large class. They make it possible to think that the wealth of the country as a whole is brimming over with readiness to give of its abundance. The "Times" correspondence shows another side of the shield. We trust the letters we have quoted do not represent the whole truth. But they do indicate a temper which has to be reckoned with, and which should only strengthen our determination to further those tendencies that make for economic independence, as against those which encourage the poor to look to their "betters" for patronage.

A RUSSIAN DREYFUS CASE.

It is not often for their worst sins that Governments are condemned by public opinion. The injustice which has become normal and habitual is almost overlooked because it is expected. For years past the Tsar's Ministers have been making systematic war upon all their opponents, from Terrorists to Liberals. To the condemnation of deputies by fifty and a hundred at a time, to the exile of thousands of lesser adversaries untried, and even to the abominations of torture and flogging in the gaols, Russians have long since grown accustomed. A certain fatalism is the armor of every oppressed race, as the wounds of an over-driven horse become "calloused" under the harness that galls it. But even to Russian public opinion the trial and punishment of M. Lopukhin has administered a certain shock. He is evidently a man of rather exceptional moral courage, and the circumstances of his offence were startling and dramatic. But the fact which has arrested public attention is that the man who has just been condemned like any young student or Socialist deputy to five years' hard labor and to lifelong exile thereafter in Siberia, is himself a conspicuous member of the inner bureaucracy. He had been the school-mate of the Prime Minister; his wife belongs to a noble family which claims to be older than the Romanoffs; above all, he had actually been the head of the political police, and was, under Count Witte and General Trepoff, the most highly placed, if not the most influential, official in the Ministry of the Interior. He was always known, it is true, for his Liberal opinions, but his loyalty was so far beyond question that he had been allowed to direct the service on which in Russia the whole safety of the State ultimately depends. His case has already recalled the Dreyfus affair, and it is interesting to note that his first breach with the bureaucracy had its origin in his efforts to protect the Jews from massacre. He it was who supplied his kinsman, Prince Urussoff, himself an ex-Assistant Minister, with the startling revelations divulged in the first Duma regarding the official organisation of pogroms. He discovered the printing press in the Ministry of the Interior, by which police agents multiplied their incitements to massacre. He traced the share of the police and the troops in several of the massacres which occurred after the nominal grant of constitutional liberties. But his unpardonable offence was that he denounced the police official Ratchkowsky, a protégé of the late General Trepoff, and the confidential guardian of the Tsar's person, as the real organiser of the Jewish massacres. For that first display of independence he lost his position as an official. His second offence also involved a challenge of the same group of "political vivisectors" (to use Prince Urussoff's phrase), and in particular of the arch-plotter Ratchkowsky. For the spy-terrorist, Azeff, whom he unmasked was more especially the agent of that almost Hamidian personage.

If there is an analogy between this Russian scandal and the Dreyfus affair, it is to General Picquart that we must compare M. Lopukhin. Official though he was, he set his citizen's conscience about the etiquette of bureaux, and dared an incorrectitude to check a peculiarly murderous villainy. There are still some obscure corners in the Azeff affair, and we do not feel certain that any of the theories that profess to explain the double rôle of this inconceivable rascal are as yet entirely complete and convincing. But, however we explain it, it is now beyond a doubt that Azeff was at once a valuable spy in the pay and under the control of the Russian police, and a daring terrorist who won the confidence of the men whom he duped, by plotting some of the most daring and successful of their political assassinations. M. Lopukhin knew that Azeff was no mere spy; he knew that he was an agent provocateur who inveigled young men and women imbued with the Russian passion for self-immolation, into crimes which must involve their death, and might incidentally include the slaughter of some high official whom the secret police was prepared to sacrifice. He knew, in short, that Azeff, who was by now the actual head of the militant terrorist organisation, was the man of all others most responsible for the demoralisation of Russian youth, and for the perpetuation of the guerilla war which doomed all Russia to a bloody struggle between sporadic terrorism and organised coercion. M. Lopukhin saw the destinies of his country in the hands of an unconscionable organisation, which, under cover of the legal immunity it enjoyed, organised the wholesale massacre of Jews, and, again, the detailed slaughter of officials, driving into crime now the Anti-Semitic rabble (who were rarely punished) and, again, the Socialist extremists (who were always exterminated). The Socialists had meanwhile begun to suspect Azeff, and when M. Bourtseff, a studious historian associated with them, appealed to M. Lopukhin to confirm or deny these suspicions, he felt it his duty to denounce the agent provocateur. No honest man could have done less. Unluckily for M. Lopukhin, the world was presently informed of the part he had played. The Russian Government braved the scandal, rushed to the defence of Azeff as a valuable agent, and put M. Lopukhin on his trial for treason. The trial, though public, was the usual perversion of justice. The defence was hardly heard, the essential documents were suppressed, and the necessary witnesses were allowed to absent themselves. The verdict is one proof the more that the "political vivisectors," secure in the protection of the Tsar, are still supreme in Russia.

Scandal follows scandal in Russia, and it is difficult to see how its present state, despite the fact that a sort of Duma exists, and that M. Stolypin does not belong to the extremer party of reaction, is in any real sense an improvement on the old conditions. The worst is known more fully than before, but the result is only to accentuate the cynicism of the ruling class. The dualism between the Palace and the Ministry is still the fundamental fact of the political situation, though M. Stolypin's defeat by the Court in the recent constitutional crisis, over the Navy Staff Bill, has lessened still further the few prerogatives of the Duma and the Cabinet. Debate after debate brings to light the ghastly horrors of the prison system, the crowding of gaols built to hold scores of criminals with hundreds of "politicals," the ravages of typhoid among them, and, worst of all, the recurring instances of torture and flogging. A few months ago some railway men, who for three years had worked quietly at their posts since the great strike, were sentenced to death by court-martial for their share in it. These are the more striking cases. The obscurer victims are legion. Under Stolypin's heavy hand Russia abandons herself to a passionate surrender of hope. The newspapers now contain a daily paragraph which enumerates the number of "politicals" who have taken their own lives in prison. Suicide out of prison has grown so common that the Holy Synod has organised a campaign of sermons against the sin of despair. "Who can be happy in Russia?" is the title of that poem of Nekrasoff's, which has attained, under the reign of three Tsars, such a popularity as hardly fell in England to the "May Queen" and the "Charge of the Light Brigade." It still sells in farthing copies at village fairs. It will continue to sell while Nicholas II. enjoys the favor of the Bourse and the City, and counts on a welcome at Brest and Cowes.

---

THE QUESTION OF CRETE.

We hope that the reformed Turkish Government, which has no sincerer friends than the British Liberal Party, will not be misled by a suggestion in the "Times" of Tuesday which seems to us to be equally unwise and malevolent. The Young Turks may not understand that the "Times" no longer maintains the influence over British opinion which it once possessed, but they need be under no misapprehension as to the character of its friendship for their movement. At the time of the Turkish reaction the "Times" was one of the first of European journals to desert the reformers. In our view, it does them an equally bad service when it misrepresents to them the attitude of this country towards the Cretan question. The "Times" suggests that if the annexation of Crete is finally brought about by Greek action, Greece can no longer count even on the very limited European intervention which restricted Turkish success in the late war. "Regenerated Turkey," it says, "would be entitled to make the same use of the successes of her arms, should she be constrained to use them, as would any other civilised State." We do not believe that such language represents the view of the Foreign Office. We imagine that the leaders of the Reform movement in Turkey would be the last to say that she had been completely regenerated by a few months of revolution, and, even if she were, no European statesman would encourage her in a fresh career of conquest at the expense of a Christian Power, least of all of a nation to which this country is bound by many ties of feeling and tradition. There is no reason to suppose that either Germany or Russia desires to keep the Cretan question indefinitely open, and it is certain that Italy desires to close it. Why should England, if she cannot assist a solution, block the way to it?

It is, indeed, full time to consider the Cretan question with fairness both to Turkey and to Greece. On July 27th the last detachment of international troops will have been withdrawn. The island is now under Greek government, which will soon be supported by Greek soldiery, and it is practically ruled as if it were a province of the Greek kingdom. Beyond the fact that the Turkish flag flies, with the flags of other Powers, over a rocky island in Suda Bay, every symbol of the old association with Turkey has disappeared. There is no administrative machinery to be got rid of. There is no tribute to pay. The island has been governed well. The lives and properties of the Mohammedan minority, Greek as it is in race, have been generally respected. The Powers, which are now withdrawing their forces, have encouraged the island to hope for union, and, since October last, the Cretans themselves have proclaimed it. The Greek flag now flies over the island, and the Governmental notepaper bears the inscription, "Kingdom of Greece." The severance from the Turkish Empire was, indeed, practically accomplished long before the Young Turks came into power, and the fact that it is nominally incomplete is merely due to the moderation of the Greek Government last October. We certainly do not suggest that they should depart from that attitude, or that any precipitate action should be taken. The new régime in Turkey is not yet firmly on its feet, and both its sentimental and its material position should be considered. But it is well to remember that the Turks have always to set in the balance against the shadow of sovereignty that remains to them in Crete, the very substantial prize of the gratitude of five or six millions of Greeks in the Empire. If Young Turkey requires further guarantees, we might, for example, make her nominal withdrawal from Crete the price of our help in modifying the Capitulations. But to egg her on to the invasion of Greece should the all-but accomplished union with Crete come about, as it may well do without friction and without undue haste, is as unwise as it is disgraceful.

Life and Letters.

MEREDITH AND ADVENTURE.

It is impossible to imagine Meredith's spirit in any sphere but this present world, in which his interest was so alert and wide, but it was characteristic of his powerful vitality to make light of death. In his later years he often spoke of death to the present writer, and it was always with a certain indifference, almost a kind of gaiety. "I am awaiting the grand event," he used to say, and on one occasion he repeated several times, "No one should consider death or think of it as worse than going from one room into another." Perhaps his courage or indifference was partly deliberate—a conscious resolve after manliness, for when dwelling on the importance of conquering the fear of death, he continued:—

> "I was a very timid and sensitive boy. I was frightened of everything; I could not endure to be left alone. But when I came to be eighteen, I looked round the world and determined not to be afraid again. Since then I have had no fear of death. Every night when I go to bed I know I may not rise from it. That is nothing to me. I hope I shall die with a good laugh, like the old French woman; the curé came wailing to her about her salvation, and she told him her best story, and died. The God of Nature and human nature does not dislike humor, you may be sure, and would rather hear it in extremity than the formless official drone."

In war, the unconscious, unreflecting courage—"brute courage," as it is called by people whose courage has never been tested—has hitherto been the most valuable, because imaginative men have never been common, and seldom trustworthy. But when the kind of courage that Meredith was thinking of is reached, it may be the finest of all; for it is an inspired vitality. Respect for this kind of courage attracted Meredith to the Japanese, with their principle of "Bushido," or conscious dedication of life to their country's preservation, and in the same way he advocated a national service in this country, for fear our growing sanitation, comfort, and culture should increase the human terror of death. Both in his own nature and in his works he insisted on the necessity of conquering fear as the first essential for the possession of life. It cost him an effort, as it costs most imaginative people, but that made the conquest the more valuable.

This insistence on courage gave a certain proud and romantic tone to his conversation, and to his finest characters. For a man who saw life with such breadth of vision, and so keenly appreciated all its phases, his own existence was singularly empty of outward experience or adventure. Nor did he dwell much on such things in his books. Except, perhaps, in "Vittoria," there is hardly a scene that could be called "adventurous" in the ordinary sense, and there are few where the courage which he so much admired is outwardly displayed. But by his sense for the rather old-fashioned qualities which used to be thought specially aristocratic, he contrived to throw upon the ordinary life of his day a glamor as of ancient chivalry, and in his own personality a certain splendor of speech and bearing was at once visible, as of one accustomed to armor and knightly ways.

English life in the classes which Meredith took as his natural theme is so secure and stolidly settled that to invest it with the flash of steel and the mysterious charm of romance required the highest imaginative power. Yet even in this Meredith succeeded. In the greatest of his books the adventures of the soul beside the fat reaches of the Thames or in the desirable residences of southern counties are seen to be as perilous and heroic as quests in haunted forests or the clash of hosts beneath the moon. Indeed, one sometimes thinks that he even accomplished the highest miracle of creation and brought into actual life the very men and women—especially the women—who were born as shadows of the brain. When Meredith's great predecessors filled the English world, could such men as Beauchamp and Richard Feverel have existed, or such women as Diana, Clara Middleton, and Emilia? At all events they have existed since, and (Meredith be praised!) they are growing more frequent.

Only to "you who dare" is the invitation to enter the enchanted woods of Westermain addressed. Only to those who dare will the earth reveal the secrets and variety of her enchantments. Courage is the one basis of experience, whether in chivalrous combat on the field or in a peaceful life where peril lurks round every thought. Throughout all Meredith's work courage is the first necessity for completeness of life, whether it takes the form of facing ordinary death or the prolonged and malignant assaults of gossip, the social code, and accepted snobbery; or, again, whether it takes the form of confronting the more terrible forces of hesitation, self-distrust, and self-reproaches in a man's own spirit. Completeness of life—a life without reservation or apology—is the thing on earth most to be desired, and, next to want of courage, Meredith would probably have put sentimentalism and egoism as the chief hindrances to this aim.

It is difficult to define what he meant by sentimentalism, frequently as he used the word. In our ordinary language the meaning is still uncertain, and, in politics at all events, most people call every emotion that does not pay a sentimental motive, while many still confuse sentimentalism with passion. In Meredith the two things are not only distinct, but opposite. The essence of passion is that it burns the soul and purifies like flame; but sentimentalism is always half-hearted, playing with the fires of emotion for their own pretty radiance, and containing, like all half-hearted things, an element of falsity that may at any moment betray the man himself or those who have mistaken half his heart for the whole. Perhaps Wilfrid Pole in "Sandra Belloni" is as fine an example of sentimentalism as can be found—finer than his sisters, because the nature that is ruined has better stuff; but there is a good type in "Rhoda Fleming" as well, and up and down the whole series of the works that evil thing from time to time thrusts out its flickering tongue. For the other cardinal sin of egoism we go to that great "Book of Egoism," where, as is well known, every living man may perceive a glimpse of his own portrait. But there is perhaps a still subtler picture of our common crime in that scene of climax between Percy Dacier and Diana, and in the overwhelming collapse of his soul when he turns from her to Constance Asper on the very same morning. As a revelation of the impenetrable ice which egoism packs round the heart in the Inferno of self there is no such passage in literature as that.

Completeness of life!—there have been few, indeed, of our writers to whom that phrase could be applied as to Meredith. His mind lived from hour to hour with extraordinary opulence. He seemed alive to every vestige of human fortune or natural beauty, and he beheld the world with a reduplicated power, able to detect strange influences unseen. Like all the finest creative minds, he was master of tragedy and the comic spirit alike, finding room in his affections for almost every mood, except, perhaps, melancholy, to which a savor of unmanliness or humbug usually attaches. But having in himself this sense for completeness—for inspired vitality, as we called it in the case of courage—he perceived how that high reward of existence is continually marred and thwarted, not merely by hunger and monotonous toil (for he did not occupy himself with that immense side of human failure), but by those deadly sins of cowardice, half-heartedness, and egoism, which couch side by side with the comic spirit in our classes untouched by the dirt and sweat of labor. If we must look for any single thought or purpose pervading works that extended over forty years, and were marked by something of life's own variety, we should perhaps trace it in the emancipation of men and women from those three paralysing influences. In one work after another he shows the ruin of the human soul by their subtleties, and it is often what outwardly appear to be the finer kinds of soul that are thus overwhelmed. Only by the countervailing powers of courage, passion, and devotion are these sinister forms of corruption to be averted.

It is significant that the men whom Meredith intends to be most lovable—the men, at all events, to whom the most worshipful of his women, such as Diana or Clara Middleton, ultimately give themselves—are not particularly clever people, nor indeed conspicuous for any special grace. But they possess, almost unseen, those qualities of courage, whole-hearted passion, and a devotion to something that absorbs the thought of self, and those qualities suffice to keep their natures sweet. When, as perhaps in Richard Feverel and Nevil Beauchamp among the men, and in a few other women besides those two mentioned, these salutary powers are united to a magic charm of body and soul, life seems justified of her long travail, and even the most disastrous errors never soil the beauty of life's flower as it is revealed in them. It is for having thus purified and emancipated and raised our common conception of life's possibilities and glory, even in the ordinary times of a rather tame and conventional country, that Meredith won his highest reward of honor, though his other rewards are many.

---

ON THE DECAY OF ENGLAND.

"I BELIEVE that we stand at the parting of the ways, and that the student of England and the English is looking on to-day at the first indications of the decay of, in many respects, the greatest Empire the world has ever seen. The sun that never sets is setting." Such is the mournful verdict of no prejudiced or hostile observer. Mr. Price Collier, in his "England and the English" (Duckworth & Co.), deals many shrewd blows at certain elements in the English character. He sees, as so many foreigners see, our imperturbable complacency, our conviction of our own unchallengeable excellence, our ingrained contempt for the negligible regions outside; and he is filled, at the spectacle, with a little resentment, and some amusement. He notes our devotion to sport, our luxurious living, our capacity for slurring over, or turning a blind eye to, unpleasant things, our habit of compromising concerning fundamental problems. But his tone, on the whole, is one of admiration. He pays full tribute to the qualities which have established at home a secure civilisation, which abroad have "shackled the careering centuries to one small island's fame." He loves and praises the English landscape, little towns and villages set in one large garden, the hospitality of the "Conquerors" in English society, their standard of manners, their reticence, their self-restraint, their ready acceptance of voluntary public service. Only at the end of his review he is driven to the reluctant conclusion that it is all passing, proving inadequate to the demands of the newer time, perishing, not knowing of its departure, thinking that it will endure for ever. The thought is entertained with reluctance. "We all know that America does not like England," he confesses, "and that Americans do not like the English." But "no intelligent American," he asserts, "no American, indeed, whose opinion is worth a fig, would rejoice to see this nation, which has taught the nations of the world the greatest lessons since Christianity—and that is the lesson of law, and order, and liberty—lose her grip." "At bottom, I, and most of my countrymen, would not like to see the old man downed."

This decline he attributes partly to certain changes in the national character, bred of great prosperity, security too readily assumed, and the indolence which is the result of wealth easily won. But partly he is criticising from outside certain political changes and social transformations which are the children of political change. And here his remarks are extraordinarily interesting, as offering a comment upon English party programmes from the entirely detached outside observer. In England the great political parties have retained their names and their coherent organisations, while cutting themselves completely loose from the political philosophies which they once accepted. So that (for example) the Liberal and the Unionist Party each represent an illogical fusion of progressive and reactionary opinions, individualism and Socialism, cosmopolitanism and nationalism, democratic and bureacratic ideals. The Irish people, for example, are the most conservative nation in the world, and upon all reasonable classifications should be found, as Agrarians and Clericals, allied with an Agrarian and Clerical Conservative Party. But the social and racial fissure between landlord and tenant, with all the consequent ferocity of an agrarian revolution, has thrown these two parties into fierce hostility for the greater part of a century. Mr. Price Collier makes of Ireland that which every observing foreigner makes of Ireland—a deplorable and most glaring example of the failure of England and the Imperial rule ever to exercise overlordship over a race which does not fear them. The English husband, he declares, used, until quite recent times, to be allowed to beat his wife. That was his way of demonstrating what a good fellow he was. If she failed to see it before the beating, he was pathetically convinced that the beating would open her eyes. It is the Milner policy in South Africa. If the Dutch don't love you, beat them until they do; if you only beat them long enough, and continuously enough, they are certain to love you at the end. It has been the British policy in Ireland. "He has robbed, starved, slaughtered, bribed, used his whole artillery of colonising charms, and he is just where he was when he started seven hundred and fifty years ago." The secret of the possibility of its continuance is that he is unable to believe that it exists. Ireland, thinks this writer, would "get on the nerves" of most other nations, as the Philippines got on the nerves of America, or Macedonia of Turkey. But the Englishman is imperturbable. He possesses no nerves. He looks upon the noise and clamor from beyond the Channel as a matter of course, he lets it continue, and goes about his business, like a nursemaid who ties the screaming child in the perambulator while she talks with the policeman. If he is occasionally distracted by any undue violence of vocal protest, he turns upon Ireland a heavy, reproachful eye: "Is this your gratitude"—you can see it in his glance—"for the blessings of British rule?" "The most amazing thing about the English and Irish embroglio," says Mr. Price Collier, "is that the Englishmen look upon it as a matter of course. They are constitutionally sure that they are right!" Compel him—and it requires compulsion—to study the long tragedy of Irish history, Lecky's "tissue of brutality and hypocrisy scarcely surpassed in history," and he will inform you at the end, with an air of owlish wisdom, that these things are regrettable, but of the past; that it is never healthy to brood over the past; that he himself never broods over the past; that the miseries of the past had better be forgotten in the benefits of the present. Above all—and this, perhaps, is the real centre of exasperation—he is utterly and unshakably convinced that he is really in Ireland, less for the good of the British than for the good of the Irish people—that the Almighty has laid this heavy task upon him, and, however distasteful, he must continue it to the end. So that it is with an aspect of tired resignation, rather than any air of anger, that he suddenly and impassionately silences—with heavy hand—those who are squealing, and pursues the onerous duty laid upon him, to elevate Ireland up to the civilisation of England.

But in his attitude towards Ireland Mr. Price Collier is at one with an international verdict, that "foreign opinion" which Mr. Chamberlain—speaking the mind of the people—once so contemptuously condemned. In his study of English internal politics he is curiously balanced between the programmes of the various parties. He is entirely in favor of the House of Lords, which, he thinks, more frequently represents the mind of the people than the House of Commons. Far from being an exclusive and hereditary aristocracy, he sees it as representing merchant princes, pro-consuls, successful men of all classes who have fought their way to the top. He is, of course, a convinced Tariff Reformer, thinking our Free Trade system short-sighted imbecility. And he deplores the "Socialistic" tendency of recent legislation, especially the free feeding of children and the granting of Old Age Pensions. On the other hand, he is whole-heartedly on the side of the Licensing Bill, opposition to which—from the detached view of the impartial observer—appears merely as the desperate fight of a powerful vested interest to maintain the right of corrupting and injuring the public welfare. He utterly condemns the English land system, which has concentrated possession of the land into the hands of a few big landlords. The enjoyment of the wonderful beauty of the English springtime, that countryside of England "that makes one feel his duty to be his religion, the England that every American comes to as to a shrine," is partially ruined by the absence of inhabitants. The Midlands of England he declares to be "as fertile and easily cultivated as any similar number of acres in the world, and to the eye of the traveller they seem so." Yet the traveller, journeying through this pleasant garden, finds everywhere the challenge of one question, "Where are all the people? Did we leave them all in London and Oxford and Worcester and Birmingham? All through the afternoon and into the early evening we travel, and I could have counted more houses, certainly more sheep, than men and women from the carriage window." It is evident, therefore, that Mr. Price Collier, in the British House of Commons would stand alone. Upon a policy of Home Rule for Ireland, active campaign against the Land and Drink monopolies, Tariff Reform, and anti-Socialism, he probably could not secure a single elected adherent; though probably in an Imperial legislature this would be a policy approved by a conspicuous majority of the delegates.

Mr. Price Collier, however—like so many of the visitors who come and go and then estimate what they have seen—only discusses the quality of a tiny percentage of Englishmen. To him England represents about one million male adult persons of the forty-three million inhabitants of the island, that selected and triumphant Governing Class which has attained the overlordship of one-fifth of the world. Below, he but gives indication—partly from statistics of poverty, partly from the occasional vision of shabby, ineffective, broken crowds appearing as from nowhere in the civilised regions—that a slave population labors and endures in order that these may have leisure to conquer and to enjoy. The wind blowing from the East in London bears the smoky scents of a remote industrial hive; or a glance from some high roof reveals the labyrinthine ways of a negligible proletariat; or experience in the little country town at Northbridge discovers a rural sediment "without ambition," "of extraordinary mental lethargy," with a speech of "the guttural, indistinct kind, that one usually associates with people partially dumb." "There is absolutely nothing like him in America, and he must be seen, and heard, and watched in his native lair to be understood and appreciated." This is the "Sovereign people," the "other nation" of Disraeli's picture, to be flattered, cajoled, persuaded that he is a proud Imperial citizen when one section of the Conquerors contests with another set of the Conquerors for the right of temporary rule; otherwise to be left alone, toiling patiently and with occasional mitigations of his lot to support the race that stands for England in its enormous cosmic enterprise. "The English rustic," says Mr. Price Collier—he has not made himself familiar with his brother of the town—"is uneducated, inarticulate, inaudible, and grotesquely awkward, both mentally and physically. But he has his small political value, for he is always and unalterably for no change. He grumbles, but his grumbling means little and effects nothing, and plays no more part in the affairs of the world than does an accidental tap on the big drum in the music of an orchestra."

And of those who have attained, who live in the sunlight, he has few words but those of praise. He approves of their sport, their kindlinesses, their frequent activities. If energy without intelligence could dominate the world in the future, as it has dominated it in the past, he thinks their Empire might endure for ever. He finds a perhaps too determined pursuit of pleasure; forty-five millions—he estimates—permanently invested in the apparatus of sport, and an income of over forty millions spent annually upon it. He approves rather than condemns a man's, rather than a woman's standard of manners and morals. He is quite content that neither clergyman nor critic should make it his business to reveal private breaches of the Ten Commandments. The great Churchmen, he somewhat caustically affirms, "are apparently believers in the doctrine of compromise. They preach that cautious Christianity which holds up an ideal for all, but applies it, as a rule, only for some, and these the least conspicuous and the most amenable." "The most hopeful of all the nations" is one definition of this astonishing social and political tangle—full of compromise, full of confusion. Filled with a "ponderous sense that the Englishman is responsible for the contemporary auditing of the Day of Judgment," these people see all the evil that is done under the sun, except that in their own backyard. "A profound instinct arms them against intelligence, which they recognise as the greatest foe to action." Because money gives here so much of comfort and standing, "the struggle to get it is unparalleled anywhere else in the world." Only the rich can own land, and "when one hears, and one does hear it on every hand, how poor are Englishmen, one has in this land question some explanation of the secret." Everywhere, from highest to lowest, is wastefulness, bad cooking, and the spoiling of good material. Above, "those who are in the saddle in England ride a very fine horse, there is no doubt of that." Below, "in this damp, chill climate" is the testimony, "in these gloomy streets, the poor and the vicious seem more sodden and brutal, and vice more unappetising than elsewhere." "One gets here, more than elsewhere, an early and indelible impression of the fearful struggle to survive." Yet the final result—when all imperfections and complacencies are discounted—is one of praise. Here is the Government of the strong—governing slowly, methodically, with even temper, even justice; relentlessly, but confidently and fairly; always "with the aim of increasing, not decreasing, the personal freedom of the Governed." It is no ignoble verdict in the judgment of the centuries.

---

THE SOUL OF BRITTANY.

The next best thing to going on a careless holiday oneself is, perhaps, to read a sympathetically written account of the holiday journeys of others. As one reads, past holidays are revived and lighted up, and one exclaims, "Et ego in Arcadia." Or one resolves to make the experience one reads of one's own at the earliest possible opportunity. One has often read such books, and forgotten the dull surroundings, the dreary lodgings, the inky weather, the Arctic darkness with regard to food in which provincial England is enwrapped, and for the moment has been, say, walking about France far down in the South in early spring, and arguing with atheists by the roadside, and living on baby lambs, and trout caught from the brook while you wait, and "petits fraises des bois," and green peas from Algiers, at two francs fifty a day.

The reader is taken however, not to the Midi, but to Brittany, the true "Bretagne brettonante," by Mrs. Gostling, in her charmingly illustrated book, "The Bretons at Home" (Methuen). M. Anatole le Braz, the student of Breton folk-lore, whose name is a household word in Brittany, the author of "Au Pays des Pardons," writes an introduction, in which he says that in these pages the very soul of Brittany is to be found. He speaks of the author's knowledge of the most intimate secret of the Breton soul, "à savoir, l'instinct religieux, la hantise de l'au delà, la passion et presque la folie du divin." The Bretons are, no doubt, the most Christian people in the world. "They glory in the name," says Dean Church; "they never weary of it; they delight to call themselves Christians." But it is certainly a Christianity into which the older religions have been absorbed—a "baptised Paganism," if you will, but a Paganism which has been really baptised. They have all the feelings of awe and wonder with which primitive man beheld the spectacle of the world, while they have drunk deep of the secrets of Christian faith. They sum up and exhibit in themselves the continuous religious experience of the race. This, no doubt, is what makes their delightful country so habitable, so hospitable, so homelike—such a roomy, furnished, human dwelling-place, a house that has been lived in for uncounted generations, full of pictures, full of stories, where the ghosts have not been too sternly exorcised, but have become intimate and friendly by long familiar intercourse with living men. In this happy country there has been no bleakness of reformation, no frenzied whitewashing, sweeping, and garnishing, neither at the present day is there any fury of progress, any haste to be rich.

Mrs. Gostling dwells much on this "paganism," though always sympathetically. She is at great pains to prove that the Saints are the old Gods, and to show the pagan origin of Christian rites. The interpenetration of Christianity and Paganism was, of course, mutual. Was not this the best possible thing for mankind that could have happened? The Church, for instance, which began with slaves in the Catacombs became aristocratic, but aristocracy was thereby Christianised. No doubt there have been often found Arrabiati more essentially Christian than many of the Piagnoni, Malignants more humble-minded than many Puritans, licensed victuallers more tender-hearted than many teetotalers. Who would have either side untouched and unalloyed by the virtues of the other, or care to live in a world dominated by either side alone? The writer would recommend anyone planning a work "In Defence of Superstition" to go and live for a time in Breton-speaking Brittany. One of the first pictures in Mrs. Gostling's book is called "A Painter of Saints." This is a great industry in Brittany, as it is in Russia. A bearded peasant in blouse and sabots, watched by two wondering little girls, is touching up the stole of a solemn mitred figure standing on a bracket fixed to the college wall. These images are everywhere—the churches are full of them. Nowhere in the world is the cultus of the Saints carried to such lengths as in Brittany. The unseen world becomes a home-like place to the Breton peasant, because it is peopled with all these familiar figures he knows so well on earth. They are as real as the next-door neighbors. There is St. Yves, the lawyer, who obtains justice for the poor and oppressed; St. Eloi, the blacksmith, patron of horses; St. Cornély, the Pope, protector of oxen; St. Fiacre, with his spade; St. Corentin with his fish, and how many more! St. John Baptist carrying the lamb is a great personage in Brittany. But the most loved of all is St. Anne, the mother of Mary,

"Par qui la Rose a fleuri où ne poussait que l'épine."

The legends make her a Breton lady, as in Andalusian ballads St. Catherine is a maiden of Cadiz. There are saints for a toothache or an earthquake. One may think what one will of this belief theologically, but surely there is nothing servile or degrading to the dignity of man in a doctrine, which, say, at Messina, attributes to pathetic human figures a power of intervention amid the play of immense and fatal forces—the oceanic and volcanic forces imaged in the Homeric mythology—and amid the whirlwind and the earthquake sets little girls, like Rose and Agatha, with supplicating childish voices and weak, uplifted hands.

The Breton soul may best be studied at Mass. It is impossible to look at the Mass-books which many of the white-capped women carry, some of them handed down as heirlooms, so used and worn, and yet preserved so carefully, without being touched. Of the Breton women it may be said that they present a singular combination of the virtues of Mary and Martha. Of the excellence and cheapness of the food in Brittany one is almost afraid to speak. In turning over this book, and noting the descriptions of meals and inns, and quiet little towns, the writer is constantly reminded of his own experiences. Mrs. Gostling, for instance, writes pleasantly of Le Faou, "How strange Le Faou seemed," she says; "how quiet, how deserted!" It is, indeed, as grass-grown as Stokesley, as deserted as Holbeach. But how different! There are parts of England where it is almost impossible to obtain food of any kind. The fact that people eat is carefully dissembled—it is a secret, an open secret, no doubt, but a secret still. This is not the case at Le Faóu. The writer remembers the eight-mile drive to get to it through the autumn twilight, the talk of the friendly driver, a girl running out of a lonely farmhouse on the way as we passed with a letter addressed, "A Monsieur Jean Blaise." "C'est pour Jean?" "Mais oui, c'est pour Jean." We arrived in the sad evening grey at what seemed a cut-throat little inn, with rough peasants drinking round the hearth.

In answer to a request for dinner Madame proposed a meal which she modestly called "souper"—a meal so excellent, so varied, so satisfying, with its perfect omelette, its mackerel fresh from the sea, its cutlets, its salad, its coffee and liqueur, that grey Le Faou was at once bathed in roseate light. The writer slept in a clean and decent room, had coffee in the morning, and, after a pilgrimage to Rumengol, the scene of one of the great Breton pardons, came back to another succulent meal, partaken of in lonely state. The charge for this whole entertainment, including the voiture, was smilingly announced as "sept francs, monsieur." One hastens to add that at Le Faou there are to be found neither golf links nor an English church. In the early morning at Le Faou, a ballad singer, singing Breton ballads, passed down the empty street, and the people came running out to buy her broad sheets. Another little thing that pleased the writer was the mimic music played by a merry group of children who had formed themselves into an imaginary orchestra around a great stack of faggots. One with two sticks was beating an imaginary drum, another drawing a stick as a bow across the strings of an imaginary fiddle, a third fingering on a stick as an imaginary flute—all with the greatest verve and gaiety, the most perfect mimicry and keenest enjoyment. Why do the children of the English poor never play like this? Here and there in the grey street was a mulberry, "wisest of trees," or a walnut tree with a rustic seat beneath it. One thought half enviously of the people who would still be there, so contentedly and cheerfully, when the walnuts were ripe, on All Souls' Day, at Christmas.

Everything in Brittany seems as old as the world. All is primitive, Virgilian, Biblical. For instance, Mrs. Gostling says: "A Breton wedding is like one of those great feasts of which we read in the Bible. All are welcome, and not least the halt, the maimed, and the blind. At news of the marriage they assemble from far and near, and the sight of all these destitute creatures taking part in the good cheer with the more wealthy guests is the crowning charm of the entertainment." Brittany is the last bit remaining in Western Europe of an older and simpler world, with its hospitality, its courtesy, its unwordliness, its leisure, its charm. It is probable that all these things are doomed. For instance, Mrs. Gostling failed to see the "Blessing of the Beasts" at Carnac. "For the first time for hundreds, nay, as I believe, for thousands of years the beasts went away unblessed by the priests. . . The Church has at length refused her sanction to the traditional cult of the district." We sincerely hope not. "Ça se perd," said a pessimistic priest to the writer, speaking of the Breton faith, "ça diminue." But all readers of Mrs. Gostling's book will hope the Bretons may yet long keep their happiness.

TO VINDICATE LEIGH HUNT.

It is nearly always best to leave the dead alone and to enact no "rehearsal of the Judgment Day" over their bones. We know how inadequate or perverse the opinions of our friends and contemporaries about our own actions and characters usually are. What, then, can we expect from a critic who sets himself to judge the complexities of a man's soul years after the man is dead, and nothing remains to judge him by except vague traditions, scraps of writing, and a few letters that only reveal the moods of passing hours? As to the external facts and relationships connected with a great name, and often sought after with so much diligence, they are, in most cases, quite unimportant, and have had little influence on the spirit for whose sake they are exhumed.

But I hope you will, none the less, allow me to carry out the wishes of my friend, the late Dr. George Bird, by publishing a statement of his in regard to Leigh Hunt's memory. Dr. Bird was himself a remarkable and singularly attractive man, intimate with nearly all the leading figures in art and literature throughout the middle of last century. Professionally, he counted among his patients Dickens, Swinburne, Richard Burton, Grant Allen, Richard Horne, and many more, including a few of those who survived from an earlier age of literary greatness, such as Claire Clairmont, a kind of half-sister to Mary Godwin, and the mother of Byron's Allegra, and Jane Hogg, widow of the Edward Williams who was drowned with Shelley.

But out of all his distinguished patients and friends, Dr. Bird seemed to regard Leigh Hunt with the greatest affection and respect. He spoke of him frequently to me, and always with peculiar enthusiasm. He knew him most intimately between 1850 and Leigh Hunt's death in 1859. Both his personal admiration and his anxiety to clear the memory of a friend are shown in the following letter, written in his eighty-second year, to Leigh Hunt's eldest grandson, and now entrusted to me, for publication, by him and Miss Alice Bird, the doctor's sister:—

June 27th, 1899.

To Mr. Walter Leigh Hunt.

My dear Walter,—

I sympathise with you, as you know, in your keen desire to remove the adverse impression created by the reiterated attacks on your grandfather. I sympathise because I have always felt the deepest respect and admiration for the man as well as the writer. I never think of him or hear his name without an emotion of, I may say, veneration for his nobility of character. I have often longed to put in print my own personal recollections touching the persistent calumnies and misconceptions that pursue his reputation. I have withheld any public expression because of giving pain to his descendants, but I have felt pain and grief whenever I have heard him calumniated. I have done my utmost by word of mouth, especially with literary men of the day, to put things in their proper light.

To speak plainly, the source of most of this misrepresentation was no other than his wife, Mrs. Leigh Hunt. In my opinion, she was mendacious, self-indulgent, and incapable of controlling her household. When I first knew her, about 1851, she was an intemperate woman and sodden from drink. How much Leigh Hunt knew of this infirmity I do not know. One day he said to me, "Isn't a bottle of brandy a day, which I hear you have ordered my wife, too much?" As her doctor I had ordered abstention from spirituous drinks. Going one day into her room, Leigh Hunt kicked over a bottle of foaming beer, partly hidden under the bed. "It's milk, my dear," said Mrs. Leigh Hunt, and he accepted the explanation, with what reservations of his own I cannot tell.

Naturally this state of things led to acute domestic disorganisation and embarrassment with tradesmen, and to giving ceaseless notes of hand. On one occasion I intervened to pacify a pressing tradesman. The embarrassments led to Mrs. Hunt's borrowing and begging from friends. There is a painful reference to the daily troubles in the "Correspondence," Vol. II., p. 164 ff. The veiled influence is there alluded to by the editor, his eldest son, Thornton. A letter is given (by Macaulay, I believe) remonstrating with Mrs. Leigh Hunt on her applications for money and for keeping her husband in the dark.

I believe I am the only contemporary of Leigh Hunt who could testify to these facts concerning his wife, and for the sake of Leigh Hunt I put them on record before I pass away. I attended professionally Leigh Hunt, Mrs. Leigh Hunt, his beloved son, Vincent, and others of the family. Vincent died in 1852.

As to the lamentable Dickens caricature which arose out of the borrowings, I don't see how that is to be remedied. No doubt Dickens did put Leigh Hunt in the pillory. He afterwards repented and made a sort of retractation, but the injury he inflicted remains, alas! to this date. I am glad to write these few words to you, Leigh Hunt's eldest grandson, as I know you take adverse criticism to heart.

I am, dear Walter Hunt, faithfully yours,
George Bird, M.D.,
(now in my 82nd year.)

There is still a danger that the man of whom Dr. Bird thus writes will be remembered chiefly just by that "lamentable caricature." A letter is extant showing that Dickens believed Harold Skimpole to be a wonderfully accurate representation of Leigh Hunt's character. "Bleak House" was published in 1852, and, writing from Boulogne, on September 25th of the following year, to Mrs. Richard Watson, of Rockingham Castle, Dickens said:—

"Skimpole—I must not forget Skimpole—of whom I will proceed to speak as if I had only read him and not written him. I suppose he is the most exact portrait that was ever painted in words! I have very seldom, if ever, done such a thing. But the likeness is astonishing. I don't think it could possibly be more like himself. It is so awfully true that I make a bargain with myself 'never to do so any more.' There is not an atom of exaggeration or suppression. It is an absolute reproduction of a real man. Of course, I have been careful to keep the outward figure away from the fact; but in all else it is the life itself."—(Published in "Harper's Magazine," April, 1906.)

Nearly two years later (June 28th, 1855), no doubt in answer to Leigh Hunt's protest against such an abuse of the decencies of acquaintanceship, Dickens wrote from Tavistock House:—

My dear Hunt,—

Do not, I beg you, suppose that I have been unmindful of your letter. I have been more busily engaged than I could easily tell you, and have not, until this day, seen my way to an evening when I can pass an hour at Hammersmith. Next Monday evening, please God, I will pause in my walk at 7, Cornwall Road.

But I hope you will not think it necessary to renew that painful subject with me. There is nothing to remove from my mind—I hope nothing to remove from yours. I thought of the little notice which has given you (I rejoice most heartily to find) so much pleasure—as the best means that could possibly present themselves of enabling me to express myself publicly about you as you would desire. In that letter and unmistakable association with you by name, let all end.—

Faithfully yours,
Charles Dickens.

In his greed for good "copy" and a subject for popular caricature, Dickens had run himself into a position from which nothing could extricate him with grace, though, being of so generous a nature, he evidently wished to make what amends he could. But no amends could suffice. The injury has hitherto been irreparable. Even the protest of so unfailing, though so rhetorical, a critic as Swinburne has not checked it. Writing in the "Quarterly Review" for July, 1902, Swinburne said it was incredible that Leigh Hunt, an "honest man and a man of unquestionable genius," should to this day suffer from such a calumny:—

"The simple and final reply," he continued, "should have been that indolence was the essential quality of the character and philosophy of Skimpole, and that Leigh Hunt was one of the hardest and steadiest workers on record, throughout a long and chequered life, at the toilsome trade of letters: and therefore to represent him as a heartless and shameless idler would have been as rational an enterprise, as lifelike a design after the life, as it would be to represent Shelley as a gluttonous, canting hypocrite, or Byron as a loyal and unselfish friend."

In agreement with this estimate is a sentence from the introduction to Leigh Hunt's autobiography, edited by his eldest son, the "favorite child" of Charles Lamb's poem to T. L. H.: "The mastering trait in Leigh Hunt's character was a conscientiousness which was carried even to extremes."

When to such judgments Dr. Bird's personal and professional evidence is added, one may perhaps hope that at last the calumny may be allowed to die. From my conversations with Dr. Bird and with his sister, Miss Alice Bird, who still retains a very clear memory of the Hunt family in the 'fifties, I should believe that Leigh Hunt had hardly a point in common with Skimpole, except a childlike inability to understand the household expenses. On looking into the accounts, he would, for instance, complain that too much was spent on salt; and once he wrote to Mrs. Hunt that they ought to live in a hotel and save rent, taxes, and servants. But it was a scandalous abuse of literature to construct a model "waster" out of an innocent trait like that, and call it an exact portrait.

May I just support Dr. Bird's protest by one inference of my own? The son Vincent, who is mentioned in the letter, died when he was only twenty, but was himself a poet born, and there is a sonnet by him, entitled "On Watching my Father Asleep." It runs:—

"The firelight flickers on the wall of books,
While my dear father slumbers in its shade;
And as his habit is, his head is laid
'Gainst his 'beloved Spenser,' and he looks
As though his mind through those delicious nooks
Of fairyland with perfect Una stray'd,
Listening to all the lovely things she said,
In voice far sweeter than Spenserian brooks.

"Alas! that that so lov'd fine face should be Scarr'd by Life's suff'rings more than by its years
So that in calmest sleep it is not free
From sorrow marks that dim mine eyes with tears:
And yet (thank God!) that patient, kind face wears
A youthful vigour still, divine to see."

It is very rare for a son to write a poem on his father at all. It is incredible that a son should write such lines as these on a father who had more than the very faintest resemblance to Harold Skimpole. It is as incredible as that a "waster" could have written the two lines in which Leigh Hunt uttered the depth of sorrow for that favorite son's death:—

"Death is not borne by only those that die;
Daily they die, long, long, who loved the dead."

If anyone thinks that the man who wrote those lines deserved to be handed down as the living original of Skimpole, he had better leave, not only literature, but ordinary human life alone for ever.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

Present-Day Problems.

AN ACADEMIC VIEW OF LORD CURZON'S MANIFESTO.

II.

IN a previous article I endeavored to show that, even on the assumption that Lord Curzon's suggestions for University reform were sufficient, it is very doubtful whether they could be carried out without legislation of a kind for which a Commission of Inquiry is the natural and normal preliminary. In the present paper I wish to explain why, in the opinion of many very moderate and conservative reformers like myself, the suggested changes are inadequate. I pass over many minor matters which might reasonably be inquired into, as I want to concentrate attention on the two or three points which seem to me to be vital. These are (1) A reform in the government of the University, which would enable the University to effect most of the other necessary reforms for itself; (2) The abolition of non-resident Fellowships; (3) The question of "Research."

(1) The system by which a great University is governed by an enormous non-resident body composed of such of its former students as have taken its lowest degree, paid some £15 for a further degree, and contributed a small annual subscription to its funds ever since, is so outrageous that it will be waste of time to declaim against it. I, for one, should have little disposition to abolish an anomaly, merely because it is an anomaly, if it worked out in a way which was practically harmless. Unfortunately this is far from the case: in practice it means that any proposed reform can, with absolute certainty, be stopped if it is sufficiently obnoxious to the most conservative or reactionary section of resident Oxford opinion to make its representatives care to summon up their forces from the country. The mere knowledge that this is the case prevents far-reaching changes being even talked of. The question what should be the ultimate governing authority of a University is one of the most difficult of all academical problems. Nowhere, perhaps, in the world, in the past or in the present, has a completely satisfactory solution been found. Government by teachers only has, undoubtedly, in the past led to abuses: wherever the teachers do not govern, they complain of external interference as uninformed and unsympathetic, even when not inspired by sinister motives. The very large popularly elected "Courts" of some modern British Universities are, to say the least of it, difficult to work. In the United States professors complain of the virtual despotism of the president, whenever he possesses the confidence of the external governing body. In Germany government supervision, enlightened in the main, is injurious to liberty of thought: it is an acknowledged principle in Prussia, and probably in most German States, that a Socialist can as little be a professor as he can be an officer in the army. Some Governments will not appoint a liberal theologian. Under these circumstances many of us would be satisfied—at least in the present unformed state of English opinion upon the subject—with any amendment of the present system which would make it tolerable. I have already dealt with the proposed changes in the constitution of Council and Congregation. The latter, at least, is quite in the right direction; the proposed change in the composition of the Council is more questionable, and, in any case, is not very important. We are now officially informed, in the "University Gazette," that the Hebdomadal Council has accepted the principle of a Reform of Convocation, and has instructed a Committee "to submit a scheme or schemes on the lines suggested in the Chancellor's Memorandum, or on such other lines as may be found practicable."

Members of Council, who have enjoyed the advantage of oral communication with the Chancellor, have apparently been more successful than the general public in discovering upon what lines its author has proposed to reform Convocation. In the document before us no less than four schemes are discussed, but none of them seems to have been fortunate enough to secure Lord Curzon's personal approval. The tone of the discussion is such as to suggest that he regards all of them as open to insuperable objections. The only one at all likely to satisfy reformers is the one which, apparently, he favors least—the plan of depriving Convocation of control on "educational matters." "It appears to me that any attempt to sweep away Convocation as the final Court in University matters would be doomed to probable failure." If the scheme be held to imply the actual restriction of its powers to the election of burgesses and a few honorary prerogatives, I should quite agree as to the impracticability of the suggestion. Convocation is as little likely to commit voluntary suicide as the House of Lords: and Parliament would not perhaps be very ready to make over the absolute control of the University and its revenues to a Congregation consisting entirely of resident teachers. But it does not seem quite beyond the limits of human ingenuity to frame some enactment by which the control of the University examinations—the conditions under which degrees shall be given, the nature and subjects of the examination and the like—shall be left to the reformed Congregation. If this were done, and a considerable control over University finance were entrusted to the proposed Financial Board, the situation might be rendered tolerable—especially if the composition of Convocation were gradually improved by the elimination of the mere passman.

(2) I pass to the question of "idle Fellowships." Lord Curzon systematically endeavors to minimise the importance of this matter. "In practice," he tells us, "the anomaly, if it be such, is one of small dimensions, and resolves itself into a criticism of the single institution of All Souls." This is perhaps the only passage in Lord Curzon's book which I should be tempted to stigmatise as ill-informed or disingenuous. It is difficult to give exact figures, as the University Calendar does not distinguish "Research" Fellows from "Prize" Fellows. There has been, no doubt, a general tendency on the part of most Colleges to elect "Research" Fellows instead of "Prize" Fellows; but it is a matter of common knowledge that at Merton and at Magdalen a succession of "Prize" Fellows have been elected in the course of the last few years (as well as an occasional one elsewhere), though it may have happened that some of these have remained in the University and taken work at other Colleges. Many other Colleges are still bound by their Statutes to elect a certain number of such Fellows, and will have to do so sooner or later. Moreover (if no steps are taken to prevent it) their number must grow as the life-fellows on the old foundations—many of whom survive in some Colleges—drop off, and as the revenues of the more fortunate Colleges increase. But I would not deny to All Souls its bad pre-eminence as the home par excellence—from Saturday to Monday—of the non-resident Fellow. It was only to be expected that an ex-Fellow of All Souls should draw a glowing picture of a system to which he is naturally attached. "Whether it is desirable," he tells us, "that there should remain a single institution which offers a highly-valued prize to the ablest young men (because, although the Examination is in 'subjects connected with the studies of Law and History,' it is conducted in such a manner as to be a test of all-round ability) drawing them from all Colleges without distinction, assisting their entrance into public or professional life, keeping alive their interest in and association with the University for a number of years, infusing the influence of Oxford through their agency into many and diverse spheres of action, and presenting, if not a succession of historians and jurists to the University, at least a number of distinguished public servants to Church and State, is a question upon which I am not qualified to pronounce."

That many Fellows of All Souls have been men eminently qualified to diffuse the subtle "influence of Oxford" through the wastes of English society I should be far from denying: what is questionable is whether they have effected this diffusion any the better on account of their £200 a year for seven years—followed in many cases (an abuse peculiar to All Souls) by £50 a year for many years afterwards. Could they not have diffused this delicate aroma upon their own often quite sufficient private incomes? And then we are treated to many impressive vaguenesses about the influence which, through All Souls, the outside world exercises upon Oxford. All Souls, we are told, is a "bridge between Oxford and the nation." I should be the last to minimise the advantage which some of us, dining with a resident Fellow of All Souls, may have derived from the whiff of a larger air which some non-resident barrister or M.P. may have brought with him into our provincial existence; but ought such an evanescent contact with higher spheres of being to cost the University several thousands a year? Admitting to the full the inestimable advantages of the "bridge," the objection is that the structure is too expensive a one for the weight that it is being made to bear. And then there remains the question whether it is the right persons who have always been selected to form the coping-stone of this sumptuous piece of architecture. "The Examinations," we are told, "are so conducted as to serve as a test of all-round ability." No one will doubt that Fellows of All Souls are elected for ability—sometimes ability of the highest order; nor would I for a moment question the large and elastic interpretation which has been given to the "ability" demanded for elections. The Fellows of All Souls are men of the world, and the candidates of their choice are seldom narrow specialists: still less is there room for the complaint that those passed over have been disqualified on pedantically academical grounds. Many kinds of "ability" besides those recognised in the schools have received their full share of recognition. But the fact remains that, so far as election depends upon the Examination at all, that Examination is in Law or History. When the present arrangement was made by the first Oxford Commission, it was never contemplated that the lion's share of the Oxford Prize Fellowship fund would be swallowed up by these two subjects. A philosopher, for instance, can only obtain one of these prizes if he happens to possess also a taste and capacity for History or Law, and if he can afford the time and money required to enable him to devote a considerable time after his degree to their study. If All Souls is to continue a College with four undergraduates, the subjects which it "rewards" should be widened. But, after all, the art of getting on in the world needs no artificial endowment. It might possibly be desirable that a very small number of prizes—frankly treated as such—should be given for the express purpose of enabling a few brilliant alumni of Oxford to go to the bar, if the Eldon and Vinerian Scholarships are not already sufficient for the purpose; but they need not be worth £1,400 and more, and they should be confined to men who need them. That many thousands a year, given for the purpose of study in the University, and only diverted from that purpose in quite modern times by a systematic and perjured violation of statutes (now legalised, of course, by the Commissions), should still go to advance private fortunes, when money is so badly wanted for the true purposes of a University, is a state of things which I feel sure that a democratic age will not much longer endure. If this system came to an end, the rooms of All Souls would become available for some useful purpose. Lord Curzon admits that the working men ought to have a College: he has not suggested that they should be presented with All Souls.

H. Rashdall.

[Note.—I much regret that in my last article I misunderstood a sentence of Lord Curzon's. Lord Curzon does not propose that scholarships should be offered for "Music, Divinity, the Indian Civil Service, and Research," but complains that they are not offered for other subjects, such as (apparently) English Literature or Modern Languages.]

(To be concluded next week.)

The Drama.

REPERTORY THEATRES AND THE NATIONAL THEATRE.

The two repertory theatres, so suddenly and unexpectedly announced as in process of gestation, have, like Charles Surface, given several worthy people cause for much easiness. In more than one quarter I have heard the view expressed that the enterprises of Mr. Herbert Trench and Mr. Charles Frohman—odd conjunction of names!—were "bound to queer the pitch of the National Theatre." "Queer the pitch," I may explain, for the benefit of judges of the High Court and other innocent persons, is a piece of acrobats' slang, equivalent to "cut in ahead of," or "take the wind out of the sails of," so-and-so. Some people have even hinted that such was the dark design of the sinister Trench and the crafty Frohman. Now, I have not a shadow of doubt that these fears and these suspicions are alike groundless. Mr. Trench and Mr. Frohman are perfectly sincere in their expressions of good-will towards the National Theatre; and their efforts to train the public in the habits of mind which are essential to the success of the repertory system can only redound to the advantage of any theatre from which the continuous run is to be excluded. There is, however, an element of danger in the very fact that people are so apt to confound these two gallant and laudable enterprises with the totally different National Theatre scheme, and to imagine some necessary interdependence between them. To meet this danger, certain distinctions must be clearly drawn—distinctions as fundamental as that between an affair of outposts and a pitched battle.

The National Theatre can all the better afford to welcome the efforts of Mr. Trench and Mr. Frohman, as its relation to them is one of peculiar advantage. It might be called a heads-I-win-tails-you-lose relation. In other words, the National Theatre has a great deal to gain by the success of the two repertory theatres, and nothing to lose by their failure, or by the failure of either of them. Let us first consider the more cheerful alternative, and suppose that both enterprises achieve a conspicuous success.

"In that case," say the doubters, "where will be the use of your National Theatre? We shall have two repertory theatres: is there any need, or any room, for three?" Certainly there will be need for a National Theatre, simply because neither of the other enterprises can for a moment pretend to fill its place. No doubt the need will be a little less urgent, inasmuch as the deadening pressure of the long run will be in some degree relieved. But if there were a dozen repertory enterprises run for private profit in theatres so rent-burdened as our West End houses, they could not fill the place of a great theatre belonging to the nation—to the empire—and devoted by munificent public spirit to the single-hearted cultivation of dramatic art in all its higher forms. Be their fortunes what they may, neither the Haymarket nor the Duke of York's will ever be a monument to Shakespeare, or a public testimony to the nation's pride in its dramatic past and determination that the future shall not be unworthy of it. That is what we want in a National Theatre—not merely a perfected machine, but a conspicuous sign and symbol of a new and improved frame of mind towards the drama. If Mr. Trench and Mr. Frohman achieve success in their limited efforts, with their very imperfect machines, all the more credit to them. They will help the National Theatre, not only by breaking down the prestige of the long run system, but by giving actors and producers the varied training which the repertory system at once supplies and demands. But no success they can possibly attain would enable them to supply the place of the National Theatre; nor do their promoters, I am sure, cherish any such ambition.

But take now the possibility that they, or either of them, were to fail: would their failure tend to discount the National Theatre movement? Only in the minds of people who will not take the trouble to understand the most obvious features of the situation. The whole National Theatre scheme is based on the assumption that no theatre which is not specially designed and equipped for repertory service, and which is, on the other hand, required to pay rent and interest on invested capital, can successfully react against the commercial forces which make for the star system and the long run. Acting on that assumption, the Shakespeare Memorial National Theatre Committee has estimated for a theatre with a moderate-sized auditorium, indeed, but with a spacious stage, equipped with all modern appliances, not only for the rapid changing of scenes, but for the easy mounting and unmounting of the whole scenic apparatus of alternating plays. It has conceived this theatre as being dedicated, rent and rate-free, to the community, represented by a body of Governors. And, to make assurance doubly sure, it has estimated for a yearly subvention of £10,000—the interest on a capital sum of a quarter of a million, to be raised by public subscription. Contrast with these conditions the conditions at the Haymarket and the Duke of York's: theatres, steeped, if I may say so, in long-run traditions; with small stages adapted to long runs of small society plays; without a single one of the facilities, either before or behind the curtain, required for the convenient and economical working of a repertory system; burdened by heavy rent and taxes; and required, at the very least, to make both ends meet and overlap, if not to pay a considerable interest on capital. How could the failure of enterprises thus crushingly handicapped afford the slightest premonition or presumption of failure for an enterprise so utterly different in all its circumstances as the National Theatre? Rightly regarded, the break-down of the Trench and Frohman experiments would only afford an additional proof of the necessity for a National Theatre, by showing that, even with large resources and under able management, ill-equipped and unendowed repertory theatres cannot struggle against the crushing financial burdens imposed on them in the West End of London.

We are assured that both the Haymarket and the Duke of York's will be conducted on the true repertory system, as distinct from the short-run system pursued—and, indeed, invented—by Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker at the Court Theatre. This is, on the face of it, a wise resolve; for the short-run system was financially unsound, inasmuch as it forced the management to be constantly killing the goose that laid the golden eggs—taking off plays at the height of their success. But I cannot help fearing that the sheer pressure of circumstances will drive Mr. Trench and Mr. Frohman to fall back, if not upon the long-run, at any rate upon the short-run system. This, at any rate, one may predict with confidence: that if the managers are faithful to the true repertory system, they will either have to confine themselves to plays requiring very little scenery, or to incur an inordinate expense in the constant mounting and unmounting of heavy productions. Whatever course they pursue, their failure, should it occur, would in no way portend the failure of an institution which would be exempt from any such dilemmas and disadvantages.

Finally, with regard to the Duke of York's undertaking in particular, there is another point which must not be overlooked. Mr. Trench, in his managerial capacity, is a "dark horse"; we do not know what to expect of him, though we are confident that the historian of the future will be able to say

> "He nothing common did, or mean,
> Upon that memorable scene."

But the playwrights chiefly concerned in the Duke of York's venture are not dark horses at all. We know all about them; and we know that, with the exception of Mr. Barrie, they belong to, or rather constitute, the Court Theatre group. Mr. Shaw, Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. Barker are all outpost fighters—the forlorn hope of the drama, one might almost call them. It is natural to suppose, then, that the Duke of York's will in the main continue the Court traditions, and be, as the Court was, an outpost theatre. But this is just what the National Theatre will not be in the main. If it be managed in the right spirit, it will do a certain amount of outpost work; but that will not and cannot be its primary function. It must before everything be a popular theatre; and though the fanatics of modernism will, no doubt, hold up this phrase to scorn, I do not think any intelligent and candid reader will misconstrue it. Of course the theatre must not truckle unworthily to vulgar tastes; it had better fail outright than do that; but it must make every worthy endeavor to attract a wide and intelligent, as distinct from a narrow and "intellectual," public. Its statutes, as drafted by the Committee, compel it, as its very name compels it, to give Shakespeare and the classical drama a prominent place in its repertory; and in its dealings with modern drama it would sin against its fundamental idea if it fell mainly under the influence of any one school of playwrights. Catholicity must be its watchword; and while it will no doubt give all reasonable encouragement to the short-run drama, it must by no means exclude the long-run drama, but only the unbroken run. Here, then, we have another point in which the Duke of York's enterprise will, in all probability, differ radically from the National Theatre: it will make its appeal in the main to a very much narrower public. I have little doubt that, within the limits fixed by the material conditions above stated, the appeal will be successful; but if it should not be, no inference whatever can be drawn as to the probable fortunes of the National Theatre.

In short, we can afford to look with the liveliest sympathy upon these experimental precursors of the great institution which is to be. Their success must rejoice, while their failure need in no way disquiet us.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

THE DEATH OF GEORGE MEREDITH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The death of George Meredith is like an incredible event. His genius created to an extraordinary extent the feeling of youth. The eager vitality of his mind rose constantly superior to the hopeless regrets of life and seemed to see clearly an immense dawn beginning to rise above the dark shadows of illusions. Fully aware of the tragic element in existence he fell back on a kind of natural and cosmic optimism, to account to himself for his own inherent belief in the fitness and value of this world. He was instinctively a moralist. Everything, within some huge and incomprehensible cycle, had for him a meaning, however dim or impersonal. He had the most vivid and original imagination of his time. The singular impressiveness of his conceptions and his wide knowledge of the nuances of sentiment and class are apt to blind one to the fact that, beneath all his philosophic aloofness, he is really a preacher with a very definite, even if a very undogmatic, theology. He had a profound insight into the essentials of personality, though his actual creations are too often more typical than real. Over nearly all his work there lies that touch of the bizarre, the result of a brain amazingly alert, self-conscious, and critical of the mediocre.

He had, in fact, a truly aristocratic mind, intolerant of all stupidity. He possessed what has been called "the rare combination" of wit and humor, though his brilliant capacity for aphorism masks what is sometimes the obvious in a cloud of phrases. It is, indeed, impossible to ignore the question of his style. An essentially lyrical writer, he used an inverted process of this when he had to write of events of everyday occurrence. His mastery over obscure mental imagery frequently caused him to describe phases of the mind and character as though he were holding with himself a peculiar, internal soliloquy. But when the theme demanded artistic power, he was equal to the greatness of the occasion. He could be the most moving of writers, throwing upon the mournful or heroic episodes of this life his eloquent and sundering words, full of restraint, simplicity and the magic of romance. His fervent belief in the capability of language is proved by the emotion which thrills through many of his pages like an indefinable, fresh breeze of the morning.

For beyond all else he was a poet. Already his philosophy is being relegated into the grave of past things, and that devout belief in the future of the races is giving way to the cold reasoning of facts and the sad voice of the unhappy world saying with its melancholy inconclusiveness that time holds nothing but the death of unborn generations, the decay of hopes, the foolish delusions of a youth which is already dying, the certain comprehension that life is in itself empty, miasmic, purposeless, and that there is nothing to hope for, beyond the pains of this fantastic tragedy.

But as regards his poetical grasp of beauty, the case is far different. Both in poetry and prose he could write the most entrancing descriptions, idealistic, tender, made up of all the colors of twilight and day, breathing the deep repose of an imaginative communion with the spirit of earth. His love scenes are the most lyrical in our language. They glow before us in the delicious mystery of the longings of youth, the bewilderment of old and inexplicable desires, the passionate dawn of first love. He interpenetrates the human and the natural with the essence of each other, till the world and those it contains seem transfigured beneath a rosy light. A vague romance sheds its rays over his works—they are all idealised subtly, all tinged with a fancy out of the fonts of imagery. His keen insight gave him that grip on the dramatic without which all is lifeless, and with which so much is made convincing. He was eminently sane and unfanatical, trusting to the general rightness of humanity to keep the world safely along the paths of advance and order.

In private life the most entertaining and sparkling of conversationalists, he was also the kindest of friends. He took an enormous amount of trouble in answering stray correspondents, in giving encouragement to the writers of a new era, in reading current literature and keeping au fait with the interests of an age from which he was divorced in numerous ways. But he was in many respects astonishingly modern. He accepted the rapid changes of recent years, the whirlpool of varied dramas, with equanimity, believing all the time in the rejuvenating processes of life and the ultimate emergence of society. When he was far past seventy, I remember having a conversation with him about the South American Republics (where I had recently been), which showed a remarkable grasp of remote and complicated facts. I must say it again—It is almost impossible to credit that this great man is dead. He was like the personification of life. He seemed to me one of those invincibly immortal people who are too strong for death, over whom death holds no sway. I think of him in the same way as I think of Turgenieff and Walt Whitman—as of one too vital and eloquent to be classed among the dead. But, as he wrote of Swinburne only a few weeks ago, "the end has come." It is a solemn and strange thought. As I read again the noble, multitudinous pages, I can hardly believe that this wonderful brain is at last extinct, and that the enigmatical night has closed for ever over the splendid soul of George Meredith.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD H. P. CURLL.

May 19th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE OBJECT OF THE GERMAN NAVY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In Mr. J. F. Collier's letter to you under the above heading (NATION, May 15th), he suggests that the German desire for a strong navy, as well as a strong army, is due to an intention—"at the death of the Emperor of Austria"—of annexing the German-speaking Austrian provinces, and thus forming an Empire reaching from the Baltic to the Mediterranean. The intention is probable enough, but there is no ground for supposing that it would, or could, be furthered by the possession of a strong navy. The recent facts of German history tell against any such supposition. The formation of the North German Bund was effected when there was no German navy, and not even a Prussian navy of any importance as regards strength. At the date of the establishment of the modern German Empire, and for nearly a quarter of a century afterwards, the German navy was relatively unimportant. It was during this period, also, that the colonial possessions of Germany were acquired. It is certain that in effecting the great expansion above mentioned the need of a strong navy as well as a strong army was not felt. It is impossible to see how a strong navy can be required for the annexation and retention of contiguous provinces on the South any more than one was required for the annexation and retention of contiguous Alsace and Lorraine on the West. A great German navy is desired for a very different purpose.—Yours, &c., B.

May 19th, 1909.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Mudie-Smith's letter, though reasonable, no doubt, from his standpoint, is "at large" to any Catholic. If there were three, or even two, "Churches" in the sense that Catholics, whether Roman or Anglican, use the word, there would be much in his argument. There is and can be but one Church holding the Apostolic succession of the ministry essential to validity of the Sacraments, because sole tangible witness of the continuity of the Body from its Divine Head till the present time.

The circumstance that our Roman brethren unhappily, and, as we think, with some lack of historic sense, deny Anglican Orders affects the issue not at all. A son does not cease to be begotten of the common parent because his brother calls him a bastard. He has merely to prove his parentage. We do so through our unbroken line of bishops, and we wait with calm confidence the recognition of our brother, however long delayed.

We do not question his parentage at all. Having the Apostolic Ministry and valid sacraments he, in common with ourselves and the Greek Communion, form the family. It will not probably be long before the Eastern part of the Church resumes inter-communion with ourselves; at any rate, the Anglican and the Greek understand each other now on somewhat different lines to those quoted from Mr. Mourouvieff by your correspondent, as many acts as well as words have gone to prove of late. And we at least are absolutely sure that they, as much as ourselves, form part of the Catholic Church.

Mr. Magrath is well able to answer a question, but in passing it may be remarked that the Bishops, priests, and sacraments have never changed, and service books, of course, are not essential, and therefore no one claims Divine origin for them. The primitive Church was a "dissenting sect" in the sense that her Founder and Master was a dissenter, no more, no less.

In relation to the Jewish Church, also of Divine origin, the coming of Christ merged its corporate life in that perfect revelation, witnessed to as in a glass darkly by the Hebrew Scriptures. To merge the lesser in the greater, to round off the imperfect in the perfect, to displace the herald by the sovereign he announces, is not dissent in the ordinary acceptance of the term.—Yours, &c.,

J. R. CHITTY.

Earls' Court, May 18th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Those of your readers who are following the correspondence on this subject may be interested in turning to an article entitled "What, then, did happen at the Reformation?" and written by Mr. Augustine Birrell. It appeared in the "Nineteenth Century," for April, 1896, vol. 39, p. 655.

The whole controversy as to whether the Church in England was or was not the "same" Church both before and after certain Acts of Parliament passed in the reigns of Henry VIII. and some of his successors—the whole controversy, I repeat, is futile, since it consists in playing with different shades of meaning of the word "same." Each party adopts the one that suits his case. Is a pocket knife which has had one of its blades replaced by a gimlet the "same" knife as it was before? Or at what point (if any) of gradual replacement of worn-out parts does it cease to be the "same"? If some important point of theology turned upon the answers to these questions, we should, by this time, have accumulated whole libraries of subtle learning and thought. Mr. Mudie-Smith is hardly correct in saying that of the Greek, the Roman, and the Anglican Churches each of them scorns the claims of each of the others to be a Church founded "directly by our Lord." The English Church recognises the validity of Roman orders (I am not sure of its official attitude to the Greek Church), and, whatever may be true of it as a whole, the consistent Anglican Catholic (i.e., "High Churchman") regards the other two communities (erroneous, in some points, or, even corrupt as he may believe them to be) as still branches of the Holy Catholic Church as founded by Christ, a position which he is bound to deny to Nonconformist bodies. "At present the Eastern, the Roman, and the Anglican portions of the Church, make up the Catholic body—the Universal Church." From "The Catholic Religion, A Manual of Instruction for Members of the Anglican Church" (1908, fifteenth edition, completing one hundred and sixty-sixth thousand), by the Rev. Vernon Staley, p. 63.

"If we go through the list of Protestant sects, and call them one by one into Court for examination, the same results will be obtained in each case. The claims of each and all break down utterly, for not one of them can trace itself back to the Apostles, and the Day of Pentecost. Moreover, the sects do not possess bishops, the successors of the Apostles, without whom there can be no continuance of a valid ministry." From "Plain Words on the Holy Catholic Church" (Eighth Impression, pp. 44-5), by the Rev. Vernon Staley. See also the "Church Times"—passim.—Yours, &c., A. NEAVE BRAYSHAW

Rockport Villa, Auboro Street, Scarborough,
May 18th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Mudie-Smith's letter requires some reply, though I must be pardoned for thinking that he is tilting against windmills. His chief contention—that there are "three Churches each claiming to be founded by our Lord—the Greek, the Roman, and the Anglican"—is inaccurate to start with. These are not three Churches, but three branches of the One Catholic Church, founded by Christ. Nor are we "rival claimants." The Church of England does acknowledge both the other branches as members of the Catholic Church, and prays for re-union; indeed, at the present moment re-union with the Eastern Church is so much within the bounds of practical policy that I may return Mr. Mudie-Smith's compliment by hoping and believing that he will live to see it. The Anglican Church has never claimed to be "the only Church"—but to be a part of the only Church founded by Christ.

Mr. Mudie-Smith says, "The Pope refuses to recognise Anglican Orders," and bases on this an argument that the Anglican Church was "made" by Henry VIII. But, Sir, in 1555 Pope Paul IV. declared himself willing "to receive and recognise in their orders and benefices those who are restored to unity." There was no mention of re-ordination. And the Roman Catholics have more than once shifted the grounds on which this refusal of recognition is based. This, therefore, supports my contention that our Church is the old Catholic Church, continued unbrokenly—though reformed in certain particulars. In regard to the so-called Royal supremacy, I must point out to Mr. Mudie-Smith that (1) the Church definitely recognised the supremacy only "so far as the law of Christ allows," and also (2) quote the words of Henry VIII. himself that "as to sacraments and spiritual things they have no head but Christ."

Those two facts speak for themselves. As historians I will refer Mr. Mudie-Smith to Wakeman's history of the period, and also to Hulton's "History of the Church in Great Britain," where he will find my contentions supported. To refer to the practice of a heathen religion as "the Established Church of the day" is such an extraordinary reversal of accepted terms that I need say no more of it, only remarking that I have never before heard it argued that a refusal to recognise heathen practices is a reason for calling a Church a "dissenting sect," as Mr. Smith does in his last paragraph. Finally, I cannot make it too plain that there is no struggle as to which branch of the Catholic Church was founded by Christ. Our Lord founded the Church of which the branches mentioned by Mr. Mudie-Smith are parts.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES J. MAGRATH.

May 20th, 1909.

A SUGGESTION FOR THE L.C.C.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some of the happiest moments of my life were spent at the L.C.C., and when, as a visitor, I heard the debate of last Tuesday afternoon, I did indeed wish that for a few hours, at all events, I could again be a member. The subject under discussion was one of peculiar interest to me, in view of what I have myself suffered, and am still suffering, at the hands of the ground landlords, and it is right and proper that the new members of the L.C.C. should have put before them the treatment meted out to their predecessors on that body by one of these lords of unearned increment. I will therefore forward to Mr. Hayes Fisher and his colleagues a copy of a letter of mine, setting forth the facts, which appeared in the "Daily Chronicle" at the time.

The L.C.C. ought now to rise to the occasion, hold fast to their freeholds, and become an example to the ground landlords by granting perpetually renewable leases, at such re-adjustable ground rents as to enable them to forego the right to confiscate or interfere with the property of the building owner.

Mr. Hayes Fisher said on Tuesday: "It appeared to be a shame for the municipality to dispose of land, and an equal shame for a private person to own land, according to the Progressives." If I could, I would have given a hearty "Hear, hear!" to that.

The L.C.C., having acquired, at great cost, land for public improvements, cannot be justified in selling it, to become the sport of speculators. The delay in letting the sites is largely accounted for by the arbitrary building conditions originally issued by the L.C.C., and when I was serving on the Improvements Committee, a large contractor drew my attention to this, whereupon I moved and carried amendments erasing several of these conditions, and extending the term of 80 years to 99 years; as a consequence we very soon had improved rents from persons who had already taken up leases for the shorter term, a very clear indication of what the effect would be of a perpetually renewable lease of the land at a ground rent, without reference to the building or the business carried on. Mr. Sydney Webb, in an admirable speech, showed clearly that the Treasury will never wrench from the L.C.C. at the end of their fifty years the power to grant a perpetually renewable lease at a re-adjusted ground rent, leaving to the building owner his equitable, absolute rights over his own property, free from the petty tyranny of vexatious covenants, devised only as a means of extortion.

The L.C.C. have it in their power to become the pioneer in a much-needed reform of the relations of landlord and tenant. Will they prove equal to the occasion?—Yours, &c.,

JOHN LEWIS.

278 to 288, Oxford Street, London, W.
May 19th, 1909.

---

THE SALVATION ARMY'S SOCIAL WORK.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I must ask your permission to reply to "Social Reformer." With regard to my last letter he says: "The actual author or inspirer of it must be one of the adepts at evasiveness connected in some way with the Salvation Army." Permit me to say that this is not so. Of that letter I was the sole writer, author, and "inspirer"—to use "Social Reformer's" own phrase. It may even be that he thinks that I am a member of the Salvation Army, but I can assure him that I have no connection with it whatever.

Before I pass on to what "Social Reformer" rightly terms "the most serious point"—the Parliamentary Committee and the alleged sweating—I must draw attention to the fact that he ignores my contradiction of his statements about the Army's "silent lips" and balance-sheets. Perhaps he acknowledges his mistake, but whether he does so or not, such serious statements should be either justified or withdrawn.

In my last letter I correctly stated that the trade unionists "have at last expressed their appreciation of the Army's object in conducting the factory," but "Social Reformer" argues that the "object" has never been in dispute. My aim was to illustrate the change of tone on the part of the members of the Parliamentary Committee, and I think that I am quite accurate in saying that there is a great difference between their former bitter and reckless denunciations and their present tone, which is, by comparison, friendly. I also said that they have abandoned their former attitude, but "Social Reformer" says that the Committee "stands to-day exactly where it did when the subject was first brought under its notice." Strange as it may seem, we are both probably correct. I am well aware that the members of the Committee still recommend that the factory should be closed, and on this point they stand where they did before. But the truth of my statement that they have abandoned their former attitude is obvious when it is remembered that their former attitude was, as I have just pointed out, one of furious hostility, whereas they now practically admit, in their Quarterly Report, the truth of what the Army has told them.

I need hardly refer to "Social Reformer's" cheap sarcasm about my belief in the "infallibility" of the "War Cry," beyond saying that my letter implied no such belief.

"Social Reformer" says that "skilled men do skilled work at this elevator" and that they "are paid for their skilled labor in doles of food and 'grants' that vary from 6d. to 5s. per week." Cannot "Social Reformer" see the necessity for this method in dealing, for instance, with habitual drunkards who have not the moral strength to resist the temptation to spend their money on drink? How many cures would be effected if the men were enabled to buy intoxicating liquor? In my last letter I quoted from a statement by Commissioner Sturgess in regard to the condition of many of the men admitted to the factory. But as "Social Reformer" seems to object to my quoting from any Salvation Army officer, I will reproduce a few lines from the Quarterly Report of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress. The members of the Sub-Committee visited the factory, and their report contains the following interesting passages:—"Some of the men, through age and other causes, were undoubtedly unfit for the labor market, as no ordinary employer of labor would give them a job, and their movements were decidedly slow and feeble; whilst in a few other cases neither their age nor appearance made them distinguishable from other artisans outside, and our inquiries elicited the information that one had been brought up by the Army from a boy, and taught the trade of a carpenter, and, therefore, was working as one of the regular hands. Another was the victim of drink, and could not resist the temptation when working outside, and therefore came there as his last resort." "We were informed that it was a common occurrence to engage carpenters from outside at the ordinary Trade Union rate of wages, when having work to execute that the Colonists were unable to undertake." I am, of course, responsible for the italics.

Some little time ago the Metropolitan Radical Federation branded the Army as "sweaters." A quotation from the speech of one of the members of this Federation cannot fail to be of interest. A delegate named Hood made the following disconcerting statement: "Years ago I was picked up by the Salvation Army when my fellow trade unionists ignored me because I was six weeks in arrears with my contributions. Eighteen years ago the Army got me a situation, which I still hold. If trade unionists would open a shelter and so take up the submerged workmen instead of giving big salaries to officials, they would render more service."

In answer to "Social Reformer's" question as to why the agitation for an inquiry continues if the charges were disproved, I can only say that the working of the trade unionist mind is far too strange a process to be explained. "Social Reformer" also asks why General Booth "objects to men of the stamp of Mr. Steadman . . . going into the affairs." I must once more repeat that the trade unionists have gone into the affairs. Last January a conference was held between representatives of the Parliamentary Committee and officers of the Salvation Army. At this conference the trade unionists failed to prove anything against the Army, though the sitting lasted for some hours. The Sub-Committee visited the Hanbury Street factory.

It is, of course, probable that General Booth refuses to waste his time and that of his officers in holding a second conference and inquiry when one has already been held this year. Surely everyone in his senses will agree that, as General Booth has held a conference at which the trade unionists had every opportunity of proving their point, he is not under any obligation to hold another. The General has, I believe, no objection whatever to anyone investigating for himself—the doors of the factory are open to all visitors. It is, however, a very different matter when he is asked to give up the valuable time of his officers to holding another conference.

In conclusion, I should like to say that the present seems to be a very opportune time for "Social Reformer" to abandon his nom de plume and acknowledge his identity. —Yours, &c., RONALD H. KIDD.

21, Downside Crescent, Hampstead,
May 4th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Kidd's defence of the labor system of the Salvation Army's Hanbury Street "elevator" will not do. When he wrote it he should have had before his eyes the first reply he sent to THE NATION. In that reply he said absolutely nothing about his "aim to illustrate the change of tone on the part of the members of the Parliamentary Committee" of the Trade Union Congress. He conveyed the very opposite impression—viz., that they had changed their attitude. That my reading of Mr. Kidd's letter is correct, here is the pith of his letter. It is as clear as his evasive style of defence can make anything clear:—

> "I have also a pamphlet issued from Headquarters disproving the accusations with such success that the members of the Parliamentary Committee who first made the charges, have at last"—now note the curious inconsistency and illogical deduction—"expressed their appreciation of the Army's object in conducting the factory."

The italics are mine, of course. To the above I reply: (1) As a matter of fact, Mr. Kidd is as far out in his facts as he is in his conclusions—the Parliamentary Committee were not the first to bring charges of sweating against General Booth's factory. The Committee were empowered to do so by the complaints of former inmates of the factory and delegates to the Trade Union Congress. (2) The tone of the Parliamentary Committee has always been deferential, correct, and inquiring. Can Mr. Kidd recall an unparliamentary expression of the Committee as such? (3) The Committee never made any charge against the object of Hanbury Street. To do so would be to deny General Booth and his workers the instincts of humanity. That has never been the bone of contention. (4) If Mr. Kidd was "well aware"—and if not in touch with the Salvation Army, how did he know it at the time of his first communication to your columns?—"that the members of the Committee still recommend that the factory should be closed," then why didn't he intimate that fact?

Mr. Kidd has fallen into a mistake common to the secretarial staff of the Queen Victoria Street hierarchy. He fails to distinguish between the language of the Congress and the more ornate and respectful phraseology of the Parliamentary Committee. Both stand where they did in their general attitude towards the Salvation Army factory, and both exhibit the same "tone." The delegates are still "furiously" hostile to the system of sweating adhered to in Hanbury Street, and the Committee still insist that General Booth will get rid of a mischievous arrangement and an economic disgrace by closing the place. Yet Mr. Kidd writes as if the Committee were in sackcloth or shouting the praises of Hanbury Street!

One party, let me inform Mr. Kidd, has changed, and he is the chief obstacle to the settlement of this controversy. His name is Mr. Bramwell Booth, but he has only removed the barriers to conference. He has not yet agreed to an inquiry, and unless General Booth overrules the son or transfers Commander Sturgess to another department, the coming Congress at Ipswich will speak in no uncertain voice as to the details of the Hanbury Street affair.

As to the class of man in the factory, I admit to being too dense to appreciate the "necessity for the Army's method of dealing, for instance, with habitual drunkards who have not the moral strength," &c. And for these reasons:—

(1) The majority of the men are good, honest carpenters and joiners, who, through misfortune, are compelled to submit to what General Booth admitted to Mr. Stead is only a subsistence wage.

(2) It is not the place for habitual drunkards. The Army, if it aims at restoring them, should place them in inebriates' homes, seeing that they have none of their own —except, perhaps, for women.

(3) Whether drunkards or atheists, they ought to be remunerated according to the value of their labor, and not according to the system which obtains at Hanbury Street—a system which out-manœuvres the Truck Act, and bolsters up its so-called losses by donations from the charitable public.

But I am encroaching, I fear, on your space. The quotations from the Parliamentary Sub-Committee's report show that they based their remarks on "elicited information." Theirs was not an inquiry, it was a cursory visit to the factory, but enough was seen and heard to justify them in reporting once more in favor of closing. How could they verify the statements given them? That can only be done by an impartial and expert inquiry, with power to examine witnesses and insist upon what, up to the present, has been denied the public—a balance sheet of the factory in question.

The reference to Hood ought to be ruled out of court, after his allegation that big salaries are paid to trade union secretaries!

I will close by putting two questions that were addressed to General Booth the other day, but to which he has not yet deigned to reply:—

Will General Booth undertake to publish a full statement of accounts and balance sheet for the Hanbury Street joinery works, showing how the alleged heavy loss in the working is caused, and giving such necessary details, as cost of materials, remuneration of men, keep of men, rent, interest, and expenses of management?

Can General Booth instance any case of a competitive employer of cheap labor in the ordinary labor market who, like the Salvation Army, succeeds in getting the philanthropic public to pay him the cost of feeding and lodging his workmen, which cost he deducts from their wages?

I apologise for imagining Mr. Kidd to be a Salvationist. If he were, he would earn rapid promotion. His ability to talk round a plain issue must be the envy of other adepts at Queen Victoria Street.

My card is my identity. My humble credentials are the facts which I have submitted.—Yours, &c.,

SOCIAL REFORMER.

May 19th, 1909.

---

IS GOLF A GAME?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Broadly speaking, there is something to be said for your correspondent's view that golf should hardly be called a game in the modern use of the word.

But is not the possibility of giving your opponent a stymie sufficient to make it technically a game? In billiards the only part which comes under your correspondent's definition is playing for safety, as giving your opponent a baulk, and surely billiards ranks as a game. Skittles does not admit of anything even corresponding to a stymie, and should certainly not rank as a game under your correspondent's definition.

Playing against bogey is always called a competition, not a game, and is certainly in a different category from other games.

In the classical use of the word, as in the Olympic games, anything in which there is competitive skill is included.—Yours, &c., ARNOLD F. JONES.

Oxford and Cambridge Musical Club,
Reynolds House, 47, Leicester Square,
May 17th, 1909.

---

THOMAS PAINE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In rehearsing the praises of Thomas Paine, let us not forget that he was a Biblical critic. "In addition to his criticisms on the Fall and the Atonement, Paine (in the 'Age of Reason') dwells much on the late origin of the Pentateuch; the atrocities committed by the Israelites, acting, as is alleged, under God's orders; the irrelevance of the Messianic prophecies; the late date and anonymity of the exilian chapters in Isaiah; the disorderly arrangement of Jeremiah; and the improbabilities of Jonah. Strangely enough, he accepts the Book of Daniel as genuine. Altogether, as far as it goes, and as against the superstitious notions then current, his attack must be pronounced successful. Many of the clergy would now go much farther; and, whether as a consequence of this or of other works, a complete change of front has been adopted in the defensive tactics of all." (A. W. Benn, "The History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century." I., p. 217.) Mr. Benn, in discussing Coleridge's theological position (ib. p. 277), points out that, whenever he touches on the points attacked by Paine, he practically throws up the case for his client. Compare also the verdict of the late Sir Leslie Stephen: "Paine, indeed, deserved some reprobation for his coarseness; and his book has in it an unpleasant flavor. Yet there was a fact which the respectable public tried hard to ignore. Paine's appeal was not simply to licentious hatred of religion, but to genuine moral instincts. His 'blasphemy' was not against the Supreme God, but against Jehovah. He was vindicating the ruler of the universe from the imputations which believers in literal inspiration and in dogmatic theology had heaped upon Him under the disguise of homage. He was denying that the God before whom reasonable creatures should bow in awful reverence could be the supernatural tyrant of priestly imagination, who was responsible for Jewish massacres, who favored a petty clan at the expense of his other creatures, who punished the innocent for the guilty, who lighted the fires of everlasting torment for the mass of mankind, and who gave a monopoly of his favors to priests or a few favored enthusiasts. Paine, in short, with all his brutalities, had the conscience of his hearers on his side; and we must prefer his rough exposure of popular errors to the unconscious blasphemy of their supporters." ("English Thought in the Eighteenth Century." Ed. 2, I., p. 463.)—Yours, &c.,

W. Wyse.

Halford, Shipston-on-Stour,
May 18th, 1909.

"GLIMPSES OF THE TWENTIES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In the notice of this book which appears in your issue of to-day, your reviewer conveys an altogether inaccurate impression of my comment on Fox, which I must ask permission to correct.

By quoting only a portion of my sentence, he represents me as refusing to allow that Fox was "a great debater"; but the words which he suppresses—"His many gifts and fascinations have rendered historians very lenient to his failings"—are a distinct acknowledgment of his abilities, whether as a debater or otherwise. When I remarked in the portion of the sentence which your reviewer detaches from the context, that "it is difficult to credit him with any really high qualities either in his private or political capacity," I was distinguishing between his talents and his principles. That he was "a great debater" is, of course, incontestable, but can he be credited with the "high quality" of patriotism? His own words, addressed to Grey, shall supply the answer. They may possibly tend to moderate the indiscriminate admiration accorded to Fox by those who are only superficially acquainted with his career. "The triumph," he writes, "of the French Government over the English does, in fact, afford me a degree of pleasure which it is difficult to disguise."—Yours, &c.,

William Toynbee.

4, Portman Mansion, W.
May 15th, 1909.

[The notice of Mr. Toynbee's book said nothing whatever about Fox's patriotism. It did quote Mr. Toynbee's comment that "it is difficult to credit him (Fox) with any really high qualities." Mr. Toynbee now admits that Fox was a great debater. Whether the notice misrepresents Mr. Toynbee's general attitude towards Fox readers must judge for themselves.—Ed., Nation.]

THE SNOWDROP AND THE BEE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Despite the testimony from personal observation offered by the Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie and Miss Emily R. Wicksteed as to the absorption by the bee of the nectar of snowdrops, I rather question whether Tennyson ever meant that the lines:—

> "Waves on her thin stem the snowdrop cold,
> That trembles not to kisses of the bee," should convey more than the barest statement of a truism—that is to say, that under ordinary conditions, the bee and the snowdrop are perfect strangers to one another. Naturally it is normal and not exceptional conditions that chiefly govern the poet's fancy in his choice of tropes and epithets; and Tennyson elsewhere thus apostrophises this particular flower:—

> "Many, many welcomes
> February fair-maid,
> Ever as of old time,
> Solitary firstling,
> Coming in the cold time," &c.,

which surely puts the idea of honey-making out of court.

It is perhaps only a fair conjecture that what was running in the poet's mind at the time he wrote "The Progress of Spring" was that unsurpassed scene in "The Winter's Tale," where Perdita discourses so divinely of the flowers that grow in her garden:—

> "daffodils
> That come before the swallow dares and take
> The winds of March with beauty," where the sentiment, though differently and more exuberantly expressed, is essentially the same in substance.—Yours, &c.,

N. W. Hill.

New York, May 10th, 1909.

THE DEFECTS OF LIBERAL PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your correspondent "W. M. T." has contributed his quota to "the defects of Liberal propaganda," and given his view of the remedy. He appears to have travelled far and wide as a political enthusiast, but he is evidently not a Radical, otherwise he would naturally have gone to the root of the matter and ascertained in his wanderings the details which cause the defect or ascertained what means are adopted where the Party succeed.

His thirty years of Liberal working have only produced a phase of mind which betokens despondency and despair, to an extent that "he is very much afraid that Mid-Devon, Peckham, Newcastle, and Croydon are only the preliminary of the day of disaster."

The object of The Nation and other Liberal papers is—inter alia—to constantly keep before Liberals that aspect of the Party spirit which is the opposite to what your correspondent is laboring under. I would, therefore, ask your indulgence to place before him a few points which may be worth his while, and that of others also, to consider and act upon.

The method adopted by the Sowerby Division Liberal Association may serve some useful purpose, not only by way of showing what can be, and is, done in the work of propaganda, and we will begin with the distribution of literature, as he tells us that the distribution of it is, in his opinion, of little use. I beg to differ with him on that point entirely. We have in this Division a complete survey of every house for registration purposes: the records are made by means of the loose leaf book system and the sheets are designed by myself. The names of all male occupiers appear in purple-color type and the women in red. All sheets are typewritten. We therefore have a complete record as near the 15th of July in each year of the name of every occupier as possible. When the winter series of meetings are held, we send to every name on the survey book a notice of the meeting by post in an envelope measuring 8in. by 5in., enclosing such leaflets as bear upon the questions of the day and suitable to the vast majority who are to receive them. In that way we reach every occupied house, every individual voter, every prospective voter, and every woman householder.

An invitation by post is thought much of, and the voter and prospective voter feels that you have some interest in him, and, as a rule, in the cold winter nights he reads intently what has been sent him, usually ten or more leaflets —as much as the ½d. post will allow.

We have very little, if any, tyranny from the parson and squire here, but in rural England it is otherwise. The sending of the literature by post to the laborer, the parson and squire cannot stop, nor can they stop the people reading it in their homes. The voter receiving the typewritten letter thinks a lot of it, and even the children are interested in seeing a letter come with dad's name "printed," as they call it.

The leaflets, if selected with care and discretion, are invaluable: they are the work of those who have made a study of the subject. No question for the past thirty years has been better dealt with than in the leaflets of the Free Trade Union which combat the specious leaflets of the Tariff Reformers. The Liberal Publication Department has done yeoman service to the Party in this respect, and is always ready and willing to accept any suggestions as to leaflets and the production of them to meet the needs of individual cases.

With a view to enlisting the help of those who are anxious and willing to speak and encourage our young men to take up the study of the political questions of the day, a "Speaker's League" has been established, which is fully described on page 507 of the September last number of the "Liberal Magazine."

This has been an immense success. Our member has been witness to the fact by some of them taking the chair at his meetings and delivering their first public political addresses last winter. Something like 200 addresses have been delivered by its members to the Mutual Improvement Societies in every part of the division.

The young man not even yet able to prepare his own essay has been put on his feet by supplying him with a typewritten essay suitable to one of these meetings. In this way these societies have had better syllabuses, and a greater choice of speakers, and new societies have been formed with its help. It has a library of 150 books on political questions: there is no charge for membership or the use of the books. Any person who is getting up a special subject can borrow the books. There has been a good run on the library.

During the summer months we hold a series of outdoor meetings—another opportunity for our speakers to begin public speaking by taking the chair and thus give closer attention to the politics of the day, and "standing up for the Party," as they call it.

Your correspondent unwittingly shows a lamentable lack of knowledge of an agent's work. He suggests they should form local committees and the agent meet them week by week and find out any local speakers. Just consider this proposal with thirty-four polling districts, and the agent going week by week to find out his local speakers. In some divisions there are seventy polling districts. I put it to him if it would not be more practical for the agent to write to him as hon. secretary of his Polling District Committee and ask what names he could suggest. With his local knowledge and evident enthusiasm, he would be able to give them, and the same process applied in each polling district would give the required details, and the agent would act accordingly.

With regard to obtaining the subscriptions to the Party funds, I am at one with him there. It is the keystone of the situation. You cannot get what he terms—and rightly so—"more capable agents" unless you are in a position to pay them, nor can you undertake successfully the propaganda work of an association without the necessary means. When I became the agent in this division there were 100 subscribers; they have gradually increased year by year in number to 700, and the income doubled.

The average Liberal, however poor, will give his mite to help his Party when he is assured that something is being done. Some of our young men connected with the Speakers' League have said that they could not subscribe, but they could "get their father to give a little," and in this way the network of organised Liberalism is being knit together in a way that will stop the onslaught of Tariff Reform or Toryism. Once they subscribe it is our experience that they do not discontinue without some strong cause.

The only true way to conduct successful propaganda work is not just on the eve of an election—it must be constant and regular. The object of it is to educate the elector and place the latest and best facts and statistics before him from time to time, so that when an election or a bye-election comes and the Tariff Reformers state the case, the educated elector laughs and derides their statements and is no prey to their allurements. He stands as firm as a rock.

The success of the Party depends largely upon the success of its Parliamentary units. I would suggest to "W. M. T." and others that they should look at home, and see that their own house is in order. He is apparently anxious. Let him then, and others responsible for the Party machinery, review their own, ascertain what methods are adopted in other constituences, adopt what is applicable to their division, as no cast-iron plan will do. Having made up their minds as to the best methods, put them into operation with persistency, tempered by patience, because workers have to be tested, tried, and trained, and it is a work of years to bring an organisation to a successful issue.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERICK TOMBS,
Liberal Agent.

Sowerby Bridge, Yorks,
May 16th, 1909.

THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—If Liberal principles are to prevail, this shilly-shallying with the business of the country must cease, so that our trade may be relieved of much of the uncertainty existing at the present time. Never at any former time has a Budget received such thought and labor before its introduction, and it is sheer waste of time hearing opinions and talking of modifications. It can never be expected that a Budget will please everybody, and, as money must be raised, the present method seems to afford as simple a means of finding it as any other. If serious affairs are to be toyed with and indefinitely prolonged, as has been, unfortunately, too often the case with the present Government, then it shows too clearly that the determination and backbone which were the conspicuous attributes of Liberals in the past have departed.—Yours, &c.,

J. HOUSTON FULWOOD.

Exchange Square, Glasgow,
May 19th, 1909.

Poetry.

CLOUDS.

My Fancy loves to play with clouds
That hour by hour can change Heaven's face;
For I am sure of my delight,
In green or stony place.

Sometimes they on tall mountains pile
Mountains of silver, twice as high;
And then they break and lie like rocks
All over the wide sky.

And then I see flocks very fair;
And sometimes, near their bodies white,
Are small, black lambs that soon will grow
And hide their mothers quite.

Sometimes, like little fishes, they
Are all one size, and one great shoal;
Sometimes they like big sailing-ships
Across the blue sky roll.

Sometimes I see small cloudlets tow
Big, heavy clouds across those skies—
Like little ants that carry off
Great moths ten times their size.

Sometimes I see at morn bright clouds
That stand so still! they make me stare;
It seems as they had trained all night
To make no motion there.

WILLIAM H. DAVIES.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

IT would be in accord with the general expectation that the task of writing the biography of Meredith, should it be decided to waive his own prejudice against such an undertaking, should be entrusted to Mr. Edward Clodd, his close and dear associate and friend during the greater part of Meredith's literary life, and his constant visitor at Box Hill. Mr. Clodd has long kept memorials of Meredith's conversations and sayings, and these memorials should in themselves constitute a literary treasure of the highest value. No one, we should say, knows more of the outer facts of Meredith's life, and no one could be more in sympathy with its teaching and its inner spirit. The "Athenæum" announces that the official life of Mr. Swinburne is to be written by Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton.

* * *

MR. C. F. G. MASTERMAN'S book on "The Condition of England," which we announced some months ago, is now in the press, and will be issued towards the end of the month by Messrs. Methuen. A portion of the material appeared originally in THE NATION. Mr. Masterman deals in connected form with the present state of the different classes of English society, their motives and aspirations, and the forces, whether in the way of mechanical inventions, or religious, political, or literary ideals, that are now influencing them. Mr. Masterman always writes with force and distinction.

* * *

A GOOD deal of fresh material about Byron is promised in a book to be published by Mr. Murray under the title "Recollections of a Long Life," by John Cam Hobhouse (Lord Broughton). Hobhouse was one of Byron's closest friends, and his companion on the Mediterranean journey during which "Childe Harold" was written. The book will also contain many interesting recollections of European society during the first couple of decades of the century. Hobhouse was in Paris during the Hundred Days, and was in the city when the news of Waterloo arrived. Lady Dorchester, Lord Broughton's daughter, has prepared the work for publication.

* * *

MESSRS. METHUEN have just issued the sixth and concluding volume of their translation of "The Memoirs of Alexandre Dumas." The English reader has had to wait a long time, for the "Memoirs" first appeared in 1852-55, but now in Mrs. Waller's version, which has much of the verve and raciness of the original, he has one of the most delightful of books. Of course, there are people who treat Dumas as outside the pale of literature, describe him as a "manufacturer," rather than an artist, and pooh-pooh his style. But Stevenson knew something about style, and those of us who refuse to give up our Dumas can always quote his verdict: "Light as whipped trifle, strong as silk; wordy like a village tale; pat like a general's despatch; with every fault, yet never tedious; with no merit, yet inimitably right." However, Dumas felt that style was his weakness, and said that he would give ten years of his life to be able to write like Victor Hugo. As for his other gifts, they would furnish forth a cartload of novelists and leave an abundance over. Who ever excelled him in wealth of imagination? Who in the management of dialogue? His characterisation when he takes pains is of the greatest; one word describes it; it is Shakespearian. And for pathos, how many passages in literature excel the death of Porthos?

* * *

UNFORTUNATELY, the "Memoirs" do not deal with the last thirty-eight years of his life, for they end with 1833. As far as they go they have all the sparkle and ease of one of his novels with himself as the hero, and, it must be confessed, a similar easiness as to accuracy. However, those who have gained most of their knowledge of French history from Dumas's pages need not be perturbed. He may advance or retard an event by ten or a dozen years, he may describe incidents that never happened, but the Louis XIV, the Richelieu, the Mazarin, and the Anne of Austria with whom Dumas has made us as familiar as if we had met them, are at least as near to the real characters as the conceptions of them to be found in memoirists like the Cardinal de Retz or Tallemant des Réaux. Dumas had his own notion of how history should be written, and once when taxed with giving too much rein to his imagination, replied: "It is the unreadable histories that make a stir; they are like dinners you can't digest. Digestible dinners give you no cause to think about them next day." A pleasant feature of the "Memoirs" is the open-handed praise which Dumas gives his contemporaries. There was nothing mean about this Titan. "Hugo," he says, "is a thinker, Lamartine a dreamer, and I am a populariser." He was far more than that. Michelet's hyperbole that he was "a force of nature" comes nearer to a just description of his genius.

* * *

AN edition of Spenser's works in three handsome volumes, printed in Fell type, is announced by the Oxford University Press. "The Fairy Queen," which has been edited by Mr. J. C. Smith from the 1596 edition, is nearly ready, and will fill two volumes. The third volume, containing Spenser's other work, is to be edited by Professor Selincourt, of Birmingham University.

* * *

LECTURING on the "Prose of Burke" at the Royal Institution on Saturday, Professor Raleigh had some amusing things to say about what he called "the advertising style"—style that has no personal quality or color of the soul. "Macaulay has a good advertising style; he has one thesis to prove. The modern journalist is the pupil, the creature, of Macaulay. He has his emphasis, his clearness, and his complete satisfaction with some point of view dictated by party or by the necessities of the moment, and he has his perfectly admirable balance and conciseness." We should have said that both Dickens and Carlyle have had almost as much influence on journalistic style as Macaulay, though neither had "the advertising style," if by this we mean that they did not put much of themselves into their writings. There is, by the way, an amusing reference to Burke in one of Horace Walpole's letters. "I dined with your secretary yesterday," he tells George Montagu. "There were Garrick and a young Mr. Burke, who wrote a book in the style of Lord Bolingbroke that was much admired. He is a sensible man, but has not worn off his authorism yet, and thinks there is nothing so charming as writers, and to be one."

* * *

AMONG the American books of criticism shortly to be published is "The Marvellous Year," by an anonymous author whose work is due to the fact that 1909 is distinguished by being the centenary of the birth or death of "fourteen of the world's great leaders in the fields of art, literature, and statesmanship." The volume will contain biographical essays "interpreting the meaning of each life for the people of our day," together with portraits of each "leader" drawn by Miss Gertrude Heubsch.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The New Nation: A Survey of the Condition and Prospects of South Africa." By H. E. S. Freemantle. (Ouseley. 5s. net.)

"Early History of the Christian Church from its Foundation to the End of the Third Century." By Monsignor Louis Duchesne. (Murray. 9s. net.)

"The Life of Friedrich List, and Selections from His Writings." By Margaret E. Hirst. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Essex." Painted by L. B. Bruhl. Described by A. R. Hope Moncrieff. (Black. 20s. net.)

"The Jew and Human Sacrifice: An Historical and Sociological Inquiry." By Hermann L. Strack. (Cope & Fenwick. 10s. net.)

"The Life of the Universe." By Svante Arrhenius. (Harpers. 2 vols. 5s. net.)

"Notes from a Painter's Life." By C. E. Hallé. (Murray. 6s. net.)

"Daphne, or Marriage à la Mode." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Cassell. 6s.)

"Le Lien Social." Par Sully Prudhomme. (Paris: Alcan. 3 fr. 75.)

"Pages d'Histoire Contemporaine." Par Pierre de Coubertin. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7 fr. 50.)

"Georges Sand: Sa Vie et son Œuvre." Par René Doumic. (Paris: Perrin. 3 fr. 50.)

"Maurice Maeterlinck." Par Gérard Harry. (Bruxelles: Carrington. 2 fr. 50.)

"La Voie du Mal." Roman. Par Grazia Deledda. (Paris: Calmann-Lèvy. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

GERMAN LITERATURE.*

An unkind fate seems to have dogged the History of German Literature in Mr. Gosse's "Literatures of the World." It was announced, if we remember rightly, amongst the very earliest volumes of the series, then for a time it disappeared entirely from the list, and now, after the lapse of many years, it appears from the pen of Professor Calvin Thomas, of Columbia University, in New York. "Was lange währt, wird gut," says a familiar German proverb, but we are not sure if the present volume altogether exemplifies the saying. Professor Thomas has given a plain, straightforward piece of work, in which, so far as the limited space at his command allowed, he has compiled the facts of German literary history with reliable accuracy, but with strangely little distinction either of method or criticism. It is the kind of work one might expect from a German rather than from an American professor of literature. In Germany literary history, like so much else, is composed in accordance with a highly "scientific" method, whereby the results of each investigator are passed on to his successor, carefully tested, sifted, and docketed. The consequence is that German historians—Scherer was in this respect an admirable exception—are apt to move in fixed grooves. There are certain things which have to be said about every author, and are said each time by everybody. If any too daring critic attempts to write without first digesting all that his predecessors have written on any particular branch of the subject, he is at once pounced upon by the German academic world—which has unlimited respect for what it calls the "literature of the subject"—and ostracised as if he were something not much better than a plagiarist. We are inclined to think that Professor Thomas has stood too much in awe of his German colleagues; he has been too conscientious in saying just the proper things about his authors, instead of throwing the often short-sighted German "Zunftkritik" to the winds, and being himself. One is tempted to ask, Is German poetry so poor that the same well-worn passages must always be quoted in illustration of a poet? Must weight always be laid on just the same salient features of his work? The impression that this book leaves is that its author is a conscientious student of the history of German literature, but that he has not looked at the literature itself either long enough or carefully enough to see it from a fresh side. This last qualification is surely indispensable.

Where Professor Thomas does allow himself to express personal views, there seems—although it may partly lie in his style—a lack of sympathy with his subject. His attitude to the Middle Ages, for instance, is the characteristic attitude of the modern American to an effete civilisation and a childish age. The knight of chivalry is described as a person with his "head full of sublime nonsense"; Wolfram's "Parzival" has "long and dreary stretches of sheer rubbish." Even were such a conclusion justified, a critic who had once felt the magic spell of Wolfram's poetry would surely find other words in which to express himself. Ulrich von Lichtenstein's "Frauendienst" is a "crescendo of lunacy"; Meister Eckhart and Heinrich von Seuse are "for the most part unpalatable on account of their obscurity and clumsy diction." The critic who regards medieval life, thought, and poetry in this disillusioned, matter-of-fact spirit is not likely to have much that is helpful to say about the "golden Middle Age." The same lack of penetrating sympathy is seen in the discussion of the German Romantic School at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Not once does Professor Thomas hint at the real significance of that movement of individualism in its relation to classicism; there is no attempt to explain to us what the fundamental ideas of German Romanticism were, and why they exerted so revolutionary an influence on the mind of Europe. The deepest, most gifted thinker of the entire group, Friedrich Schlegel, is dismissed in a few lines that say nothing; and it would be difficult for a general reader to obtain from Professor Thomas any clear idea of the individual charm which distinguishes such lyric poets of the early nineteenth century as Eichendorff, Wilhelm Müller, and Mörike; Heine, too, is disposed of with a critical brevity which to many readers must seem impertinent. Remembering that Professor Thomas is the author of the best English biography of Schiller, we turned with more hopefulness to his treatment of German classical literature. Here we are certainly on more solid ground, for obviously it is with the Weimar classics that Professor Thomas's sympathies lie. His best chapters deal with Goethe, although the criticism is again rather concerned with re-stating and confirming the results of previous scholarship than in putting Goethe in a new light.

As a whole, Professor Thomas's book is an example of the great difficulty which besets the writer of a small book on a large subject. What he has done is not to give us a small book, but, in curtailed form, a large one. There is rarely a word here on the wider aspects of German literature or on the movement of ideas in Germany—general matters which one would expect to find treated in a work of this compass. Professor Thomas does not face the question which every intelligent reader seeking initiation is sure to ask himself: What are the qualities which made German literature in its prime so great? What is it that German poetry has to give us that we cannot get from any other literature? If we try further to deduce the author's own literary faith, we are still less convinced that he is the right interpreter of the poetry of the German people. We have already touched on his lack of sympathy for the Middle Ages, and for the rainbow-hued fabric of Romanticism—things that are, it is true, far removed from our modern Anglo-Saxon ideals; but equally disappointing is the schoolmasterly tone in which he deals with those excesses and enthusiasms—"Sturm und Drang," for instance—which are, after all, the really interesting manifestations of the German literary spirit; and it is only in keeping with this tone that, on the last page of all, Hauptmann's "Versunkene Glocke," with its broad, conventional sentimentality, should be singled out as a representative work of the latest phase of German poetic expression. How, moreover, is it possible to describe with real insight the German literature of the nineteenth century, if one can only speak of pessimism—the pessimism from which sprang the fairest flowers of the German imagination—as something that "chilled and corroded the very heart of German life"? One might rather ask: Is there anything at all of the first rank in the German literature of the last hundred years that has not been inspired by pessimism?

* "A History of German Literature." By Calvin Thomas, LL.D. (Short Histories of the Literatures of the World) Heinemann. 6s. net.

PARIS.*

Nearly all writers who discuss the changes of modern Paris begin with praise of Haussmann. Baron Haussmann did much, but the transformation of Paris does not start with him. A Prefect of the capital under Louis-Philippe, the Comte de Rambuteau, who, in his younger days, had been the best of the Chamberlains of Napoleon I., took in hand for Paris and the Parisians what no one before him had succeeded in accomplishing.

Since the days of the long-haired Merovingian Kings ("wending on their bullock-carts through the streets," says the English historian of the Revolution), Paris had needed, more sorely than anything else, hygiene and sewerage. Let any reader with a taste for the subject dip into the pages of M. Franklin ("La Vie Privée d'Autrefois") for a realistic description of the state of Paris during the whole period of the Monarchy, and up to, and after, the period of the First Empire. Hygiene and sewerage were among the earliest tasks of Rambuteau; who, moreover, may almost be said to have originated asylums, institutions for children, workshops, deposit books for savings-banks, and other profitable things which ministers before him had accounted vain. Modern Paris, in a word, begins about 1830.

Towards the close of the First Empire, when Paris, if we rightly remember, had a population nearing 700,000,

* "Walks in Paris." By Georges Cain, Curator of the "Musée Carnavalet." Translated by Alfred Allinson, M.A. Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.

Napoleon dreamed of making his capital, as Professor Pariset says, "the metropolis of Europe." Indeed, the city seemed even then a wonder among nations. The Louvre was completed, the Tuileries cleared. Works of art, the most renowned in Christendom (alas! also, they were but spoils of war) crowded the galleries. The arts flourished, or, at least, were ostentatiously patronised. Public works were growing and lavishly encouraged, for the Emperor of this era was aspiring to be the man of peace. He spent upon Paris over a hundred million francs.

True; yet Paris was still but a sort of country town. It was a sort of country town long after this. At the most garish period of the Second Empire, when crowned heads bobbed into one another at street corners, and Victor Emmanuel I. declared that he could imagine nothing more delightful than a tour of the boulevards by night in a four-wheeled cab, Paris was probably accounted the gayest place on earth. Such, from some peculiar points of view, it doubtless was; but the true and most characteristic beauties of the Paris of these days were but just beginning to peep. What Haussmann did, he did well, and had the Second Empire endured, he would have done a great deal more. He, too, like Rambuteau, had notions of hygiene, as well as of embellishment; but the Baron's imperial scheme was arrested by the war with Germany, and had a narrow escape of total destruction under the Commune. Victorien Sardou, in one of those prefaces which are always such happy reading, has told us how rustic a scene was the Paris of his boyhood—though the gardens, which have well-nigh vanished, must have made its rusticity delightful to the eye. But to be honest on this subject is to admit that the Paris which stands for the pleasure-city of our own century is chiefly the creation of the once-derided Third Republic. Let us not grudge to a Town Council the thanks we should have proffered in a casket to the first or second Emperor.

But capital cities recede as they advance. The architect-improver is, by destiny, the grave-digger of history. Where he builds for the ratepayer he buries for the archæologist. It follows that if the study of archæology is to keep pace with progress in building, we must have ever new books on old and vanishing Paris. M. Georges Cain has written an instructive and companionable one (ably translated by Mr. Allinson), in which, while not oblivious of the Paris that is, his main concern is with the Paris that was.

M. Cain is curator of the Musée Carnavalet, a superior Guildhall Museum, stored in great part with memorials of the Revolution. Perhaps if, when writing it, M. Cain had foreseen or contemplated an English version of his book, he would have told us more about this celebrated building. For our readers' benefit, let us say that it stands at the corner of the Rue des Francs-Bourgeois and the Rue de Sévigné, and is, therefore, in the historic quarter of the Marais, which was once almost a province by itself. To the Marais every foreign visitor must direct his steps who would seek some real knowledge of the past. A rare guide to follow through this neighborhood was Sardou, and there are no more learned ones at present than M. G. Lenôtre and M. Cain, two of his disciples.

The Musée Carnavalet, a seventeenth century structure, was formerly the Hôtel Carnavalet, renowned as the residence of Mme. de Sévigné. The elegant and greatly-gifted Marquise, who has been described as uniting in herself "almost everything that the whole century," the seventeenth, "had produced which was distinguished, pleasant, and elevated," occupied the Carnavalet for nineteen years, from 1677 to 1696. To this long tenancy the renaissance of the French language owed not a little, and the mistress of the Hôtel, let us remember, had her place among the strongest group of writers in the classic age of French literature. All writers of good letters have been in some degree her imitators, and her own letters—valuable at this hour as historical memoirs—are comparable with the essays of Montaigne. Not a few of them were written, we fancy, from the Hôtel Carnavalet. There it was that Mme. de Sévigné, seventy years of age, died in 1696. "She was the soul of the place," says Edouard Fournier ("Paris Guide"), "and remains its glory."

For this generation, however, the Carnavalet Museum serves a distinctly utilitarian end. The library of books on the history of Paris is, perhaps, the richest collection in its class; the views and plans of Old Paris are of the highest value to the student and historian; and the "Grande Salle de la Révolution," where hangs Prieur's touching portrait of Marie Antoinette in the Conciergerie (taken on the spot) is a chamber to evoke some very poignant memories. The garden itself is filled with historic relics.

Streets and squares and buildings associated with the Revolution claim, as is proper, much of M. Cain's attention in this volume, but of equal interest are his notes on earlier and later periods.

Time remains only for a turn in his company around the Place des Vosges (Place Royale), in the very heart of the Marais. All the history of France is written here. On the site of this picturesque abandoned Place there stood originally a palace called the Hôtel des Tournelles, a vast country house in a wood. It was built, says M. Cain, by Charles V. (he who was surnamed the Wise) in the fourteenth century. It is venturesome to criticise M. Cain on a fact of Paris history, but our impression had been that it was a Chancellor of France, Pierre d'Orgemont, who raised the turret-loaded château, and that it came later into the possession of Charles V. or Charles VI. Certainly, however, it was a very ancient royal residence. One noted Englishman dwelt there for a time, the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, after the death of Henry V., "and kept flocks of peacocks and multitudes of rarer birds in its gardens."

It was to Henry IV., inspired by Sully, that the Place Royale owed its origin, and in the reign of his successor, Louis XIII., it became the centre of fashion.

> "How many of our Parisiennes lift their charming eyes in ecstasy before the rights of foreign lands, who are guilty of the unpardonable sin of knowing nothing whatever about the Place Royale, which Corneille celebrated in 1635, where the fair votaries of the Pays du Tendre flaunted and flirted under the reign of the Précieuses, where Ninon de l'Enclos and Marion de Lorme gave their lovers assignation—the Place Royale where so many fine fops, breakers of heads and slitters of weazands, and breakers of the laws against duelling, exchanged such slashing blows beneath the pensive eyes of the 'fair fashionables,' who, the better to see them cut one another's throats, would lift a corner of the jalousies with the tip of their rosy fingers—the Place Royale where dwelt the Cardinal de Richelieu, Chabannes, Rohan-Chabot, Mlle. du Châtelet, and many others famous in history, where Mme. de Sévigné was born, where the great tragic actress Rachel lived, where from one window to another Victor Hugo and Théophile Gautier discussed art and poetry!"

Within a few hundred yards of the blatant Place de la Bastille, the Place Royale, or Place des Vosges, time-worn, faded, and somnolent, retains a certain antique dignity. Its old, high-roofed, red houses are beautiful in the evening sun, and the arcades are still there in which Corneille laid the scene of a comedy. This is one of the true bits of the Paris of the Chronicles, the Paris of story and romance; and M. Cain says that an imaginative member of the Municipal Council, M. Galli, has the pleasing phantasy to restore it to its pristine beauty. But every link is severed that bound Paris to the past of the Place Royale, and over that past no Republic of to-day has power.

---

THE PAPER-MARKS OF PROVENCE.*

It is a most entrancing story that Mr. Harold Bayley unfolds in this copiously illustrated volume. Far back in the Middle Ages there dwelt in the Provençal district of France a race of people, Albigenses and Waldenses, who were as skilful in certain handicrafts as they were upright in their way of living. The crafts in which they excelled were paper-making and, in later days, printing, both of which are still believed to owe their beginnings to them. Unhappily, besides being skilled of hand and immaculate in morals, they were also intellectual; and intellectuality in those times was regarded as synonymous with heresy. Hence, about the twelfth century, the hand of Mother Church fell heavily upon them, and continued to fall at intervals until long after the Middle Ages had passed away.

* "A New Light on the Renaissance. Displayed in Contemporary Emblems." By Harold Bayley. Dent. 12s. 6d. net.

Their homes and their persons were burnt, their industries and arts demolished, and those who escaped with their lives were scattered to the ends of Europe. But with them went their paper-making, and on the paper were paper-marks, each consisting of a design that represented something more than a workman's idle fancy.

Out of these paper-marks, some four hundred of which are reproduced, Mr. Bayley has constructed an elaborate study in medieval symbolism. His purpose is to show the symbolic meaning of these designs, to connect them closely with the pre-Reformation movement that took place outside Italy, and to suggest, if not to prove, by means of them, that the Provençals were largely responsible for the corresponding movement inside Italy and for the Renaissance in art and letters that attended it. To demonstrate that the Italian Renaissance really owed its origin to France is a big undertaking. It should be noted, however, that Mr. Bayley does not rely for his theory entirely on the Provençal paper-makers and their symbols. The latter, as he urges, probably found means of communication and identification among the exiles and their sympathisers. Their proper interpretation throws, moreover, a most useful light on the tenets of the Provençal church or secret society—tenets which may be traced in much contemporary Italian literature. These craftsmen, however, of Provence were not the only exiles who, by the devious methods that alone were safe, spread the anti-papacy gospel. They had powerful allies in the Troubadours, those songsters and poets and satirists who, through the agency of their gifts, profoundly influenced every country wherein they wandered. From the Troubadours derives most of that romantic mysticism found in such medieval classics as the Romaunt of the Rose and the Legend of the Grail; and the connection between such romances and the teachings of the Albigensian Church is one of the main theses of this book.

The creed of this church, which suffered so much persecution in its quest of the millennium, did not exclude lightness and laughter. Poesy and the jester were its implements, based though it was on education—the cult of the Virgin Sophia. To its priesthood were related the much-maligned alchemists and, Christian as it was, it had the sympathy and co-operation of the Jewish Kabbalah. It reached England among other countries, and infected English literature; at least, so says Mr. Bayley, who finds in much that we accept rather vaguely as a product of the Renaissance the symbolism of Provence. Spenser's Elizabeth, for example, the object of the poet's dedicatory sonnet, was not the Tudor queen who sat on the throne of England, as materialistic critics have imagined; or, at any rate, "it is probable that much of the poetic adulation of Queen Elizabeth was lavished with a mental reservation in favor of a less material mistress," namely, the Queen Sophia who ruled over the hearts of the poets. So with much that has been interpreted literally in Petrarch and Chaucer. The cult of Sophia is the key "that unlocks nearly all the mysterious love poetry of the Middle Ages."

One is tempted to lose sight of the paper-makers and printers in this book of fascinating speculations, and to forget the Provençal paper-marks that constituted the cipher of the new learning and the new creed mixed in one. Yet it would be unjust not to remember them fully, if only because Provence had the lion's share of the misery and persecution that came in the wake of the struggle for Reformation. The bitter irony of it all was that when the Reformation came, it was not the Reformation that these men wanted. To the apostles of the new Christianity that aimed at working through the pure joy of life and learning, the scorpions of Luther were as noxious as the whips of Rome. One tyranny was substituted for another; the yoke of the second, indeed, was heavier by reason of the disappointment it brought. Between the two contending forces the true Reformation, the Reformation that had given birth to and nursed its own beautiful child, the Renaissance, bade fair to die a natural death. Languish it certainly did; and if it has ever revived, it is shorn of great part of its natural beauty. Still in the mystic romances of the poets who were bound to mystery, and very likely in the symbolic paper-marks of old Provence, it has left some monuments for which the present generation, which has gained liberty of speech and lost romance, should feel duly grateful.

THREE NOVELS.*

Mr. Marriott has advanced in his art since he wrote "The Column." From the youthful stage of artificiality and over-cleverness he has developed in strength, till he is now able to be sincere and natural. There is but little make-believe in this careful study of the family life of the sensitive girl, Audrey Tregarthan, and her unconventional wooing by her "friend," Dr. Fielding. Though the novel is not specially remarkable for fineness of artistic touch, it is a thoughtful psychological study, sincerely handled, and, as such, is worth scores of facile stories of the rank of "Barbary Sheep."

Audrey Tregarthan, the heroine, a girl of twenty-six, is the daughter of a provincial bank cashier at Lew Alston, a stagnant little watering-place on the North Devon coast. The quiet charm of her nature, which is thrown away on the dull perception of her provincial world, has been deepened by family responsibilities. Her mother is a victim to the drink habit, and it is Audrey's ceaseless care to conceal the cause of her mother's outbreaks from the impressionable younger children, and to ease the burden of her father, a sensitive and nervous man. Mr. Tregarthan is in debt to the land agent, the jovial and coarse Mr. Quick, and the family outlook is sufficiently depressing to keep Audrey a prey to anxiety, while her emotional nature craves for the love that no man has yet awakened in her. Chance, however, throws her into unconventional touch with Dr. Fielding, a stranger who settles down at Lew Alston to pursue his literary work, and it is the ambiguous nature of their intimacy which, though "innocent" in the vulgar phrase, runs all the peril, socially, of a clandestine understanding. Dr. Fielding's experiences of women have not been happy, and he has determined that he will not enter a second time into marriage. He falls in love with Audrey, but his mind is torn between his growing passion and his misunderstanding of her unconventional attitude—a not infrequent result when masculine natures encounter courageous women. Dr. Fielding fails to grasp that it is feeling that sanctifies a bond between man and woman, and not social convenience. In his inner confusion he allows Audrey to see that she stands on a lower plane in his eyes than she does in her own—a fault for which he is punished by her breaking off friendly relations. Apart, however, from the interesting analysis of this unusual situation, Mr. Marriott's picture of the home life of the Tregarthan family is extremely lifelike. The novel is not a work of inspiration, but it is one that teaches the reader to suspend his judgment, to banish prejudice, and examine every new problem of conduct on the grounds of the particular circumstances involved. We may add that, while Audrey is temperamentally an exceptional type, Fielding's character is less well defined than his attitude to life.

The modest worth of Mr. Marriott's achievement assuredly becomes indisputable when we compare it point by point with Mr. Hichens's new story. No doubt the reviewers will compare "Barbary Sheep" unfavorably with "The Garden of Allah," but we confess, for our part, that we see no difference in quality between the two romances, both being of the Cook tourist genre. The characters are about as true to life in the one as the other, and though "The Garden of Allah" contained ambitious descriptions of desert scenery, "Barbary Sheep," in compensation, is free from that overpowering atmosphere of luxuriant falsity which brought conviction to the British breast. The advertisement on the wrapper of "Barbary Sheep" states that the novel is "a study of the influence and charm that an Eastern man may exercise over a Western woman, a woman typically modern, capricious, and accustomed to the gratification of every whim. The scene of the story is laid in Algeria, at the gate of the Sahara Desert, where cultivation merges into the vast desolation which fascinates, which even enchants the European, but where few Europeans can ever be really at home." Exactly. Sir Claude Wyverne Wyverne may pass muster as the typical, unimaginative upper-class Englishman who neglects his fashionable, bored young wife,

* "When a Woman Woos." By Charles Marriott. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.
"Barbary Sheep." By Robert Hichens. Methuen. 3s. 6d.
"The Yellow Rose." By Maurice Jókai. Translated by Beatrice Danford. Jarrold. 2s. 6d. net.

WERNER LAURIE'S
NEW BOOKS.

LOLA MONTEZ:
An Adventuress of the 'Forties.
By EDMUND B. d'AUVERGNE.

Hand-Coloured Photogravure Frontispiece, and many Illustrations in Tone, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Lola Montez was the most beautiful woman of her time. Animated by insatiable ambition, and possessed of heroic courage, she astonished the old and the new worlds with her audacity and daring. In the 18th Century she would have played a part greater than the Pompadours. The greatest geniuses of her time fell victims to her fascinations. For two years she ruled Bavaria as uncrowned queen, defeating the machinations of the most powerful enemies, and ruling wisely and well. Her free use of the horsewhip upon her opponents' shoulders delighted and astonished her contemporaries. She was the friend of Dumas and the most brilliant wits of that brilliant period. She wandered over the whole world, now appearing in India, now in California, now in Australia, ending at last like Pelagia and La Vallière, almost in the odour of sanctity.

Mr. d'Auvergne tells her story sympathetically, and aims not only at portraying the woman, but also the animated and varied backgrounds against which she moved.

The Love Story of Empress Josephine.
By JAMES ENDELL.

Hand-Coloured Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Pictures in Tone, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Paul Verlaine: His Life, His Work.
A Biography of the famous French Poet and the History of contemporary French Literature and Writers. By E. LEPELLETIER. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 21s. net.

THE MODERN MOTHER.
A Guide to Girlhood, Motherhood, and Infancy.
By Dr. H. LAING GORDON.

Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

The Education of the Will.
By T. SHARPER KNOWLSON. 6s. net.

New Volume in the Leather Booklets.

CAMBRIDGE COLLEGES.
By R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

Exquisitely printed with 25 illustrations specially prepared for the volume, gilt top and full leather binding, stamped in gold.

Size 4¾ by 3. Price 2s. 6d. net.

TWO NOVELS.

1. The King and Isabel.
By the Author of "The Adventures of John Johns."

2. Tears of Desire.
By CORALIE STANTON and HEATH HOSKEN.

T. WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, LONDON.

BOOKS OF NOTE.

DEDICATED BY GRACIOUS PERMISSION TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

The Story of the Household Cavalry, 1661-1902.
By Captain Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, including Six Coloured Plates. Two Vols. Super Royal 8vo. Edition de Luxe limited to 40 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary edition, £3 13s.6d. net. [On Monday next

With the exception of brief records issued in 1834, no history of the Life Guards and Royal Horse Guards has hitherto been written.

English Heraldic Book Stamps:
Figured and Described. By CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. Super Royal 8vo. Illustrations. 25s. net.

The first book on this subject in English with about 300 illustrations.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS.
By FRANCIS GRIERSON, Author of "Modern Mysticism," and "The Celtic Temperament." Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

"A genuine document of much historical interest and artistic force."—Nation.

"A highly significant volume. A picture of the spiritual and intellectual atmosphere of America in the days immediately preceding the Civil War."—Daily Telegraph.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SILVER FOX.
By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

"A romance of the realist kind and the fascinating lore of the woods is accompanied by the most delightful picture of foxes great and small. It makes better reading than many novels of human affairs."—Observer.

FAMOUS WOMEN OF FLORENCE.
By EDGCUMBE STANLEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The careers and characters of some of the famous ladies of Florence whose stories illustrate the Renaissance period.

CHAPTERS ON SPANISH LITERATURE.
By J. FITZMAURICE KELLY. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A delightful volume, full of sympathy, learning, and judgment."—Observer.

"We have no hesitation in saying that this volume forms the most valuable English contribution to Spanish letters since the same author gave us his history of Spanish literature."—Athenæum.

"I have never met with such an illuminating work on Spanish literature."—Mr. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM in the Nation.

SOME IMPORTANT TRAVEL BOOKS.

By A. G. BRADLEY. Illustrated by W. M. MEREDITH.

SHROPSHIRE, HEREFORD AND MONMOUTH. 5s. net.

GLAMORGAN AND GOWER. 3s. 6d. net.

"Guided by Mr. Bradley and lured ever onward by Mr. Meredith's fascinating sketches, the tourists who now fill Devonshire and Cornwall to excess will soon discover that the South Wales Marches are more beautiful than either, and open up an undiscovered and unspoilt country to the holiday-making Briton."—Daily Telegraph.

By W. H. HUTTON. Illustrated by W. M. MEREDITH.

BY THAMES AND COTSWOLD. 5s. net.

"It is a book to read at one's leisure, thereby to revive old memories, to revisit familiar places, and to form pleasant resolutions for a speedy acquaintance with others as yet unvisited."—Cheltenham Journal.

THE NEWEST NOVELS.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS.
By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."

"This most entertaining social comedy."—Times.

"For good, festive, but not facetious novels, it would be hard to beat him."—Observer.

THE STORY OF THYRZA.
By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod."

"A strengthening tale builded of charity, human kindness, and the humour which has tears behind it."—Daily Chronicle.

THE PERJURER.
By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

Mr. Norris has never written a more delightful story. [Next week.

PATRICIA BARING.
By WINIFRED JAMES, Author of "Bachelor Betty."

"If I had been a young man on the spot, I should certainly have been at her feet with the rest of them."—Punch.

The Works of GEORGE MEREDITH
LIST ON APPLICATION.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.
10 Orange Street London W.C.

and goes off into the desert, several nights in succession, to shoot mountain sheep. A child of the desert, a Spahi officer, a pure-blooded Arab, with a "brilliant but cruel and startlingly intelligent face," serenades Lady Wyverne in his absence, and takes her for moonlight walks to the Gate of the Desert. Nothing could be more convenient or natural. But it so happens that Sir Charles has a conversation at the auberge of El-Alia, with his elderly French hostess, anent the perfidy of Arabs in general, and of Benchaâlal, the Spahi officer, in particular, and he soon suspects that his guide, Achmed, has been bribed by the Spahi to keep him away from home, so that he and Lady Wyverne may take their romantic moonlit walks together. And it is precisely at this stage of his story that Mr. Hichens goes wrong, and misses a grand opportunity. The psychological situation is interesting. What would a stupid but good-hearted British baronet say to his fashionable wife, and what would she say to him when he discovers her at 4 a.m. engaged in a romantic tête-à-tête with a fascinating Arab? The exploration of the soul of the British husband and wife, conducted by a true realist, would yield delightful results. Trollope would have done justice to it, and in a finer, thinner vein Mr. W. D. Howell's researches would have taken a classic form. But Mr. Hichens and his characters go the way of hoary melodrama. When Sir Charles, returning post-haste on his mule, hoves in sight of the couple, the Arab, with great sang-froid, orders Lady Wyverne to crouch down behind the rock, while he lets his burnous drop over her. Sir Charles, vastly suspicious, passes by, glaring, to the hotel, which his imprudent lady regains too late. Now here the genuine crisis is missed. Sir Charles should have thrust the burnous aside, and the situation would at once become of poignant interest to tens of thousands of upper-class, travelled Britons. As it is, we are fobbed off with a stale romantic convention. Sir Charles takes his double-barrelled gun, and a mad Marabout takes his knife, and Lady Wyverne decks herself, the following night, with her diamonds, and through this concatenation of significant circumstances it is that the fascinating but reckless child of the desert, Benchaâlal, comes to his death. It is a pity, indeed, that Mr. Hichens, when half-way through with his story, did not recognise that the subject was not rightfully his, but one that should be dramatised and expounded in three acts and as many prefaces by Mr. Bernard Shaw.

It is a pleasure to turn from the pseudo-romanticism of Mr. Hichens to the quiet and easy naturalism of the Hungarian novelist, Maurice Jókai. It is true that Jókai is a master of the historical romance of the school of Sir Walter Scott, but, like Scott, his strength lies in his knowledge of human nature and his feeling for picturesque, dramatic situations. In twelve short chapters Jókai sketches for us the essential features of peasant life on a great Hungarian plain—the flat Zam puszta, which lies on the far side of the Hortobágy River. Cattle buyers from Vienna have come to the puszta to purchase some of its famous cattle for breeding, and in a series of crisp and natural little scenes the characteristic atmosphere of the district, the local flavor of these endless grassy steppes, inhabited by herdsmen, shepherds, cowboys, horseherds, and swineherds is conveyed to us. The dramatic situation, the struggle between Sáudor, the horseherd, and Ferco Lacza, the cowboy, for the love of the maiden at the Hortobágy inn, "The Yellow Rose," as she is called in the district, is presented with the freshness and force of nature, and a young novelist could not do better than examine the unobtrusive and delicate strokes by which the girl's faithlessness is brought home to us. The test of good art is whether it lives and grows in the memory of the audience, and the test for bad art is whether it falls to pieces, through its inherent weakness, after the first illusion has passed away. From this point of view a comparison between Mr. Hichens's and Jókai's stories is decidedly instructive.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Sir John Ardagh was a man who had the good fortune to be present at almost every point of interest throughout his lifetime. His activity as a soldier and public servant extended for over forty years, and the story of his life, as told by his widow, the Countess of Malmesbury (John Murray, 15s. net), almost covers the foreign history of the British Empire from the early 'sixties up to the end of the Boer war. Though a sapper, he was frequently employed on special missions where diplomacy was almost as much wanted as surveying. We find him in Paris towards the end of the Franco-German war, in Turkey at the end of the Turco-Russian war, at the Berlin Congress, with the Bulgarian and Greek Boundary Commissions, and at the first Hague Conference. There were, besides his ordinary service years in the Army, three years of special service in Egypt during the Nile expeditions of the 'eighties, and six years of service in India, chiefly on the Viceroy's staff. On all these points the biography possesses unusual and first-hand interest; for though Sir John Ardagh was not a writer, he has left a great deal of new information in letters and notes, to say nothing of his numerous drawings of historic scenes. But, perhaps, for his friends, at all events, the most important part of the volume will be the complete and careful vindication of his memory from the common charge of neglecting to discover the truth about the Boer forces when he was Director of the Intelligence Department before the war broke out. The charge has been already disproved by the Royal Commission on the war, and by the publication of numerous documents that cannot be disputed. But the defence was well worth repeating, for public opinion does not trouble much about Blue Books and Reports. At the very time when the outcry against the Intelligence Department was beginning to arise, the present reviewer had an unusual opportunity of discovering how baseless it all was. When he was in Natal within the first week or two of the war, he was able to study the secret report of the Intelligence officers upon the numbers and organisation of the Boer forces and armaments in both Republics. On every point the estimate was extraordinarily accurate, as the course of the war proved, and where an estimate was wrong, as in computing the number of "Long Toms," it was overstated, rather than understated. It was not the Intelligence Department which was at fault before the war, but Mr. Chamberlain and the Government, who either did not trouble to read the Report, or absolutely neglected its warnings. To those who followed the inner story of the war this has long been known, and the secret report has long been published, but we are glad to see the truth of the story repeated in justice to the memory of a modest and honorable soldier who never went out of his way to defend himself.

* * *

A few years ago two French enthusiasts brought out a volume containing short biographical accounts of the two thousand characters who figure in Balzac's novels. Mr. Alexander J. Philip, the Public Librarian of Gravesend, has attempted a less gigantic, though formidable, undertaking. The sub-title of his book, "A Dickens Dictionary" (Routledge, 8s. 6d. net), runs thus: "The Characters and Scenes of the Novels and Miscellaneous Works Alphabetically Arranged." It begins with brief summaries of all Dickens's works and then follows the Dictionary proper with its serried mass of entries. The main difficulty in such a work as this is to know where to draw the line in the way of omission, for, as Mr. Philip points out, some people may expect a Dickens Dictionary to contain matter which would more appropriately be found in a Dickens Encyclopædia. He promises that some day he may give us such a work, and in the meantime the book before us is a useful help for those who wish to turn up the passage relating to any particular character or saying in Dickens's works. Though in the Dickens cult, we can claim only a moderate degree of adeptness, and it is possible that a Dickensian enragé may take exception to faults of omission or commission in Mr. Philip's volume. We have noticed one or two minor ones, but, upon the whole, consider that he has acquitted himself well.

* * *

"Servia and the Servians," compiled and edited by Mr. Alfred Stead (Heinemann, 12s. 6d. net), contains twenty-four chapters, each written by a Servian authority, and therefore giving what we may take as the official view of the matter in hand. Thus M. Gavrilovitch, the Director of the State Archives, contributes an "Historical Survey"; M. Milanovitch, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, writes on "The Constitution and Constitutionalism"; the Chief of

ASPECTS OF
GEORGE MEREDITH
By RICHARD H. P. CURLE
With an Engraved Portrait after G. F. WATTS, R.A.
Large Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH:—"Amid the literature now circling round the fame of our leading novelist, this keen and delicate study of Mr. Richard H. P. Curle will unquestionably take a foremost place . . . . He knows his Meredith well, but his knowledge is not confined to a single hero-worship. Indeed, the real value of this very suggestive monograph lies in the freedom with which, in accordance with the best traditions of criticism, it makes its subject illustrate the whole pageant of literary activity, and holds an even balance between the relations of literature and life. This short study is indeed a distinguished and well-balanced piece of work, which should gain its author immediate recognition, as among the most sane and well-informed of the younger critics of the day."

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS LTD., LONDON.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?
A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"
will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W. C

Buy The Saturday Westminster
Week'ly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy
Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."
£17 17s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary.
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. | 84, Piccadilly, W.
82, Strand, W.C. | 25, Cannon Street, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free, Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.
ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,650,000.

Directors.

Hon. Sir ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. Viscount GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
Sir THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Head Office Manager—H. R. WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—F. J. BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—F. W. HOWETT.
Assistant Country Managers—J. W. BUCKHURST. E. F. ROBINSON.
Chief Accountant—F. J. CARPENTER.
Secretary—G. PAGET.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.
Foreign Branch—8o, Cornhill, E.C.
269 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE BUSINESS UNDERTAKEN.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given or the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

FIVE LECTURES ON CO-EDUCATION.
By ENNIS RICHMOND, Principal of West Heath School for Boys and Girls, Hampstead.

1. A NATURAL EDUCATION.
2. FOR OUR DAUGHTERS.
3. TWO ASPECTS OF CO-EDUCATION.
4. CO-EDUCATION AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
5. WHY NOT CO-EDUCATION?

Price Threepence each, post free.

Issued by the Women's Printing Society, Brick Street, Piccadilly.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION
Is Now Ready and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

the General Staff on "The Army"; the Minister of Public Instruction on "Education," and so forth. The result is a huge mass of information presented in an easily accessible form. At the present moment the chief question which Servia has to face is her relations, political and commercial, with Austro-Hungary. As Servia has no seaboard, and Austria-Hungary is the market for 87 per cent. of Servian exports, and sends in more than half the total imports, the question is a vital one. Professor Baikitch suggests three solutions—a Central European Customs Union, which would include Servia, a Zollverein with Hungary, or a Zollverein with the Balkan States. From Professor Popovitch's account of Servian literature, we gather that at present its main strength lies in poetry and literary criticism, while there are no novels, and the drama is poorly represented. French influence is predominant, and the Servian popular songs, which were praised by Nodier and Merimée—the latter brought out a volume of original compositions which professed to be translations of them—are still preserved and held in esteem.

* * *

Mr. L. Worthington Evans and Mr. F. Shewell Cooper have published a handy volume of "Notes on the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, with Forms" (Chas. Knight & Sweet & Maxwell). The new Act, which came into operation on April 1st last, is intended primarily to codify the law contained in the repealed statutes, but considerable changes of language have been introduced, which clear up ambiguities and make it more easily understood. The authors have produced a work which will be extremely useful, not merely to legal practitioners, but to directors and officers of public and private joint stock companies. The notes are brief, but lucid and illuminating, and the forms are carefully and concisely drafted.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning. May 14. | | Price Friday morning, May 21. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 5/16 | ... | 85 5/16 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85 | ... | 85½ |
| Japanese 4 per cent. ... ... ... | 90½ | ... | 91⅛ |
| Steel Common ... ... ... ... | 58¾ | ... | 61 1/16 |
| Rand Mines ... ... ... ... | 9 | ... | 9¼ |

Speculation is still rife, and in many directions Stock Exchange prices seem to have soared to a dangerous height, especially in the American and Kaffir markets. Steel Common at or above 60 strikes one as preposterous, but with Wall Street all things are possible, and sometimes high prices positively encourage the speculative buyer. The Money market, however, has been giving a distinct warning to operators. Rates have been decidedly firmer, partly in consequence of the lock up of Government money and the issue of Treasury bills, partly owing to the appearance of American Finance (or security) Bills, partly, again, owing to the general belief that a revival of trade is on foot. The American Security Bills based on the deposit of bonds in New York are three months' bills, and it is possible that when they mature more gold exports will be made from New York. Trade in the United States still languishes, and things may be very bad there if the harvests should prove deficient. During the past week the cold frosts have done tens, and, I fear, hundreds, of thousands of pounds' worth of damage to farmers, market gardeners, and fruit growers in many parts of the country. A fruit grower in Norfolk suffered to the extent of £1,200 in a single night. Cold and drought combined are certainly adverse factors, and we must not too hastily assume that trade improvement will be sufficient to bring with it dearer money in the autumn.

The City and the Budget.

Although trade writers in the Tory press moan and groan in the most heartrending fashion, it is a fact that the average City man (who is not a Rothschild) is quite unmoved by the letter of protest sent by bankers and merchants to Mr. Asquith. The signatures, indeed, are highly respectable and weighty, though many big people refused to sign. But then a good many of those who did sign joined in the Guildhall meeting with the object of forcing the Government to spend more and actually promised financial support. It is, therefore, considered that the objection to income-tax and death duties comes with rather a bad grace. Apparently the inward meaning of the letter is that the income-tax ought to have been increased without any further graduation. But an addition to the ninepenny rate on earned incomes would have been very unpopular with the clerks and managers of the very same bankers and merchants who memorialised Mr. Asquith. Unless, therefore, one goes to the magnates, one does not find much complaint, but rather a sense of relief. There is, however, a very general objection to the seizure of the old Sinking Fund, and those who have looked into the figures complain rather bitterly that too much taxation has been imposed, the estimates of the yield being far too low.

Brunner Mond.

The profits of this tremendous business fell £40,000 in 1908-9, as compared with 1907-8—from £740,000 to £700,000—and the dividend is consequently reduced from 30 to 27½ per cent., the lowest since 1897-8, when only 25 per cent. was paid. The carry-forward is £37,000, against £35,000 last year, and, on the whole, it must be said that the great business has come very well through a year of depression.

Japanese Debt.

The talk of converting the external debt of Japan into 3½ per cent. is mere bombast; but I hear on good authority that the Japanese Government is conferring with international houses as to the possibility of a general conversion into 4 per cents. This may be feasible, and the pressure of taxation in Japan is so heavy that a reduction in the debt charge must be earnestly desired. The Government is to be congratulated upon its efforts during the past year, which stand out in sharp contrast to the loan-mongering finance of Germany and Russia. On the other hand, one is sorry to learn from Tokio that a corrupt movement among powerful Japanese financiers for a higher protective tariff on trust products is in active progress.

The Boom in Rhodesians.

Kaffirs and Rhodesians have not been quite as excited this week as they were last, but they still remain the most active market in the House, and it is not clear that the boom has yet spent itself. Why at this particular moment the public should have turned its attention to Chartereds, it is difficult to say, but for some time people have been growing more cheerful about the position in Rhodesia, and when feeling about Rhodesia grows cheerful we are always within measurable distance of a boom. The curse of the country throughout has been its close connection with the gambling public in London, and the enormous losses suffered by Englishmen in the past over Chartered shares must create a prejudice and hinder legitimate development in the future. The avowed reason for the present rise is that things are looking up; the railways are doing better; the mines are turning out more gold; the revenue in Southern Rhodesia is improving. But the real reason is that a certain number of speculators have decided that they have a chance of making money over a deal. The price of Chartereds was run up in about ten days from 17s. 6d. to 25s., and the second debentures, which carry an option on ordinary shares at par, rose simultaneously. These are the debentures that resulted from the company's difficulty in raising money last year. With its shares standing at under 15s., clearly it could not issue more shares in the ordinary way, so the directors offered shares at par with an option. This scheme broke down, and it could scarcely have done otherwise, for the whole value of the option depended on the market quotation going up to par, and any one who thought the rise probable could do better by buying at 14s. or 15s. The plan, therefore, was withdrawn and the option-carrying debentures substituted; they raised a certain amount of money and have risen this week to a premium of 23 per cent. To show the rise that has taken place in Rhodesians generally this year, I append a table giving a few prices:—

| | Dec. 31st. | | This week. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Chartered ... ... ... ... ... ... | 16/3 | ... | 24/0 |
| Globe and Phœnix ... ... ... ... ... | 1 | ... | 3 1-8 |
| Lomagunda Development ... ... ... ... | 7/6 | ... | 10/6 |
| Tanganyika Concessions ... ... ... ... | 3 7-8 | ... | 4 5-8 |
| Eldorado Banket ... ... ... ... ... | 3¼ | ... | 3 9-16 |

He would be a bold man who advised the purchase of Chartereds at 25s. for investment purposes.

Lucellum.

BENGER'S

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

THE LEGAL Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON,
Goldsmiths College (Training Department).

LECTURER IN ENGLISH.

A LECTURER (MAN) in English Language and Literature will be needed in the above Department in September, 1909. Initial salary between £180 and £250 according to attainments and experience.

Applications should be received by June 9th. Full particulars can be obtained from The Warden, Goldsmiths College, New Cross, S.E.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle, Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Modern Methods, e.g., Systematic Training in Science; practical outdoor work for younger boys.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13 Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5,053, Central

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C

ONE & ALL SEEDS.

The Brand Guarantees One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure and guaranteed. They are supplied in sealed packets:—1d., 3d., and 6d. each.
Each packet bears the Trade Mark, "One & All," in a garter.
Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

One & All Half-Crown Collection of 10 Asters.
One & All Five Shilling Collection of 10 Stocks
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Annuals.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Perennials and Biennials.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Salading Seeds.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetable Seeds.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Sweet Peas.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete manures.

ONE & ALL FERTILISER No. 24, for Vegetables and General Garden Purposes:—Half-Rod Packets 6d.; Bags: 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/-. Carriage paid.

ONE & ALL is the Registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED, Mutual Society founded in 1867 to ensure purity of supply. Name and Address of nearest local agent, catalogues, and other details, post free on application to

Edwd Owen Greening
Managing Director.

Wholesale Seed Warehouses,
92, LONG ACRE,
LONDON, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout. Bathrooms on every Floor.

Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 " ... ... 6d. "

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE

Crown Theological Library.

In matters of religion the man of to-day is no longer satisfied with the statements about it which have been handed down to him from the past. He wants a religious literature which will deal with modern difficulties; he wants books which are really abreast of all that is best in modern research and thought.

The Crown Theological Library has been instituted to meet this pressing need.

The late Dr. MARCUS DODS.—"By introducing to the English-speaking public specimens of the work of such outstanding critics and theologians, your 'Crown' has done a wonderful service to theological learning in this country."

DR. HARNACK'S NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES

Ready. Vol. 1. Crown 8vo. Second Edition. 6s.
LUKE THE PHYSICAN: Author of the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles.
By ADOLF HARNACK.

Ready. Vol. 2. Cloth, 6s.
THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.
By ADOLF HARNACK.

Ready. Vol. 3. 6s.
THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Second Edition now ready. 5s.
THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.
By RUDOLF EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy, Jena.

Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
NATURALISM & RELIGION.
By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology at Gottingen.

Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth 4s. 6d.
THE RELIGION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.
By KARL MARTI.

Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s.
THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST.
By Dr. PAUL LOBSTEIN.

Ready. Cloth, 5s.
THE COMMUNION OF THE CHRISTIAN WITH GOD.
By Prof. W. HERRMANN.

Crown 8vo, 5s.
WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?
By ADOLF HARNACK, Professor of Church History in the University, Berlin.

Write for Complete List of Volumes.

Ready. Demy 8vo, 336 pages, 6s. net.
MAN AND THE BIBLE: A REVIEW OF THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE IN HUMAN HISTORY. By J. ALLANSON PICTON, M.A. (Lond.), Author of "The Mystery of Matter," "The Religion of the Universe," &c., &c.

"It is delightful to recognise the mental grasp, the wide-ranging and accurate scholarship, and the trenchant vigour of style which characterise this volume."—Christian World.

New Edition Ready, entirely Reset, with much New Matter and Maps.
THE MISSION AND EXPANSION OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES. By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin. Translated and Edited by Rev. JAS. MOFFAT, D.D. In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo, cloth, 25s. net.

Ready next week. Demy 8vo, cloth 10s. 6d. net.
PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.—Vol. II. Historical Books.
By the late OTTO PFLEIDERER (Berlin).

Ready May 27. Crown 8vo, cloth 2s. 6d. net. 2s. 9d. post free.
THE GENESIS AND EVOLUTION OF THE INDIVIDUAL SOUL.
By Rev. J. O. BEVAN, M.A., F.G.S., &c.

Ready early in June. 500 pp., 5s. net.
THE GOSPEL OF RIGHTNESS: A Study in Pauline Philosophy.
By C. E. WOODS.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"Extremely Interesting Volumes."—Spectator.
REDUCED EDITION, JUST READY.
2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net; 13s. 6d. post free.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY BY HERBERT SPENCER.

"It is the work of a man who devoted his life to high and disinterested aims, and accomplished a task to which no parallel can be found in the history of English thought."
—Times.

A SYSTEM OF SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY.

| | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|
| FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular Re-issue now ready | 7 | 6 |
| PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 Vols. (Revised and Enlarged) ... ... ... | 36 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 Vols. | 36 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I. ... | 21 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. II.... | 18 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. III. | 16 | 0 |
| PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I. ... | 15 | 0 |
| Ditto Vol. II. ... | 12 | 6 |
| JUSTICE (Separately) ... ... ... | 6 | 0 |

JUST READY.
Uniform with New Edition of "First Principles." Entirely reset. Cloth, 3s. net.

THE DATA OF ETHICS.

OTHER WORKS.

| | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|
| THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY ... ... | 10 | 6 |
| EDUCATION (Cheap Edition) ... ... | 2 | 6 |
| ESSAYS. 3 Vols. ... 30s. (or each Vol 10s.) | | |
| FACTS AND COMMENTS ... ... ... | 6 | 0 |
| VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition | 6 | 0 |
| SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE | 10 | 0 |
| MAN v. STATE (Separately) ... ... | 1 | 0 |
| AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions... ... | 0 | 3 |

DIGEST OF MR. HERBERT SPENCER'S WORKS.
Fifth and Enlarged Edition. The Philosophy completed, now ready. 8vo, cloth, price 21s.

EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER.
By F. HOWARD COLLINS.
With a Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

THE RELIGIONS OF AUTHORITY AND THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT.

By the late AUGUSTE SABATIEN, Professor of the University of Paris. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF THE HEBREWS.

By Professor R. KITTEL, Ordinary Professor of Theology in the University of Breslau. 2 Vols. 10s. 6d. per Vol.

APRIL NUMBER READY. 2s. 9d. post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

Yearly Subscription commencing with any number 10s. post free.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF APRIL NUMBER:

CREDO.
IS THERE A COMMON CHRISTIANITY? Professor J. H. MUIRHEAD.
CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE RELIGIONS. JOHN WRIGHT BUCKHAM, D.D.
ISLAM, THE RELIGION OF COMMON SENSE. IBN ISHAK.
THE MESSAGE OF MR. G. K. CHESTERTON. Rev. JOHN A. HUTTON, M.A.
THE PHILOSOPHY OF BERGSON. Professor WILLIAM JAMES.
THE SOCIAL CONSCIENCE OF THE FUTURE. II.—THE NEW RIGHTEOUSNESS. Miss VIDA SCUDDER.
THE INSUFFICIENCY OF SOCIAL RIGHTEOUSNESS AS A MORAL IDEAL. Rev. P. T. FORSYTH, D.D.
THE OVER-EMPHASIS OF SIN. Rev. ALEXANDER BROWN.
THE MESSAGE OF MODERN MATHEMATICS TO THEOLOGY. Professor CASSIUS J. KEYSER, Ph.D.
CHRISTIANITY AND THE EMPIRE IN CHINA. Rev. P. J. MACLAGAN, M.A., D.Phil.
DIVERGENCES BETWEEN MATTHEW AND MARK. Rev. B. H. ALFORD, M.A.
ON THE DISLOCATIONS IN ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL. Rev. F. J. PAUL.

With a Number of Discussions, Signed Reviews, and Bibliography of Recent Theological and Philosophical Literature.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 9.] SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 297 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| Common Sense on the Navy | 300 |
| Insurance and Unemployment | 301 |
| Russia's Disloyalty in Persia | 302 |
| The "Writing" of a Protectionist Tariff | 303 |
| The Charge of Westminster Abbey | 304 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| The Consolations of Science | 305 |
| The Spirit of Empire | 306 |
| Full-blown Summer | 308 |
| Short Studies:— | |
| Keeping a Book-shop. By Joseph Clayton | 309 |
| Present-day Problems:— | |
| The Incorrigible Censor | 310 |
| An Academic View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto.—III. By Dr. Hastings Rashdall | 311 |
| Art:— | |
| Sculpture at the Royal Academy | 312 |
| Communications:— | |
| The Carrying of the Colors. By An Old War Correspondent | 313 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| George Meredith and the Abbey. By C. S. | 314 |
| Fox and Patriotism. By J. L. Hammond | 314 |
| Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies. By Insurance Manager | 314 |
| The Cause of the Liberal Set-back. By D. P. Coulton | 315 |
| A Question of Ideals. By Immo S. Allen | 315 |
| Inequalities of the Income Tax. By Income-Tax Reformer | 315 |
| "The Break-up of the Poor Law." By Mrs. C. D. Rackham | 316 |
| The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By Leyton Richards, Richard Mudie-Smith, and X. Y. Z. | 316 |
| "To Vindicate Leigh Hunt." By R. H. B. | 317 |
| Poetry:— | |
| The Way of Life. By St. John G. Ervine | 317 |
| The World of Books | 318 |
| Books to be read | 318 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The Overplus of Wealth | 319 |
| The Stage in the Past | 320 |
| The Mansfield School | 322 |
| Savages | 324 |
| Cautionary Tales | 324 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 328 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

An important debate on the Two-Power standard took place in the House of Commons on Wednesday on a motion of Captain Craig, which aimed at pinning the Government down to maintaining a naval preponderance of ten per cent. over the combined strengths in capital ships of the two next strongest Powers, wherever they might be. The motion was rejected and a resolution of confidence carried by 272 to 106 votes. The Prime Minister's statement was very satisfactory to his party. It was, in fact, a rejection of the purely arithmetical statement of the Two-Power formula and a reversion to his own and Sir Edward Grey's earlier declarations that it was enough for us to build against "a reasonably possible combination of hostile Powers." The Two-Power standard, he insisted, was not a precept of the Decalogue, but a "rule-of-thumb," to be used with discretion.

* * *

Thus, regard must be had to geographical conditions, e.g., to the distance from ourselves of the naval bases of a Power like the United States. In other words, fleets must be counted, not by the noses of their ships, but by their "effective strength" at the scene of action. The Opposition grumbled greatly at these limitations, Mr. Lee complaining of the "exception" of America, with which, however, he "thanked God" we were never going to fight. Mr. Balfour complained that the Prime Minister had "qualified" and "obscured" his earlier readings of the old formula without adopting a new one, such as that this country should have a Navy twice as powerful as that of the next strongest single Power—i.e., Germany. But the whole debate was unreal, for Mr. McKenna showed that Mr. Balfour's Government had introduced more qualifications into their reading of the Two-Power standard than the Prime Minister. No Tory Government can afford either to lay down two keels to Germany's one, or to build ships of the line against Germany and the United States combined, plus ten per cent.

* * *

The debate on the Report of the Budget resolutions was set in a somewhat minor key. The Irish Nationalists have bitterly upbraided the Chancellor on account of the Irish share in the new spirit and tobacco taxes, and have asked for a rebate on the latter, which Mr. Lloyd George has firmly refused. He and Mr. Cox both pointed out that the growing Irish tobacco industry is already State-fed. The criticism on the whisky taxes did not show an embittered opposition from the trade. The chief point was that the Chancellor had greatly under-budgetted for the receipts, which might run to nine or ten millions instead of £1,600,000. Mr. Lloyd George's most interesting point was the calculation that the distillers would make four millions out of the tax of £1,600,000, on which Mr. Balfour's criticism was that this was an endowment of the trade, and at the same time a selective tax on some of the poorest people in Scotland and Ireland. The Chancellor was putting on a duty which would not be paid this year, and would not be wanted next. Most of this criticism was lightly and good-humoredly phrased. The Opposition have decided, contrary to the precedent of 1907 and 1908, to meet the second reading of the Bill with a simple motion of rejection in place of a reasoned amendment calling for Protection. Apparently the Opposition do not wish to argue the alternative between Mr. Lloyd George's proposals and a "bread and cheese" Budget.

* * *

The Prime Minister made a broad popular defence of the Budget at Sheffield on Friday week. He insisted that it carried out the two governing principles on which he financed Old Age Pensions—first, that the cost should be shared by all classes of the community, and, secondly, that it should not fall on "prime necessaries." The distribution had been quite fair as between property and the consumer. The first had been taxed to the tune of about £6,850,000, the second to the extent of about £6,100,000. Financial scaremongering looked foolish in view of the fact that the wealth of the country was continually increasing. Ten years had seen an addition to its income of 300 millions, and the last three years of 100 millions. Tariff Reform, the only substitute for the Budget, meant the taxation of "bread and cheese," and the fostering of industries at the taxpayers' expense. The Government were taking "unearned increment" for the community which created it; the Protectionists would take it from its parent, the community, and put it into private pockets.

* * *

The adjournment of the House of Commons for the Whitsun holiday was prefaced by the usual perfunctory and wandering talk on foreign affairs. It was less criticism than a hunt for information. Sir Charles Dilke, who opened it, properly pressed for a full reference of the South African Union Act to Parliament, and Mr. Alfred Lyttelton italicised this point by calling on the Imperial Government not to forget its responsibilities to Basutoland. Sir Charles also thought that Sir Edward Grey's March speech had set up an attack of nervousness in Europe, and hoped that we should not be backward in withdrawing, with the rest of the occupying Powers, from Crete. Mr. Lynch thought that Russian doings in Persia were contrary to the Constitution, and that the granting of the loan to the Shah without the consent of Parliament directly violated it. Mr. McNeill suggested that Parliament was, if anything, losing its control over foreign policy and the treaty-making power—e.g., both the Anglo-Japanese Treaty (1905) and the Anglo-Russian Agreement on Persia and Afghanistan (1907) were deliberately withheld from it. Mr. Bennett thought that our limit of endurance of Congo atrocities had been reached, and that we ought to force reform by blockading the mouth of the Congo and occupying the custom-house at Boma.

* * *

Sir Edward Grey's reply covered all these points but that of Persia, which was raised in a later speech. His tone was neutral and guarded. He denied that Europe was unduly nervous, and if it was, its tremors sprang not from too little but too much debate of international affairs. His reports as to forced labor on the Congo were bad; but a British blockade of an international highway was impossible, for it would mean stopping German and French as well as Belgian ships. He was preparing representations to the Belgian Government. As to Crete, all the Powers were agreed on withdrawal, and we were no more backward than others, but he hinted that the question of union was quite unsettled. He could not alter the Constitution and transfer the treaty-making power from the Crown to Parliament. But the delay in presenting the Russian agreement was unavoidable and unintentional.—Speaking on Africa, Colonel Seely promised Sir Charles Dilke a full reference to Parliament of the South African Act of Union, and Mr. McKinnon Wood, dealing with Persia, said that the Russian loan was only a little one, and therefore pardonable, and that the Russian troops in Tabriz would be withdrawn as soon as a Governor had been appointed.

* * *

The Anglo-German exchanges of courtesies go on in spite of the ill-nature and stupidity of a section of the Press in both countries, and the failure to arrive at a political appeasement. Our latest visitors are thirty members of the Berlin municipality, who entertained the King, headed by the Ober-Bürgermeister and the Bürgermeister. They have been pleasantly received by the King at Buckingham Palace, banqueted at the Guildhall, and shown the sights. Herr Cassell said that Germany had no envy of our naval power, and that a German invasion of Great Britain would be "insensate and criminal." On the other hand, the tone of the German Press, in discussing the "scare-ship" folly, has been seriously critical, and the incident has, of course, been used by the Jingoes as a fresh argument for German naval enlargement.

* * *

Parliament has been repeatedly disturbed during the week by the incursion of the private scandals which distract naval administration. The opponents of Sir John Fisher have contrived to elicit the fact that three years ago he printed and to some extent circulated imprudent letters written by Captain Bacon on fleet organisation, which contained contemptuous references to Mr. Bellairs. This fact has now been attested by the publication, through Sir George Armstrong, of a letter to Sir John Fisher from Admiral Mann, on the retired list. This letter showed that Sir John had sent at least one of the Bacon letters to this Admiral, who returned it, saying: "I agree with every word, and am glad to think Beresford and Lambton have not poisoned his mind." The impropriety and, indeed, the malice, of printing such a letter are obvious. Mr. McKenna is, of course, not to blame, for the incident is three years old. But we cannot but think that these communications, and the way in which Sir John Fisher treated them, are evidence that a spirit of bitter personal rivalry has long reigned at the Admiralty, even if they do not show that Sir John Fisher used inferior officers to report on their superiors. Mr. McKenna has apologised for Sir John's indiscretion, and has covered him with a most handsome tribute to his services. But it seems to us a grave question whether this excuses his handling of the two subjects of discipline and "Dreadnoughts."

* * *

The news from Persia is grave. Russia has arranged to give the Shah a loan of £100,000, and Mr. McKinnon Wood suggests that, despite Sir Edward Grey's pledge "not to consent to any advance unless approved by an elected Assembly," the Russian loan has our approval. But it violates Article 25 of the Fundamental Law of 1906, the earlier and less Liberal form of the Persian Constitution. The money is nominally to be spent in disbanding soldiers and paying arrears of diplomatic wages; but the expenditure is to be supervised only by a Russian official, and there is more than a suspicion that it is really to be directed against the constitutionalists. Meanwhile, though the British bluejackets have been withdrawn from Bushire, the Russians remain at Tabriz, and are so much at home there that General Sharski has arrested Satar Khan. The Russian reactionaries, who now have the Government completely under their thumb, are clamoring for the occupation of the whole of Northern Persia.

* * *

Empire Day fell on Monday, and was celebrated by about 18,000 schools in the kingdom. Mr. Chamberlain marked it by writing a letter for the Empire Supplement of the "Times." His theme was that this was "the day of Empires," and that these new "great aggregations of humanity," and especially those of British folk, must be built both on common defence and on commercial union, with political union to follow. The British Empire now counted a population of fifty million souls, increasingly inclined not merely to talk but to act as one body. He thought this new factor would involve an entire change in our public life and its objects.

* * *

On Saturday the Hague tribunal published its decision in the Casablanca dispute of last year, which, with the assistance of busybodies, looked like setting France and Germany at one another's throats. The Court found that the French military occupation gave the French authorities a jurisdiction over German subjects in the French army, overriding the jurisdiction of the German consul. The German Consulate was not entitled to grant protection to German deserters from the Foreign Legion, and the Secretary to the German Consulate committed a grave and manifest error in trying to embark non-German deserters. On the other hand the French officials were wrong in menacing the Secretary with a revolver and in beating his servant. In other words, there was error on both sides. On the German side illegality and on the French unjustifiable violence. That is the decision which most plain men would have come to, and it is therefore satisfactory to note that it is welcomed by both the German and the French press. The "North German Gazette" finds it entirely satisfactory, and says that the immediate consequence of the award will be an interchange of expressions of regret between the two Governments, in which Germany will most readily perform her part. The episode should strengthen the prestige of the Hague Tribunal.

* * *

The Commonwealth Labor Ministry, led by Mr. Fisher, is doomed. Mr. Deakin has managed to scrape together an alliance with the two opposing groups, led by Mr. Cook and Sir John Forrest. Mr. Cook succeeded Mr. Read as chief of the anti-Socialist Liberals, who are Free Traders, and stand for State Rights and property, and are against compulsory military training. Mr. Deakin is an ardent Protectionist, he is a Federalist, and he is for military training; in fact, the only point he seems to have in common with his allies is a desire to turn the Labor Party out of office, while the Labor Cabinet has been putting forward Mr. Deakin's own programme, and even, in its advocacy of a Federal land tax to encourage closer settlement, hardly quarrels with Mr. Deakin. The compact between Mr. Deakin and Mr. Cook consists in Mr. Cook "accepting" Mr. Deakin's programme, on condition that Mr. Deakin postpones its execution indefinitely, an arrangement which is so unnatural that it cannot endure, and has already led to the secession from Mr. Deakin's party of four members, including Sir William Lyne. An early dissolution is inevitable, but apparently the allies will be satisfied if they are allowed to run the elections, and to prevent the Labor Ministry nominating the High Commissioner and the delegates to the Naval Conference.

* * *

The Reichstag has been given a long vacation in order to enable the Finance Reform Committee to find a way out of the mess. The Committee, so far, has not effected much, and its activity has been devoted to indirect taxation on tobacco and coffee. The crux of the situation is political rather than financial. The Centre and the Conservatives have the game in their hands, and they are tacking about until the Government makes up its mind to let the bloc go and take what the Centre and the Conservatives are willing to offer. The Centre apparently is not inclined to be hard on Prince Bülow, and probably the Liberals and Radicals, who have an unlimited talent for selling their principles, will in the long run submit to the return of the Centre to authority. It is pretty generally understood that in any case the new taxation will not be on the elaborate scale the Government hoped for, and the health of the Imperial finances require. The Government will have to whistle for part of the £25,000,000 of new revenue it asked for.

* * *

The General Elections in Denmark took place on Tuesday, and the chief issue was the project for an elaborate scheme of land defence for Copenhagen, submitted by M. Neergard, the Premier. The Premier had behind him at the dissolution the Conservatives and a section of the Liberals—in all, thirty-eight members out of a House of 114. Against him were the advanced Radicals and the Socialists, who think that no scheme of defences can protect Denmark against Germany, or do anything except waste money, and the major portion of the Liberals, led by M. Christensen, the ex-Premier, who think the Neergard scheme much too elaborate and costly. The country seems, on the whole, to have pronounced against M. Neergard. M. Christensen's party lost rather heavily, but the Socialists, who were expected to suffer, held their own, and the advanced Radicals gained six seats. The Conservatives won nine seats, but M. Neergard's following, on the whole, seems to have made no advance, although it is thought that the Premier may possibly stay in office as the result of a compromise with M. Christensen.

* * *

The refusal of the Lord Chamberlain's office, acting through the Examiner of Plays, to license Mr. Bernard Shaw's new play, "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet," on grounds which we explain elsewhere, has produced an interesting declaration from the Prime Minister. Mr. Robert Harcourt is promoting a Bill for the abolition of the Censorship. On Wednesday he offered to let it pass for the Session if the Government would appoint a Select Committee to examine it. Mr. Asquith made a very sympathetic reply. The matter, he said, was a very important one, and was receiving careful consideration. He would not promise any definite procedure with regard to Mr. Harcourt's Bill, but agreed with him that the time had come for inquiry. We shall hope to see this pledge fulfilled, and we are sure that it must decree the abolition of the Censorship. We have reason to believe that the matter has been debated by the Cabinet, and that a decision will shortly be announced.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes: "The division of opinion between the revolutionary and 'reformist' parties in the Confédération Générale du Travail has reached a crisis, and a schism would seem to be almost inevitable. It will be remembered that two days before the decision in favor of a general strike, which proved to be abortive, M. Niel, the general secretary of the Confederation, made a speech to the Miners' Congress at Lens in which he declared that the proletariat was not sufficiently organised to make a general strike possible, and condemned the policy of 'bluff.' Subsequent events have justified M. Niel, but the revolutionary party on the Executive of the Confederation demanded a meeting to consider his speech, which was held on Tuesday, and adjourned until Wednesday. Two resolutions censuring M. Niel were proposed and, after a brilliant defence of his action, which won tributes even from his opponents, M. Niel demanded the previous question, which was defeated by 60 votes against 36, and seven abstentions. The minority represented a large majority of the federated trade unionists. This vote was immediately followed by the resignation of M. Niel and of the assistant-secretary, M. Thil, and the meeting broke up in confusion. It is possible that the result will be the formation by the 'reformists' of a new confederation which would include all the great trade unions, and would, no doubt, be organised on the principle of proportional representation."

* * *

The King's colt, Minoru, won the Derby on Wednesday, by a short head, after an exciting race with Louviers. As Prince of Wales the King won the Derby twice, following in this respect George IV., who, as Prince Regent, won it once. But there is no precedent for a victory at the great Epsom race of a reigning Sovereign, and the English passion for sporting "records" seems to have combined with the King's personal popularity to bring about a scene of wild enthusiasm. The King descended from the Royal Stand and, plunging into a madly cheering crowd on the course, led his horse to the weighing-room.

Politics and Affairs.

COMMON SENSE ON THE NAVY.

The Liberal Party is now able to set a proper value on the attempt of the Opposition both to dictate the naval policy of the country and to prescribe and define the formula which expresses it. On neither point, we think, have they given the nation any reason to respect either their motives or their judgment. The cry of "Eight 'Dreadnoughts,' won't wait," was, at its best, an incitement to the Government to act without knowledge, and to build without necessity. At its worst, it was a piece of party claptrap, a cry for a wind to fill the idle sails of the Tory barque. When the people tried to find the actual degree of public spirit behind it, they soon discovered that the politicians who "would not wait" "would not pay" either. Having, by these high-minded and disinterested proceedings, discredited both their siege of the Admiralty and their assault on the Budget, they can hardly expect the Government or the Ministerial Party to pay much heed to their demand that the two-Power standard shall be construed so as to lay an intolerable burden not only on this Government but on every Administration that succeeds it. The manœuvre was fairly turned by the Prime Minister on Wednesday night, and the Government at last stand in a clear and sound relationship to the naval problem. But if they have secured themselves from a dangerous and irrational interpretation of the "two-Power" formula, it would be a great mistake to suppose that they have done more than shake themselves free from a trap, least of all that they have made any new or specially minimising declaration on our standard of naval strength. Mr. McKenna's brilliant speech showed in the clearest possible way that the mechanical interpretation of the two-Power standard, which Mr. Lee tried to force on the Prime Minister, was opposed to the most authoritative Unionist definitions of it. Mr. Lee did last autumn induce Mr. Asquith to say, in one of those moments of incaution to which the most alert Parliamentarian is liable, that we were bound to build not merely against a reasonable and probable combination of naval force, but against the next two strongest Powers, "whatever they may be and wherever they may be situated"—in other words, against the full united strength of the German and American Fleets. It would perhaps be enough to remark that a Tory Government, no more than a Liberal Government, would venture to set the British taxpayer any such ruinous task. But the point is that the "arithmetical" formula which Mr. Lee put upon Mr. Asquith was rejected by Mr. Lee's own Government, and by its Unionist predecessor. Lord Goschen, for example, insisted in 1898 that in reckoning the strength of hostile fleets in alliance, we must put to our credit the two great advantages of "homogeneity of construction" and "unity of command." This is one deduction. Six years later Lord Selborne made another and a still more important one. He insisted that we must take account of the disposition as well as of the armament of foreign Powers, and that we should aim at a strength which offered a "reasonable probability of victory," and not at a "mere arithmetical computation." In other words, the Unionists when in power were compelled to make just the same moral and political and rational deductions from their naval formula as their Liberal successors have now made. To add to the confusion of the opposing measurement of force, we had Mr. Lee denouncing in one breath Mr. Asquith's "exception" of the United States, and in the next "refusing to believe" that "in any circumstances" we should ever go to war with her. Could there be a clearer confession that the two-Power standard is a mere stalking horse for the advance of the anti-German campaign? There is no naval combination against us. There never has been since the French entente or the Russo-Japanese War. There is the Anglo-German antagonism, and when we deal with that we must approach it in the spirit, not of the multiplication table, but of statesmanship.

The whole debate on Captain Craig's motion was full of evidence of the return of common sense to our estimates of naval responsibilities. The Prime Minister's speech, indeed, showed that, save so far as a very loose symbol of thought, the two-Power standard had no real existence. If, for example, we are to reckon America at all, we have to reckon her not as a unit of naval Power so much as a fraction of a unit, with so much deducted for the division of her fleet between two widely separated oceans, for the distance of her naval bases from us, for the absence of intervening coaling stations. In a word, nominal arithmetical strength is not the same thing as "effective" strength. Yes; but if we make these deductions, is it not as clear as daylight that we must make others; for example, that we must take account of the Monroe doctrine, which rules the United States out of one form of world-policy, and shuts her in to another? And on our side is it not equally futile to reckon merely ships of the line and not to include concentration of sea-power, seamanship, geographical position, discipline—somewhat to seek in these days of Sir John Fisher and Lord Charles Beresford—national character, and, above all, policy? For it is policy which in the last resort determines and moulds the force and structure of our fleets, as well as the rivalries and enmities against which they guard. An English Napoleon would not reckon his tale of ships on the same basis as a Gladstone. And, to come to the direct point of practice, does anyone suppose that if we had had a firm understanding with Germany during all these miserable years of abuse and bitterness, the naval programmes of the two countries would be rising by leaps and bounds, and we should have to pay—as we shall pay—in hard cash for our latest epileptic apparition of "scare-ships" in the air?

It is on this point that we make our one criticism of Mr. Asquith's satisfactory speech. The Prime Minister seemed inclined to drop the terribly mauled two-Power Standard for a kind of "All-risks Standard," the end of which, he said, was to "ensure this country under any conceivable conditions and against all possible hazards, an unassailable naval superiority which will give us complete command of the sea, and make—I will not say the invasion of these islands, but any attempt to interfere with any part of our Empire or with our ocean-borne commerce, an impossibility." This is a demand for absolute predominance and a quest of absolute security. But neither is possible. Security never existed in England, neither under Blake nor under Nelson. It existed least of all on the eve of the Armada, and it is clearly out of the question in times when science is a common heritage of the nations and when a perpetual race goes on for primacy in ocean trade. Risk belongs to life, till we die, and then, indeed, risk is over. The attempt to eliminate it from British naval policy will only lead our statesmen from alarm to alarm, from one wild form of expenditure to another. The safety of these islands does not lie in the process of adding up the totals of other peoples' ships and worrying ourselves periodically about the sum, or merely in the ships that we build ourselves; it lies in the character of our own people, and in the way they develop it on the lines of intellectual sanity and moral strength.

INSURANCE AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

The proposals announced or foreshadowed by Mr. Winston Churchill in his speeches in the House of Commons and at Manchester are the natural corollaries of the Budget. Mr. Lloyd George's object has been twofold. In the first place he had to raise money to meet obligations already incurred. In the second place he had to provide the sinews of war for a further campaign of social reform. The present Budget should leave him the happy disposer of a handsome surplus next year, and it is highly desirable that the methods of applying it to works of real social utility should be thought out in good time, or every penny of it will be pounced upon for forms of expenditure which are worse than wasteful. We are glad, therefore, to know that the Government are prepared with the general outline of a policy which we believe will command the hearty assent of the nation. They propose a direct attack on the economic grievance which sits closest to the minds of the working men—the anxiety, stress, and misery due to unemployment. The root cause of this evil is a matter on which economists are not agreed, and it may be that it is, under existing conditions, irremovable. But something may be done to mitigate its effects, and in this direction Mr. Churchill proposes to make a beginning. The national network of Labor Exchanges which he proposes to set up is advocated in both Reports of the Poor Law Commission. Of itself it will not, probably, carry us very far. But it will have the effect of abridging the period of search for work, and saving industrious workmen from the heart-breaking tramp from place to place in search of a job. It cannot create employment that does not exist, but let us remember that every day of idleness saved in bad times is a net addition to the well-being of the community. It means a day less of pinching for husband, wife, and children; it means that a piece of work gets put in hand a day sooner, and that money begins to flow into the local tradesmen's till and the stream of demand to pass therefrom back to the general dealer and producer a day earlier. It is a mitigation of friction and an avoidance of waste, and as such it is not to be despised.

Mr. Churchill, however, quite rightly sees that the Exchange, though valuable in itself, is much more valuable for the uses to which it may be put. For the main work of combating unemployment more direct measures are necessary. Of the measures recommended with this object in the Minority Report, three are of especial importance. The first of these is Insurance, the second is the proposal to plan public work on a ten years' scheme so as to balance increments of public expenditure against adverse fluctuations of ordinary trade, and in this connection to extend public enterprise in the direction of afforestation, road improvement, and other ways. The third is to set on foot systematic establishments for the educative employment of those who, after every effort has been made to find a place for them in the ordinary ranks of industry, still remain on the books of the public exchanges. The last of these can hardly be undertaken till the others are well afoot. The second is in part covered by Mr. George's development scheme and will, we hope, take more definite shape before the next session of Parliament is reached. The first is put before the public in outline now as part of the accepted policy of the Cabinet, and it remains only to thresh out the details and embody the scheme in an Act of Parliament.

Insurance against unemployment may, like the Labor Exchange, be regarded mainly as a palliative, but we incline to think that its claims may fairly be put somewhat higher. Economically we imagine that its collective adoption by the nation will have something of the same equalising effect as it secures to the individual. The individual whose work is well paid but irregular puts by, if he is wise, for an idle day and thereby maintains the general condition of his life stable and independent of heavy fluctuations. His expenditure and his means of living are equalised from year to year. It would seem that in proportion as the same habit is introduced into our national economy, analogous results should follow. Expenditure will be on a lower scale in the booms, and there will be more to spend in the bad times, and, if that is so, working class demand should be proportionately steadied, and the fall of trade should be broken. Instead of the failure of demand propagating itself from point to point, each man who is thrown out of work ceasing to consume as he ceased to produce, the insurance funds would come into operation and the stream of demand would continue to flow, while the return of work would find the worker less enfeebled and more ready to resume his normal place in industry. We look then to insurance, not, indeed, as a radical cure, but as a medicine operating on some of the more distressing symptoms of the disease and thereby rendering it easier for nature to assert her recuperative power.

There remains the difficult question of the best form of insurance. We take it that in making known the views of the Government some months before a Bill can be brought in, Mr. Churchill is practically inviting free discussion, and wishes to inform himself of the state of opinion. It is clear that any scheme of the kind, to be successful, must secure the hearty co-operation of the working-classes, while if employers are to be laid under contribution it must also in the main command their willing assent. Now substantially there are two schemes before us. One looks towards compulsion and contributions by the employer; the other to the voluntary efforts of trade unions and friendly societies, supported by a Government subsidy. The former has two manifest advantages. It can be made universal, and by bringing the employer into play it may be so adjusted as to make it his interest to avoid great fluctuations, and seek to organise his business on a more stable basis. If, for example, the contributions of the employer were determined actuarially by a computation of the risk of unemployment in his trade in a given district, there would be a tangible motive for keeping the level of unemployment as low as possible. If, on the other hand, the employer is to contribute a fixed sum per head of each employee for every week that he employs him, there is no such motive, and there is even a slight inducement to the employer to dismiss men earlier than he might otherwise do. The inducement is certainly very small, if we suppose the employers' contribution to be no more than twopence a week for each operative; but so far as it goes it is in the wrong direction. What is more difficult to understand is the method by which bonâ-fide unemployment will be defined. Presumably employers and employed will be taken into counsel together, but we can imagine considerable divergence of view on the question whether a given piece of work offered upon given conditions is one which an unemployed workman ought or ought not to accept, and if a public official is ultimately relied on to settle the question, and thereby decide whether the recusant may justly continue to receive benefit or not, he will have a rather difficult decision to make. That consideration had, we confess, led us, with the Minority of the Commissioners, rather to prefer the Ghent system, which leaves the whole responsibility to organisations of the workmen themselves. The question will, we hope, be very carefully examined by the trade unions, and by representative employers, before the Government proposals take their final shape. But whatever doubt we may have concerns the means, not the end. The plan of insurance is a great and beneficent idea, and its adoption marks a new departure in social legislation, worthy to be ranked with the institution of Old Age Pensions, and opening out a new period in the dealings of the Government with the problems of poverty and of labor.

RUSSIA'S DISLOYALTY IN PERSIA.

One's ally is always in the right, until he becomes so flagrantly in the wrong that he must cease to be an ally. That, we suppose, is the principle which explains the attitude of our Foreign Office in putting forward faint apologies, backed by unconvincing assurances, in reply to the members who question it about Russia's action in Persia. The whole trend of Russian policy is doubtless as obvious to Sir Edward Grey as it is to us, and to the Russians themselves. For it is not we, avowed critics of the Agreement from the beginning and sceptics who doubt whether any good can come to Persia from an unreformed bureaucracy which is crushing the life of its own people, who are the first to throw doubt on Russian loyalty. The avowals that Russian policy is disloyal, the incitements that it should be more disloyal still, come from the Governmental Press in Russia itself. The "Novoe Vremya" has been for some weeks conducting a campaign, both through its leading articles and its Persian correspondence, to convince the Russian public that the time has come at last to realise the long-cherished aims of Russian policy, by absorbing Persia once for all. We have before us pages of extracts from its columns, whose tendency is so clear that we need hardly trouble to prove a charge which the "Novoe Vremya" would be the last to deny. Even more significant is the attitude of the moderate Liberal "Slovo," which says that Russia, after occupying Teheran, must go on to occupy Ispahan, and, in short, carry out "a military occupation of Persia, involving the assumption of the administration of the country." Such are the ends which Russian newspapers, constantly in touch with one or other of the rival cliques and the rival press-bureaux at the Foreign Office, openly profess.

Let us now see what has actually been done. Russian troops are already in possession of all the more important centres in Northern Persia, and at Tabriz they have concentrated a force more than sufficient for the conquest of the whole country. They went to Tabriz ostensibly to carry food to the Europeans in the besieged town. On that pretext they have apparently assumed the administration of the whole province of Azerbaijan, and are acting, as a Russian paper puts it, "as if Persia were a Russian province, in which martial law has been proclaimed." They are demolishing the Nationalist defences, disarming the population, and at last, as a St. Petersburg telegram reports, they have even "detained," or arrested, the Nationalist General, Sattar Khan, a soldier who displayed a gallantry rare among the unwarlike Persians, and scrupulously respected European lives and property. There is no immediate prospect of the occupation coming to an end. Two thirds of their army, we are told, may be withdrawn when the Shah appoints an acceptable governor of Tabriz; but the third, which will still remain, is quite sufficient to control the place. Meanwhile Russia has granted a loan to the Shah, which he will use to pay his troops, and with the loan there will be enforced a partial control of Persian finances by two Russian officials and a Frenchman. Yet it was only in February that Sir Edward Grey announced that we should refuse "any advance" to the Shah "unless approved by an elected Assembly," and went on to add that "there is no difference in principle between the British and Russian Governments as to the objects and conditions that should be kept in view." Not for the first time Russian practice conflicts with Sir Edward Grey's principles. The Persian Parliament, if it meets at all, will find its deliberations governed by these vital facts —that the Shah's Cossacks in Teheran are still commanded by the Russian officers who bombarded the first Mejliss, that the loyalty of the Shah's troops will have been refreshed by the payment of their long-deferred wages, that the Nationalists in their chief centre have been disarmed and their leader "detained," that all the roads and strategical centres are in the possession of Russian troops, and finally, that the Shah, without their consent, has become the debtor of Russia, and accepted a Russian financial control. To summon a Parliament in such conditions is a farce. The Shah is still master of the situation, and the Russians are the masters of the Shah.

It is improbable that Sir Edward Grey approves of these stealthy encroachments by our Russian partner. If we had all the documents before us we should doubtless find him protesting at each fresh step. Two sets of considerations govern our policy in Persia. Our first thoughts are dictated by the merits of the question. As Liberals we do not wish to see Persian liberties destroyed; as normally humane persons we do not wish to extend the area of Russian martial law; as the rulers of India we do not wish to see a buffer State absorbed. On all these grounds we invariably offer a certain halting resistance to the Russian advance. On other and more imperious grounds we refuse to carry that resistance beyond a private and verbal protest. For we have to recognise that there is nothing permanent and inevitable in the Anglo-Russian rapprochement. It is an opportunist policy, adopted to gain certain ends, by one school only of Russian statesmen. Other ends may at any moment seem more vital even to them, and other combinations more useful. If we cease to support the Stolypin-Isvolsky Cabinet, there is little doubt that it will be replaced by an even more violently reactionary team, under such men as MM. Goremykin, Durnovo, or Witte, who would lose no time in joining the German group of Powers. The change, in all likelihood, cannot be long delayed, and, even as things are, M. Stolypin retains office only by incessant concessions to the extreme reaction. Russia, in short, is subjecting us to a species of diplomatic blackmail. Some Powers make good bargains for themselves because they are known to be strong, solvent, and loyal. Russia trades with consummate skill on her own weaknesses. She keeps her hold on the French investor not because her finances are sound, but because a breach would precipitate sheer bankruptcy. She derives the maximum of advantage from her partnership with us, not because she is loyal to her agreements, but because we know she is ready at any moment to join the camp of our European rivals. It is the triumph of a cynical opportunism. The price to us of our bargain will be not only the independence of Persia, but our good name and our prestige throughout the East. And when the episode is over, Persia absorbed, and our Indian problem once more complicated by military anxieties, there is no security that we shall retain Russian goodwill.

For our part we have never appreciated the advantages of the Russian connection. It was premature, and dangerous because it was premature. It has aggravated our rivalry with Germany, and weakened our position by extending our front, no less than by admitting to our combinations a feeble and unreliable partner. To-day when the price is so clearly to be the liberty and independence of a nation whose future we have guaranteed, honor and policy alike dictate a firm attitude. If we allow ourselves to be blackmailed, the future of the partnership will repeat its past. There comes a point where mere self-respect has a place even in diplomacy. To surrender Persia, whose Constitutional party we have assisted, and whose independence we have guaranteed, would be a dishonor for which the transient and contemptuous gratitude of the Russian reaction would be small compensation.

THE "WRITING" OF A PROTECTIONIST TARIFF.

It is vital for students of Protectionist finance to keep their eyes on the very striking contrast between the procedure at Washington, under which a new tariff is being built up, and the criticism and conduct of our own Free Trade Budget. The process of fitting new burdens to the back of a modern industrial nation is always a difficult one. But in a Free Trade country, at least, the task is simplified by the fact that the real and the nominal end of a tax is in the main identical—that is to say that it takes something from individuals for the use of the State, and is not merely a crooked and roundabout, and usually a corrupt, device, arranged between statesmen and the wire-pullers of industry, to benefit certain favored interests. Mr. Balfour, with some assurance, considering his relations with the Protectionist party, made much on Monday of Mr. Lloyd George's statement that the liquor trade were making four millions out of taxes that only yielded £1,600,000 to the public purse. That is a regrettable result. But it will not be a permanent effect, and it was not the Chancellor's intention that it should arise at all. In Washington, on the other hand, we are witnessing the opposite process of an intended and devised sacrifice both of the consumer and of the State to manufacturing or monopoly interests. We have been studying the American press and its revelations of what the American politicians are capable of doing at the incubation of a tariff. A more naked exhibition of bribery and greed it would be impossible to imagine. At present the Payne Tariff Bill is being shaped by the Senate into the Aldrich Tariff Bill. The least corrupt section of the Senate, the so-called "Revisionists," are trying to obtain what Mr. Taft wanted—a substantial reduction of the tariff for the benefit of the ultimate consumer. There would be a strong enough body of revisionists to insure a real improvement in the Dingley Tariff but for the fact that several Democrats have been corrupted since the elections. Their secession from the Denver platform has revived John Allen's old saying that a political platform is like a railway car platform, to be used to "get in," and not to "stand on."

The attitude of the doubtful Senators has been closely canvassed by the skilful Washington correspondents of leading New York papers. Among the Republicans Senator Smith, of Michigan, believes that his party should revise the tariff downward, "but he may not be ugly about insisting on the point." Senators Bourne, of Oregon, and Jones, of Washington, would "probably be thorough-paced revisionists if they did not have lumber to protect." Senators Root, of New York, and Burton, of Ohio, are classified as revisionists because they are understood to represent the ideas of the President, and are disposed to be independent. Of the Democrats, Senator Bacon of Georgia wants protection for lumber, while his colleague, Senator Clay, would have it placed on the free list. There is a strong "lumber sentiment" in Alabama, which affects the Alabama Senators. Of the Democrats who are for protection with incidental revenue, those from Louisiana have sugar to look after, and are high protectionists on that article. Senators Fletcher and Taliaferro of Florida have citrus fruits and "Sea Island cotton" to guard, and seek high protective duties on these items. Senator Simmons of North Carolina, who helped to frame the free lumber plank in the Democratic national platform, is pleading for a restoration of the Dingley duty on that commodity. The special scandal of the Payne tariff was an enormous increase of the duty on gloves for the benefit of a millionaire glovemaker, Littauer by name, who owns Gloveville and has added to his acquisitions a considerable number of Congressmen. The scandal of the Aldrich Bill is that Senator Aldrich, who is understood to be interested in textiles, has actually raised the outrageously high rates upon woollens, worsteds, and cotton goods. The history of these schedules is one of the dirtiest chapters even in American tariff history, but it would take many columns to tell it. It is enough to say that the person who "wrote" the tariff on wool and "tops" and woollens and worsteds last time was lent by a woollen manufacturing company (which employed him) to Senator Aldrich and the Senatorial Committee!

The scenes which accompanied the work of revision are almost incredible to British eyes. A few weeks ago, while the Senate Bill was being concocted in the Committee, the corridor outside Senator Aldrich's suite of rooms in the Senate Office building was thronged with visitors. Manufacturers of high and low degree came in swarms. They did not wait to be summoned; they flocked to Mr. Aldrich voluntarily, and not at all like Nicodemus. They filled his ante-rooms, and finally, as an eye-witness has testified, rows of chairs had to be placed for them in the corridor. While this session lasted Mr. Aldrich's rooms presented one of the sights of Washington. Many of the visitors came in tow of their Senator. They paid no heed to what was going on in the House. All they asked was a chance to "see Aldrich." That very many of them did see him has been made apparent in the debates on the Bill. Probably the chairman of the Finance Committee was not asked by one of these eager manipulators (except the newspaper publishers, who asked for free wood pulp and print-paper) to reduce any of the present duties. Most of the manufacturers came to beg for increases of the Dingley rates. One of the men sitting in the hall waiting to see Senator Aldrich said to his neighbour (a journalist, as it chanced), whom he did not know: "I have got a duty of 65 per cent. on my line, and I control 85 per cent. of the business in this country. I am asking for 120 per cent., in the hope that I will get about 80. If I can get it, not a case of imported stuff can come into the United States to compete with us."

There were no "ultimate consumers," we are told, among the busy bees that clustered about the rooms of the Finance Committee. It remains to be seen whether the people whose outcry against the Dingley rates has brought Congress to this extra session, will be content with changes that do not affect prices. If a 40 per cent. rate on a given item is prohibitive, and the Dingley rate is 60 per cent., not much will be gained for the consumer by making the rate in the new law 50 per cent. Yet that is the sort of tariff reduction that seems to be contemplated. And the only difference between the present position and similar campaigns in the past is the bitterness of the press exposures and the rising tide of popular indignation against the tariff mongers.

> "There is simply no end to the cheats and stealings which examination shows to be hidden away in the Aldrich Bill (writes the "Evening Post.") One of the many examples given is the dishonest juggling with the duties on carbons for electric lighting. The present Dingley duty is 90 cents per 100 pieces. The Payne Bill changed this to 35 per cent. ad valorem. Then came Aldrich and made it a specific duty again of 70 cents. per 100 feet. Even the experts of the Finance Committee apparently did not notice the introduction of that word "feet," and in their comparative estimates wrote gravely that the existing duty is 46·79 per cent., while the Aldrich rate would be only 36·39—as if, in other words, there were a reduction from 90 to 70 cents. a hundred pieces. But what are the facts? Carbons are imported in two-foot lengths, so that the new duty would really be 1·40 dols. a hundred instead of the existing 90 cents."

Does anybody, asks our contemporary, suppose that this was an accident? Was it an accident that this deliberate attempt to trick the voter and mulct all municipalities that use carbons for electric lighting, was made in the interest of the National Carbon Compnay? Whether Senator Aldrich's connection with Mr. Rockefeller has any bearing on this scandalous transaction or not, the fact stands that carbons are made from crude oil and petroleum coke, purchased from the Standard Oil Company, and Standard interests are supposed to be strongly represented in the National Carbon Company. Taking the whole facts into consideration the outlook for what Judge Taft undoubtedly desired—a substantial reduction of the American tariff—is now almost hopeless. On the other hand, the anti-tariff sentiment is becoming so strong, and is so powerfully represented in the American Press, that the possibility of Free Trade coming with a sweep, as it came in England, is by no means remote.

THE CHARGE OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The Dean of Westminster must be aware of a strong and widely spread feeling against his refusal to allow the ashes of George Meredith to rest in the Abbey. It is not possible to state with full knowledge what the grounds of rejection were. The Court is a silent Court, and appears to be responsible only to itself. But two reasons have been suggested, each of them open to strong objection. The first is that in the opinion of the Dean enough space has been allotted in the Abbey to Victorian worthies, and that Meredith's works have no immortal savor; the second, that Meredith's attitude to Christian doctrine was not such as to commend itself to its Anglican guardians. It would be interesting to know what was the standard of criticism applied by the Dean. What determined him, for example, to permit the remains of Sir Henry Irving, a great, but not the greatest, Victorian actor, to lie in Edward the Confessor's Church, and to refuse a place to those of George Meredith, one of the most original imaginative writers of his time? But we entirely demur to the idea that the honoring of eminent figures in the national life by burial in the national Church should depend on whether, in the opinion of a clergyman, the reign in which he chiefly lived has already contributed an adequate toll of illustrious dead. In a peculiar sense, poets and men of literary and artistic genius belong to all time. If, however, such a theory stands, and the stones of Westminster Abbey are to be portioned out in precise relation to each literary or dynastic period, we have only to look around the walls of the Abbey and condole with the Dean on the way in which his predecessors have applied his principles.

As for the second reason, we hope it is not the true one, for, if it were, it would reveal a very limited knowledge of the character of Westminster Abbey as a national burying-place and a still more contracted view of its relationship to the spiritual and intellectual life of the British people. The question is, indeed, whether a body of clergymen, not necessarily remarkable for sympathy or literary judgment or the historical sense, ought to possess the unquestioned control of Westminster Abbey. The case for reforming and to that extent nationalising the management of our cathedrals has always been a strong one. They are the most precious historical heritage of our race, and yet no one can say that either their structure or their imaginative association with the English nation has been particularly well cared for. The cathedral clergy have long been inconspicuous for learning, and they are divorced from the active religious life of their day. Even of the Abbey it must be said that it has ceased to be a great school of music, of preaching, or of research. Ought bodies so weakly manned to absorb the very large endowments that belong to them? In particular, what special fitness do they possess for conserving and adequately using a national memorial like Westminster Abbey, unique in the history of Europe and of the world? Two remedies are possible. There might be a reversion to the medieval practice of infusing a lay element into the governing bodies of our cathedral churches in general, and of Westminster Abbey in particular. Or the care of the latter, as the Valhalla of the British people, might be separated from the purely religious jurisdiction of the Dean and Chapter, and given over to a National Committee. Confronted with a similar difficulty, the people of Paris decided to secularise the Panthéon. Such a breach with the religious history of centuries is not necessary here, but it is quite time to remind the Dean that Westminster Abbey belongs more to the nation than to the Anglican Church, and that, if he interprets his guardianship in a spirit widely different from that of Dean Stanley, it demands a new steward of its most glorious treasure-house.

Life and Letters.

THE CONSOLATIONS OF SCIENCE.

Philosophers in all ages have felt themselves called upon to take up the challenge which death throws down to man. "We are wrong to fear it," said Socrates, "for it is, perhaps, our greatest good on earth." To Epicurean as to Stoic the fear or hatred of death was plainly opposed to right reason. "Death is nothing to us," says Epicurus in his "Maxims," "for he who is once dissolved into his elements is incapable of feeling, and that which is not felt is nothing to us." So in a long series of philosophic testimony to Schopenhauer, "After us is nothing, and, therefore, why should we disturb ourselves about what comes after us? Is it not just as irrational as to fear that which was before us? The nothing which lies in wait for us, and the nothing which preceded us, are of the same value." Always the same misunderstanding, the same humorous spectacle, reason seeking to confute a human sentiment! The real fear of death, as distinguished from the sorrow of bereavement, is not to any large extent the dread of physical dissolution. Those who know most of death scenes on the sick bed or in battle testify to the fortitude and even the indifference with which the approaching end is nearly always met. With dissolving strength of body comes a loss of feeling, and when death comes in the just order of nature as the close of a full life it is rather welcomed than shunned.

It is the loss of continuous personality which is the true source of dread. How strangely the sophism of Epicurus sounds to the keenly-feeling European of to-day! "That which is not felt is nothing to us"! Yes, but the shadow of this negation falling before him strikes chill upon the spirit of the yet warm-feeling man, the abhorrence from this passage to a state of not feeling. It is for this that Western religions have striven to feed with convincing images a belief in personal immortality, and it is the fading of these images, among so many who have lost confidence in the traditional religions, that is a secret cause of so much sorrow and anguish among men and women of all classes. For it is not merely the "intellectuals" who have undergone this loss of confidence in personal immortality; a certain sceptical spirit of the age, not clearly rational in form, has busily sapped the faith of the common people. It is less the rejection of a creed than the fading of a vision. The future life is becoming unsubstantial, unreal, for the modern man. There is, we think, a wide recognition of the fact among the leaders of thought to-day, and divines are beginning to recast their theology, philosophers to repair their cosmic teaching, scientists to make new contributions to alleviate the heart-ache which proceeds from a weakening belief in personal immortality. To find satisfactions for keen desires is the actual work to which all the intellectual and spiritual processes set themselves, and so long as the passion for personal immortality survives, religion, philosophy, science, and art will find it food. The juggling of spiritualism, the more pretentious refinements of psychical research, the speculative physics of Dr. Lodge, the personalism and pragmatism of the school of philosophy which Professor James so brilliantly represents, not to speak of the New Theology, are all largely motived, consciously or sub-consciously, by this pain of frustrated personality in modern man. It is the sentimental demand for personal continuity beyond the dissolution of the body that gives the leading interest to these speculative studies.

The latest accession is the consolation of biology. "The Philosophy of Long Life," by M. Finot (John Lane) is an endeavor by a learned Frenchman to furnish what he terms a new hope of immortality by expounding the doctrine of the animate solidarity of the universe, as attested by a gathering volume of evidence from several sciences. It seeks, first, following the researches of Professor Mechnikoff and other biologists, to show what science can do to substitute a natural for an unnatural death. If everyone was sufficiently well born and bred, and worked and lived under such favorable conditions as to live out in vigor his full term of human life, death would have lost its sting; for the gradually waning life, death would become a desired haven of repose, and even the sorrow of friends would be assuaged by the sense of completeness which attended such a passing. It is, indeed, a just pride of science that the joint efforts of modern therapeutics, hygiene, and sanitation have, by the large reduction of infantile mortality and the successful defence of adult life against diseases which carried off so many of our ancestors in the prime of life, not merely lengthened the average duration of life, but sensibly lightened the burden of anguish felt for those prematurely snatched from us. Here, indeed, is one of the most unquestionable gains of modern civilisation. This is a right "return to Nature," to make death no more than the dropping off of a fully-ripened life. Secure for everyone his full right of life, then surely it would come to pass that "No one should consider death or think of it as worse than going from one room to another."

But when Science passes from this legitimate consolation to reconstitute upon a basis of universal animation a doctrine of bodily immortality which shall replace that personal survival which most men crave for themselves, and almost all for those who on this earth are dear to them, a curious crassness of feeling seems to cloud her vision. M. Finot gathers, indeed, from a variety of modern scientific sources a most stimulating array of witnesses, physical, chemical, botanical, and biological, to establish the conception of a unity of Nature suffused throughout by a single spirit of life, organic, animate, conscious, even purposive, with differences only of degree and of complexity. The behavior of crystals, the creative unions of chemical elements, the cellular theory of metals, the laboratory imitations of animal chemistry, the researches of Messrs. Loeb and others on the borderland between the animate and the supposed inanimate, the experiments in the comparative conduct of metals, vegetable and animal fibre under the same stimuli, though not yet enabling us to bridge experimentally the gulf between "dead" and "living" matter, certainly go far towards sustaining the spiritual monism or universal continuity towards which sheer logic has inclined most philosophers. The confident assertion of Seneca, "Exigua pars est vitae quam nos vivimus," is certainly in process of ever clearer corroboration. The old rigid barriers between the inorganic and the organic, the insensate and the sensitive, the unconscious and the conscious, can no longer be maintained. But to convert this interesting speculation of the unity of cosmic life into a gospel of personal consolation for those called upon to face death for themselves or for those dear to them, surely betrays a strange obtuseness to the emotional verities. "The intimate ties which unite the exterior world, men, plants, animals, inert and organic matter, are shown most plainly in the phenomena of the life which is common to all. Our return to the earth is thus only a return to the universal life, to the supreme energy which binds up all things in an indissoluble chain. Beyond this life, beyond its incongruous appearances, immortality engulfs, reforms, and rejuvenates in its breast, vast as the universe, all the partial eclipses of life. All things return there, and with indefatigable power are reborn into the sunlight." Nothing perishes. With the dissolution of the body is the accompanying dissolution of the soul passing into many smaller souls or into new psychic combinations as real, as purposeful, as valuable, in the continuous career of Nature, as that for which they are released by the death and decay of the human frame.

Whether this doctrine be true or not, it is not new, but a curious interest attaches to the eager confidence of the author that the acceptance of this cosmic immortality will satisfy the craving for personal survival after death, and will satisfactorily replace the consolations of outworn religious creeds. Is it, indeed, possible that the scientific attitude towards life will in time produce such a re-orientation of the emotions that men will lose all the special value they attribute now to the unique phenomenon of personality, content to merge the sense of self into that belonging to the cosmos, or to any fragment of it, with complete complacency? For the biologist to see in death "only a new form of life" is reasonable enough, for that is what it is from the standpoint of his study. But for him to suppose that this fragmentary resurrection can satisfy the passionate affections which gather round a loved personality of a parent, a child, a friend, is surely an amazing testimony to the sterilising influence of science when detached from life. Among the many modes of sentimentalism that have arisen in modern times, the scientific sentimentalism of such a passage as the following deserves interested recognition: "And the dying man, while commending his soul to Heaven, will salute with one of his last smiles the mysterious properties, the unknown joys, and the travelling company of his numerous descendants which await him in the tomb." Considering that the whole course of civilisation, at any rate in the Western world, has gone to strengthen the conception of individual personality, and to intensify its emotional value, no theory of death, biological or other, which fails to make provision for continuity of this central personality, at any rate in its psychical character, seems likely to afford any real consolation to man in his deepest sorrow. The notion of man ever attaining such a "centre of indifference" that in the literal sense "all is one to him," and the spirits of the human beings who have lived in the closest circle of his interests and affections are equally valued by him when conceived as animating millions of little, scattered, unknown forms, is surely the wildest imagination to which the mind of man has ever committed itself.

---

THE SPIRIT OF EMPIRE.

Who would not change whatever weight of wisdom may be his, or of gold or fame, for the joy of lying hid in a ditch, armed against the movements of an imaginary foe with a five-foot broomstick? Every Saturday in the fields and woods round London you may have that joy for almost nothing, if only you were not born too long ago. Dressed in little that counts beside a big hat like a cow-boy's, and a fluttering bunch of ribbons to mark your savage tribe, with a knapsack strapped on your shoulders just large enough for despatches and the "iron ration" of the brave, you may issue out in some keen-eyed group, scanning the long, white roads, observing the tell-tale footprints in the dust, walking backwards to deceive the enemy, breaking twigs to retrace your path, probing water-courses, peering into thickets, creeping round the trunks of trees, listening with ear to the ground, wriggling through the grass like a serpent, leaping with your broomstick lance, lurking breathlessly concealed, panting as you run, bearing momentous news, handing in the latest message, gasping the newest rumor as you fall speechless at your captain's feet, faithful to the end. There is no joy like that, full of joy as existence is! Why, it is hide-and-seek and Red Indians and lion-hunting and glorious war all combined together, and what was once the trim and uninteresting country of the suburbs now becomes your desert, your prairie, forest, impenetrable fastness, and illimitable veldt! What weight of wisdom, gold, or fame can secure a joyful transformation like that?

And somewhere at the back of all that splendor lies the idea of Empire. At least, one supposes it must be so, for large numbers of boy scouts and other children were gathered at various places on Empire Day, last Monday, and were made to hymn the humble and the contrite heart which is the secret of our Empire's greatness. One would rather have heard them singing the frank old words, "Confound their politics, Frustrate their knavish tricks," in which at all events there was no suspicion of hypocrisy's whine; but Mr. Kipling's "Recessional" has now been adopted by the clergy as the Imperial Anthem, because its appeal for mercy upon contrition has a soothing effect on the conscience. And so the happy boy scouts who sang that all their pomp of yesterday was one with Nineveh and Tyre as they mustered on the Embankment or in the Park, must be taken as representing the Imperial idea almost as truly as the numerous flags that were waved for emblems of our humility, lest we forget.

For a moment, the "Times" seems to have forgotten. If we turn for a definition of the Empire to the considerable folio volume which it published, with illustrations and advertisements, for the occasion, we find it speaking of two kinds of Empire, the self-governing and the dependent, as being "component factors in a higher Imperialism, which transcends each, and which represents the most stupendous synthesis of the human race ever attempted." One cannot be quite sure what the transcending Imperialism representing such a stupendous synthesis may exactly be, but we gather that for the moment, as we said, the humble and the contrite heart has forgotten to grovel in the dust, and comes very near to a relapse into such boasting as the Gentiles use. It is true the writer goes on to plead that "as far as mere numbers go, the Empire only comprises one quarter of mankind." But that humiliating admission hardly restores the efficacy of the "ancient sacrifice," or conceals the heathen heart that puts her trust in that stupendous synthesis. "Humble ye, my people, and be fearful in your mirth," cries the prophet of Imperialism, but "The Times" was not on this occasion more humble than usual, the nice little boy scouts were not specially fearful in their mirth, nor did the rest of the stupendous synthesis seem to pay much attention to prophets.

Yet we would not say that Mr. Kipling's warnings have been without effect. Whether from his persistent preaching of the beauty of meekness or from some other cause, the tone of the race and Empire is quieter and more sensible than it was ten years ago. There is less prating about The Blood and The Flag, less shouting for the Sword, less painful familiarity with the Lord. Youth and middle-age are learning that Empire is not all khaki and riding-breeches, and South Africans no longer regard the bond of race chiefly as an opportunity for making half-crowns out of the Motherland's necessity. Even the present childish panic which sees, not God, but mere Germans moving in a mysterious way, planting their footsteps in the sea, and riding on the storm, is a sign of change that may be salutary. Neither Uriah Heap nor Mr. Kipling himself could reach a lower level of humility than those who wail for Eight and dare not wait. Abject terror is not a pleasing spectacle in man or woman, but as a natural reaction from swagger we may take it for a sign of grace, and, apart from this panic-stricken party who were shouting so loud for other people's blood ten years ago, and now are quaking for their own, the average view of the Empire is both saner and more hopeful than it was. Under the stress of reality, we have shed much boasting, and on the other hand we hear less lamentation about the load of the weary Titan who carried the vast orb of his fate so long and so painfully.

Of the future of Empires it is impossible to speak, for the highest authorities contradict each other. "This is the day of Empires," writes Mr. Joseph Chamberlain in his introductory letter to the "Times" Empire number. "We are witnessing the end of an age—the age of Empires," wrote Tolstoy in comment on the Russo-Japanese war and the general stir throughout the world which has since resulted in the movements towards freedom in Russia's subject races, in Turkey, Persia, India, Egypt, and, under a different form, in South Africa. Here we have a flat contradiction between two prophets of distinction, and while time is at work upon the answer we need not stay to balance their authorities. For some years past, at all events, the Empire has existed. Not once or twice, by one means or another, our rough island has extended her boundaries and occupied other lands, sometimes by domination, sometimes by causing the aboriginal inhabitants to disappear. The process has now been going on long enough to enable the world to pass some sort of judgment on the result. We cannot expect a very favorable verdict from other nations, whose opinion may be influenced by a natural envy. But if we keep the lash in our own discriminating hands we may find comparatively fewer occasions for its use.

In looking through that "Times" panorama of the Empire, for instance, we should say that, among much that is admirable and prosperous, the prevailing danger of the Empire is dulness. We pass at leisure from wheatfield to stockyard, from sheeprun to tinned milk, from gold mines to the advertisement of a mild aperient which asks, "Are we of thy race, O Mother?" It is all very comforting and praiseworthy, but somehow the natural man turns with a strange relief to the articles on mountain-climbing and big game within the Empire, and finds a consolation in just the two subjects with which the Imperial power has no necessary connection. Anything more desolating than the pictures of the Empire's towns, stores, bridges, and scrap-iron farms could hardly be imagined. We will not speak of that vast proportion of the Empire which is dependent or subject—great tracts of country where our people can have no permanent abiding-place, and where our characteristic influences will not penetrate deep nor last long, as history counts time. But where the race has settled and occupied, it is interesting to ask what is the upshot of it all. "What has America done," Carlyle once asked in his haste, "but produce with unexampled rapidity so many millions of the dullest people on earth?" The "Times" tells us that, outside these islands, we have produced about eleven million of our kind. It would be a terrible thing if, after all our meekness, some foreigner, in turning the pages of the "Times" supplement, were driven to repeat Carlyle's taunt.

But in both cases the taunt is an exaggeration of an obvious and superficial deficiency. The one justification for any extension of race lies in the character of the people produced, and Lord Milner tells us that we of the Empire "shall tend more and more to produce a common type of civilisation to which the fresh experience of the new countries, their youthful courage and enterprise and social and political development will contribute quite as much as the riper culture and more august traditions of the European Motherland." Well, Australia and New Zealand, at all events, have successfully tried the experiment of adult suffrage, a measure of which Lord Milner is far from approving, but beyond that, it appears to us, the Colonies have been a little cautious of fresh experience, a little deficient in the youthful courage and enterprise one might hope for. We can supply them with the riper culture and more august traditions of our boy scouts, but they have not yet contributed quite the amount of freshness and the freedom from medieval limitations which we should expect. Their individuality is growing, but it is not yet distinct, and it is want of distinction that gives the sense of dulness to Colonial life. Overshadowed by the Motherland, perhaps they pay too much reverence to the Empire, not showing the independent spirit of the Whitechapel boy who said to the present writer, "What's the Empire to me when I've got to open the window before I can get my trousers on?" Yet when the Imperial spirit has been treated as lightly as it can be, and when the worst has been said of our people that the Recessional mood can say, there does remain a quality in the race well worth preserving for the sake of mankind—a clear honesty and power of getting things done, a high average of humanity and good temper, a stoical silence in the face of danger, a love of personal and State freedom, and a happy versatility which enables the man of British blood to confront with confidence many varying situations. When all the cant and glorification is cut away, when all the tumult and the shouting dies, that amount of fine quality remains, and it constitutes some real title to existence.

FULL-BLOWN SUMMER.

The town-pent millions who take their Whitsuntide holiday in the country cannot fail to be astonished at the intensity of summer that has been prepared for them. The fresh and flowery beauty of it all is heightened or softened, we cannot say which, by the perception of how much we have missed, and how soon all this exquisite blossom will be gone. There is autumn in the midst of spring—indeed, autumn is sometimes the predominant note. Down by the river the willows are shining as white as the May, but not like the May with blossom. Where the palms were are now tufts of shining willow cotton, the wings of the seed which, even while we watch, the wind comes and lifts into the air, as a snowstorm of Tantalus on this sweltering day. And the meadows which were last week, or a very little earlier, full of golden dandelions are now full of round clocks also, for Shawondasee to scatter with his sighs. The greatest shower of all comes from the elms, which have been for the last month crusted on every twig with winged seeds. Now these million papery parachutes come careering down, filling the air as with a flight of locusts, cumbering the ground almost as thickly as when the leaves fall, covering the river with a flowing skin, through which the boil of a rising trout seems to be executed in treacle.

In the upper fields, however, summer has smothered all trace of autumn. The May, for which we have waited through almost the whole of its name month, is now everywhere, creaming the hedges and the tall trees, beneath which rabbits skip, and breaking out in all sorts of unexpected places on solid, wall-like stumps, where shoots of verdure are nibbled as soon as they appear. The air is full of the scent of the May and full of the hum of its myriad patrons. A pheasant comes flying down to the grass, and as soon as he alights is swallowed in its innumerable blue shadows. It is a miserably poor year of grass, but these hill meadows seem perfect revels of luxuriance. Under the up-striving fescue and foxtail, all manner of flowers in bloom make the senses reel with their variety and their beauty. The pink clover is coming out; showers of little golden cogs proclaim the hop trefoil; moneywort has trailed yards of tangle along the hollows, and is now punctuating them with double golden goblets. Bird's-foot is preparing great masses of orange and crimson; yellow archangel lights unexpected candles; purple orchids, cool and solid, stand contemptuously in the midst of striving grass. Red rattle has on its cap of liberty; purple vetches rise on invisible wires; veronica looks up blue as Mediterranean skies.

There are three flowers in the mowing grass, all thoroughly in blossom now, that are the especial pride and love of the humble bees. It is undoubtedly they that have produced them in their present perfection, and it is to them that they belong, and them that they serve above all others. All are of the purple that bees love best, and all are irregular in blossom—two facts that show that it is the bees that have formed them to their liking. The first, perhaps, is the bugle, with purple flowers on purple stalks, and set with purple bracts. It makes spikes of bloom, and apparent bloom that no bee can miss. The next is the prunella, or self-heal, richer in color, though not more attractive, perhaps the commonest flower the world over, for it is found in almost every country. The third is ground ivy, whose flowers peep, but peep very effectively, from beneath rings of leaves. They must be named in some order, but, in the estimation of the bee, "none is before or after other." Wherever either is found, there are the humble bees, especially the great queen carder bees, nominally half yellow and half brown, but the gold of the thorax has got sprinkled over the brown abdomen till the insect looks like a flying buttercup.

In the garden, summer has set her foot no less emphatically. There the May is pink or rich crimson, and it flaunts it in the neighborhood of golden laburnum, the fresh leaves of copper beech and lilac, from purest white to most Tyrian of purples. In a place remote from this gaudy exuberance the long grey bines of the wistaria have burst into yellow-green leaves, and then into shower upon shower of the unique lavender blossoms. Its tonic harmony is the deep scolding of the starlings that come from the fields with beaks full of grubs and perch on the cypress before going in to their clamorous brood under the eaves. Now is the time of the year to live the life of the farmer. The lean time of winter is behind, the hard work of the harvest still to come, while every creature and organism on the place is engaged in yielding its annual handsome dividend. Lambs are fat for the butcher, calves follow their mothers through the grass, foals gambol on the hillside, chicks and ducklings abound in the poultry yard. To-day we opened a hive into which the swarm entered on foundations eleven days ago. We found the combs glistening with several pounds of unsealed honey, all the foundations drawn out into comb, grubs, eggs, and one comb solid with sealed brood. The bee book tells us that this is nearly, if not quite, impossible. There should be allowed a day at least for the drawing out of the first comb, two days for the laying of four thousand eggs, three days for incubation, and six days more till the grubs are large enough to be sealed up. Yet our bees have done all this in ten days. The book does not allow for the mad energy of early summer. The queen, as we see in an observatory hive, does not lay in the foundation—some say she could only lay drone eggs there—but she does lay when the cell walls are only raised to half their height. The honey in our new hive and all the pounds consumed in the preparation of wax and the feeding of five or ten thousand grubs came from the apple blossom, snatched thence in a feverish ten days' foray. The apple blossom is gone, so will the hawthorn blossom, now pouring its sweets into the hive, so will the fragrant horse bean, the white clover, the raspberry, and all the other delights of summer. Carpe diem! is the instinct of every summer thing, whether it be treasure or pleasure that is to be made sure of.

The sadness of summer is that we cannot make enough of its abundance. We feel it most when we have come from the town to witness only for a day or two a mere section of the pageant. But those who live in the country for ever see no more than the visiting townsman does of any one week's series of events. The pageant hurries even if the audience does not. "That dish was sweet; let us have it back!" Impossible! Crocuses are "off"; sweet violets have gone by; no more cowslips till next year. So, the trout stream slips by. No man ever bathes in the same river twice, even if, like the boys, he jumps in again as soon as he gets out. The boys even, who think a week is eternity, cannot make enough of the summer. Having dipped in the river, they roll in the buttercups, rising yellow as bees, get wet again because they are dry, then dry again because they are wet.

Such joys are not for us. We seek the cool cloisters of the orchard. Here the fool's parsley has spread its white scum nearly breast high, with a wealth of green feather under which rabbits sit and nibble. Young rabbits everywhere, and somewhere, no doubt, young stoats to eat them. Young crows in the ivied alder, clamoring for the young mistle thrushes, whose parents have so far proved too valiant for the old crows. There are, however, young blackbirds and song thrushes, and the young crows will not go hungry. The redstart sits and waits on a favorite bough, and dashes like a flame after the hover flies and other insects. The orange-tip takes its winged saunter in and out the chequer of shade and sunshine. The tree pipit plunges up into the blue, to come down singing. He cannot know that there is a cuckoo's egg in his nest, though the corncrake does, to judge by the grating cry of derision that comes for ever from the tall lucerne beyond. The cuckoo who has put out his young to nurse has his own way of enjoying this delightful summer weather. But even he must go rushing about declaring that now is the only now, and that there are ten thousand yesterdays.

Short Studies.

KEEPING A BOOK-SHOP.

It has always been one of the more serious ambitions of my life to keep a second-hand book-shop, but until last week the thing seemed impossible.

Then the sudden indisposition of my friend B——, and an urgent request to come to his assistance in order that business might be carried on as usual during the necessary medical alterations and repairs, gave me the unexpected opportunity.

B—— keeps a second-hand book-shop in an interesting but insalubrious passage, and the chief attraction to the carnally minded in this somewhat lugubrious thoroughfare is a large public-house at the corner.

The shop is known as a "lock-up," and, as B——'s assistant is a middle-aged man of anarchist opinions, methodical habits, and sterling honesty, whose great principle is that all work should begin at noon—at the earliest—(no friend he to Daylight Saving Bills), it was my lot to take the keys, open the shop, and generally keep the place going till the philosopher arrived.

It was a great moment for me, when, leaving poor B—— on his sick bed, I set out to take possession. Hitherto I had been a mere writer of unbought books; now a sudden and unlooked-for accident had raised me for at least a few brief hours to the ranks of the bookseller. I was akin to the publisher, and of the respectability of the complete tradesman. Thus it is we climb to dignity on the misfortunes of our friends.

Glorious spring sunshine lit up the passage without; dark and cavelike was it within when the shop was opened.

I took the only chair, sat down at the heavily littered table, and began to study a price list. Your true second-hand bookseller is always studying price-lists when he is disturbed. Armed at all points, I waited for customers, and speculated on the trade I would do with them.

Perhaps a celebrity would drop in to browse contentedly at the well-filled shelves before making a wise and, I hoped, expensive choice. (Did not Gladstone raid a second-hand bookseller and carry off volumes of the Fathers? And there was Mr. Birrell, famous as the purchaser of Hannah More—in fourteen volumes.)

Or a poet would find another unknown FitzGerald in the twopenny box. Or an antiquary, noble and affluent, would pore over ancient folios and haggle long over their price. Or, best of all, a beautiful stranger, veiled, sorrow-stricken, and lonely, seeking the book of consolation—long out of print. My sympathy would entice the story of her sorrow, and would lay the foundations of friendship, ripening into tenderness.

Then not buyers only, but sellers must be expected.

I should meet brilliant journalists, dining, like Mr. Bludger, off review copies, and others, not so brilliant, selling at the summons of hard necessity. Are not confidences naturally begotten over a bookseller's counter? Might I not glean a tale of heroic struggle and unappreciated genius?

As I meditated on the glories of a bookseller's life, a police sergeant in full uniform stood in the doorway and looked in with a glance of enquiry.

"Mornin', governor not about?"

I explained the governor's regrettable absence.

The sergeant moved himself, noiselessly, well within the shop, out of sight of wayfarers in the passage. He was followed by a potman from the public-house at the corner.

"As the governor ain't here, do you stand in at this?" said the potman, briskly, to me.

At half-past ten in the morning I had to apologise for not standing in.

"It don't matter at all," said the potman, politely.

A spin of a coin followed, and I made out that the sergeant had won.

"The usual?" queried the potman.

"The usual," nodded the sergeant.

The potman disappeared, returned with a beer can, carried off a similar vessel which he found in a corner—near a pile of bound volumes of sermons by eminent Nonconformist divines—and left us with the intimation that there was no time off for him.

The sergeant took his liquor comfortably, and lit a cigarette. I dropped a gentle conversational suggestion that he might be fond of books.

Conan Doyle's "Study in Scarlet" lay at hand. Sherlock Holmes must clearly appeal to every earnest member of the force, even where poetry aroused no response.

But the sergeant had never heard of Conan Doyle or Sherlock Holmes, and was pleasantly resolved to be indifferent to their merits.

"Books ain't in my line," he remarked. "I never could read a book right through, whatever it was. Why, now, there's our blue book, official police regulations. Two big volumes it is, and it's reckoned all us sergeants have learnt it. Think I can read it? Why every night after I've had my bit o' supper I takes the bloomin' thing down, and now for a read, I says. And blest if I ain't nodding asleep over it before I've read a couple of pages. And yet that's a book as I ought to know; for the young constables, you see, they look to us for instruction."

"Well," I said, "and how do you manage to answer their questions?"

"Oh! I manage right enough. There's only one question that's ever been put to me that I couldn't answer, and what yer think that was?"

I gave it up.

"It was a young chap who had been down at Billingsgate, and hadn't been in the force a month. 'Sergeant,' he says, 'what's the proper dimensions of a crab to be sold to the public?' And that floored me. Of course I knew that the very little crabs weren't fit for food, but I was blest if I knew what the limit was. Besides, it isn't part of our duty to interfere in the matter of crabs, you know. We only takes the charge. So I said, 'It's a good question, my lad, and it shows you take an interest in your work'—I'm always one to encourage a young chap that wants to get on—'but crabs is crabs, and a policeman's duty ain't concerned with such affairs'—and there it ended."

After a pause, a kind enquiry concerning my friend B——, and a moderate pull at the can, I learnt that seven years more and the sergeant would retire on his pension after twenty-five years' service. "I'm a cockney, born and bred in Chelsea, if you know where that is, alongside of the barracks, but I shall go and live in the country when I leave the force; take a pub—that's my fancy, and keep bees and fowls. There's a deal o' money to be made out of fowls if you know how to bring 'em up properly."

We heard a step outside, and looking over the inviting rows of books on the shelves in the window, saw the head of another constable in the passage.

"Good heavens," I thought, "another of them."

The sergeant relieved my perplexity by removing his helmet.

"I don't want that youngster to notice there's an officer on duty in here," said the sergeant. "He might ha' wanted to look in too, and I don't hold with a young constable getting into dawdling ways. It's a bit monotonous on this beat, as it is, I can tell you. It's a wonder how we get through the time."

The young constable gave a cursory glance at the books in the window, and went his way. The sergeant resumed his helmet, and finished off the beer. "Helps you through the day, that does," he said, on a note of mingled satisfaction and regret, setting down the empty can.

And, announcing that he must be getting along to the station, he bade me good morning, and, with slow and measured tread, went forth into the passage.

He was my only customer.

Joseph Clayton.

Present-Day Problems.

THE INCORRIGIBLE CENSOR.

We have often spoken in these columns of the condition of the British drama and the various ways of mending it. But there is one of its features, or, rather, one of its disabilities, as to which some present decision must clearly be taken. That is the power of the Censorship to warp it for evil, and to maim it for good. There can be no doubt at all that this is the double function of the Lord Chamberlain and his office. The drama that they pass on and therefore commend to the people is a drama that is always earthly, often sensual, and occasionally devilish; the drama which they refuse to the people is a drama that seeks to be truthful, and is therefore not concerned with average sensual views of life, and that might, if it were encouraged, powerfully touch the neglected spheres of morals and religion. As to the first count against the Censorship there is and can be no defence. Habemus confitentem reum. The man who would pass "Dear Old Charlie" would pass anything. He has bound himself to tolerate the drama of Wycherley and Congreve, of which it is a fairly exact and clever revival, suited to modern hypocrisy as to ways of expression, but equally audacious in its glorification of lying, adultery, mockery, and light-mindedness.

The case on the other count is, we think, sufficiently made out by the Censor's refusal to license Mr. Bernard Shaw's one-act play, "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet." It is fair to the Censor to explain the grounds of his refusal. Mr. Shaw has been good enough to let the editor of this paper see a copy both of his drama and of the official letter refusing a "licence for representation" unless certain passages were expunged. There were two such passages. On the second Mr. Shaw assures us that no difficulty could have occurred. It raised a question of taste, on which he was willing to meet Mr. Redford's views. It seems to us outspoken rather than gross, but as it was not the subject of controversy we dismiss it, and recur to the critical point on which Mr. Shaw, considering—and, in our view, rightly considering—that the heart and meaning of his play were at issue, refused to give way. In order that we may explain the quarrel, it is necessary to give some slight sketch of the character and intention of "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet." We suggest as the simplest clue to its tone and atmosphere that it reproduces in some measure the subject and the feeling of Bret Harte's "Luck of Roaring Camp." It depicts a coarse and violent society, governed by emotions and crude wants rather than by principles and laws, a society of drunkards, lynchers, duellists at sight, and, above all, horse-stealers—in other words, a world of conventionally bad men, liable to good impulses. The "hero" is something of a throw-back to Dick Dudgeon, of the "Devil's Disciple"; that is to say, he is reckless and an outcast, who retains the primitive virtue of not lying to himself.

The scene of the play is a trial for horse-stealing. Blanco is a nominal—not a real—horse-stealer, that is to say, he has committed the sin which a society of horsemen does not pardon. He has run away with the Sheriff's horse, believing it to be his brother's, and taking it on account of a fraudulent settlement of the family estate. A man of his hands, he has yet allowed himself to be tamely captured and brought before a jury of lynchers. Why? Well, he has been upset, over-taken, his plan of life twisted and involved out of all recognition. On his way with the horse, a woman met him with a child dying of croup. She stopped him, thrust the sick child on to the horse, and "commandeered" it for a ride to the nearest doctor's. The child has thrust its weak arms round his neck, and with that touch all the strength has gone out of him. He gives up the horse and flies away into the night, covering his retreat from this new superior force with obscene curses, and surrendering, dismounted, dazed, and helpless, to the Sheriff when the posse comitatus catches him.

Thenceforward two opposing forces rend him, and make life unintelligible and unendurable while they struggle for his soul. Dragged into the Sheriff's court, he is prepared to fight for his neck with the rascals who sit in judgment on him, to lie against them, and to browbeat them. Unjust and filthy as they are, he will be unjust and filthy too. But then there was this apparition of the child. What did it mean? Why has it unmanned him? And here it seems to him that God has at once destroyed and tricked him, for the child is dead, and yet his life is forfeit to these brutes. The situation—this sketch of a sudden, ruthless, unintelligible interference with the lives of men—though apparently unknown to the Censor, will be familiar to readers of the Bible and of religious poetry and prose, and Mr. Shaw's treatment of it could only offend either the non-religious mind or the sincerely, but conventionally, pious man who is so wrapt up in the emotional view of religion that its sterner and deeper moralities escape him. The literary parallels will at once occur. Browning chooses the subject in "Pippa Passes" and in the poem in which he describes how the strong man who had hemmed in and surrounded his enemy suddenly found himself stayed by the "arm that came across" and saved the wretch from vengeance. Ibsen dwells on this divine thwarting and staying power in "Peer Gynt," and it is, of course, the opening theme of the Pilgrim's Progress. As it presents itself to a coarse and reckless, but sincere, man he deals with it in coarse but sincere language—the language which the Censor refuses to pass. Here is the offending passage, which occurs in a dialogue between Blanco and his drunken hypocrite of a brother:—

> Blanco: Take care, Boozy. He hasen't finished with you yet. He always has a trick up His sleeve.
>
> Elder Daniels: Oh, is that the way to speak of the Ruler of the Universe—the great and almighty God?
>
> Blanco: He's a sly one. He's a mean one. He lies low for you. He plays cat and mouse with you. He lets you run loose until you think you're shut of Him; and then when you least expect it, He's got you.
>
> Elder Daniels: Speak more respectful, Blanco—more reverent.
>
> Blanco: Reverent! Who taught you your reverent cant? Not your Bible. It says, "He cometh like a thief in the night"—aye, like a thief—a horse-thief. And it's true. That's how He caught me, and put my neck into the halter. To spite me because I had no use for Him—because I lived my own life in my own way, and would have no truck with His "Don't do this," and "you musent do that," and "You'll go to hell if you do the other." I gave Him the go-bye, and did without Him all these years. But He caught me out at last. The laugh is with Him as far as hanging goes.

Now, let us first note the incapacity of the critic of such an outburst as this to think in terms of the dramatic art—to divine the état d'âme of the speaker, and to recognise the method, and, within bounds, the idiosyncracy of the playwright. But, having regard to all that the Censor has done and all that he has left undone, let us also mark his resolve to treat as mere blasphemy on Mr. Shaw's part the artist's endeavor to depict a rough man's first consciousness of a Power that, selecting Blanco as it selected Paul and John Bunyan, threatens to drag him through moral shame and physical death, if needs be, to life, and not to let him go till He has wrought His uttermost purpose on him. Mr. Shaw naturally makes Blanco talk as an American horse-stealer would talk. But how does Job talk of God, or the Psalmist, or the author of the Parables? Nearly every one of Blanco Posnet's railings can be paralleled from Job. Listen to this:—

> The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure, into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.
>
> He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.
>
> He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.
>
> They grope in the dark without light, and He maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.
>
> * * *
>
> Know now that God hath overthrown me, and hath compassed me with His net.
>
> He hath fenced up my way that I cannot pass, and He hath set darkness in my paths.
>
> He hath destroyed me on every side, and I am gone: and mine hope hath He removed like a tree.*

* See on this point Mark Rutherford's "Notes on the Book of Job."

Is this blasphemy? Is not Mr. Shaw's theme and its expression a reflection of Job's, save that in the one case a bad man speaks, and in the other a good one? If the answer is that these subjects, these moral and religious relationships, must not be treated on the stage, then we reply first that the Censor is grossly inconsistent, for he did not veto the entire play, but only that passage which most clearly revealed its meaning; secondly, that the licensing of "Everyman," and of Mr. Jerome's "The Third Floor Back," where God appears not merely as an influence on the lives of men, but as a man, sitting at their table and sharing their talk; forbids such an hypothesis; and, thirdly, that if Mr. Redford holds this view, he is convicted of opening the drama to horrible mockery of life and sensual trifling with it, and closing it to those close questionings of its purpose which constitute the main theme of all serious playwrights from Æschylus to Ibsen. That Mr. Shaw could have consented to the omission of the passage we have quoted was out of the question. It is vital. The entire play turns on it. For when the woman comes into court and tells her story, it is seen that the leaven which works in Blanco's mind has leavened the lump; that the prostitute who is for swearing away his life cannot speak, that the ferocious jury will not convict and the unjust judge will not sentence. Mr. Shaw had therefore to fight for his play, and the Censor has to come into the open and face the music, to reveal his theory of the British drama, and illustrate his continual practice of it; which is to warn off the artist and the preacher, and to clear the path for the scoffer and the clown.

AN ACADEMIC VIEW OF LORD CURZON'S MANIFESTO.

III.

The Fellowship question is closely connected with that of the "endowment of Research." Here Lord Curzon's theory is at variance with that of all acknowledged authorities on the duties and organisation of a University. He suggests that the Fellowships not wanted for teaching purposes or prizes should be assigned to this purpose, and that "Research should be the primary, and, if possible, the sole work of their holders." All experience is against this project of endowing research by itself. It may be doubted whether, carried out on any large scale, it would advance the cause of Research itself: and it is certainly calculated to damage the cause of Education and the general efficiency of the University. Lord Curzon has failed to put his finger upon the weakest point in our system. Everywhere else in the world it is considered desirable that research and teaching should go on together, because each is indispensable to the other; and that every University teacher should be, to some extent, a "Researcher" also. The University teacher, it is recognised, if he is to teach well, should be aware of the latest developments of his subject, and should himself be contributing to its advance: one of the things he has got to teach is the way in which advances in his subject are made. It is of the utmost importance that the philosophical student should be brought into contact with a man who is thinking for himself, that the historical student should see a piece of historical investigation carried on before his eyes, and so on. And to some extent—though more, no doubt, in some subjects than in others—the teaching helps the research: the preparation of lectures—if they are to be what University Lectures, or at least the more advanced of them, should be—is a piece of Research. And the original investigator is helped by contact with the difficulties of students, and even—where the Seminar system prevails—by the work of students done under the Professor's direction. Now, our Oxford system makes all this difficult. Men begin to teach too soon, often the moment after taking their own degree—a system which would sound incredible to a German, a Frenchman, or a professor in one of the great American Universities. And when they are once engaged in full College work, they have very scanty leisure for their own studies—even for the preparation of lectures—except in those vacations which Lord Curzon proposes to curtail. Very few teachers of the subjects most studied in Oxford can ever hope to be professors, and then only at the age of forty or fifty, or even later: for some twenty or thirty tutors are teaching subjects to which some two or three chairs are appropriated. The Commissioners of 1878 seem to have assumed that Research was to be left to professors, while College tutors were to do nothing but teach. They do not seem to have asked themselves where the professors were to come from, how candidates for professorial positions were to be employed up to the age of forty or fifty, or whether anybody has ever done much for "Research" who did not begin it before middle-age. The career which is to end in a professorship must normally—as regards the ordinary subjects of University education—begin with a College tutorship. I am quite satisfied that the "Tutorial system" is good for the student, but the advantage to him is won at enormous cost to the tutor. In spite of all difficulties Oxford tutors do manage sometimes to accomplish an amount of work which will compare not unfavorably with the work of many Oxford and some Continental professors: but the system is not favorable to the production of a Ranke, a Mommsen, or a Harnack. In the region of physical Science, I am told, it is still harder than in the region of Classics or History or Philosophy for the College tutor to do much original work. The Fellowship-money diverted from the endowment of success in the world, or a portion of it, should be devoted to make possible careers of combined research and teaching for resident teachers.

Research Fellowships of £200 a year, given to men of 35 or 40, are useless, except to eke out some inadequately paid University post, or to help some unofficial student who has hitherto lived on his private income and begun to earn distinction. What is wanted is to distribute the College teaching among a larger number of teachers. A few Colleges already do appoint sufficient Tutors to secure them reasonable leisure, or a Tutor may have leisure because pupils in his subject are few; in too many cases Tutors are more hardly worked in term-time than most schoolmasters. There might well remain a distinction between Fellows who do more teaching and less research, and those who do more research and less teaching. The latter would probably have to be contented with somewhat smaller incomes than the most hard-worked Tutors might fairly expect, though they do not always receive them; but a living wage ought to be obtainable without the total suspension of private studies during term-time, to say nothing of the time which many Tutors are almost forced to waste in examining schools and similar pot-boiling occupations during vacation. This might be effected simply by appointing more Tutors to do the same work, and supplementing their share of the Tuition Fund by a Fellowship, and possibly a further payment from College revenues, or by endowing small but permanent University lectureships—some of them might even be styled professorships—which could be held with a College post, care being taken that the endowment shall really go to increase leisure, and not merely to enlarge income. In one way or another it is imperative that the career of the Oxford teacher shall be more closely assimilated to that of the University teacher in other countries, though it must be frankly admitted that the Tutorial system will always be one more favorable to educational efficiency than to scientific productivity.

Lord Curzon's treatment of the questions discussed in this article, and of some others on which I have not space to dwell, is not such as to inspire very sanguine hopes as to the results of the further deliberations of himself and of the Council which is loyally and strenuously seeking to co-operate with him in obtaining whatever measure of improvement may be possible under our present Constitution. Still, their proceedings will be watched with interest and sympathy. There are few Oxford teachers, however zealous for reform, who would not be relieved if what they want could be done without the risks involved in the appointment of a Commission whose composition and ideas they can neither foresee nor control. The danger is that a few inadequate and tinkering changes of machinery—based rather on a desire to satisfy immediate outside clamor than upon a matured conception, at once philosophical and statesmanlike, of what a great modern University should be—may be allowed to block the way against more fundamental reforms for another half-century or so. H. Rashdall.

Art.

SCULPTURE AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

It is much to be feared that the British public is not yet alive to the fact that there exists a British school of sculpture. Burlington House is the only place in the country where sculpture by living artists is exhibited in any quantity; yet one has only to visit the Academy on an ordinary day to become aware of the want of interest in this section of the exhibition. When the picture galleries are thronged to suffocation point, the Central Hall and Lecture Room are as easy to move about in as the quadrangle outside. They are the rooms where a few people come to rest from looking, rather than to look; the exhibits in them are deemed a side show rather than an integral part of the whole. Undoubtedly the principal reason for this indifference is our national failure to appreciate sculpture, but our appreciation might be considerably stimulated if the sculpture was shown to better advantage than it is at present. To contrast the Academy arrangements in this respect with those of the Salons is to experience a sensation of positive humiliation. Comparatively speaking, the Academy has no accommodation at all for heroic statuary, and the exhibits of smaller size are crowded together in a fashion that is utterly destructive of the æsthetic value of each and all. Year after year, the closely-packed portrait busts and smaller imaginative works in the Lecture Room form an oblong of inanimation, enclosing, and hopelessly overshadowed by, the few big statues for which there is just elbow-room in this quarter. Year after year the overcrowded appearance of the Central Hall suggests a cellar for rejected works rather than a gallery of accepted ones. The fact of the matter is that in the beginning accommodation for Academy sculpture was dragged in as an after thought, and an after-thought it has remained. There may have been some excuse for this at the time when Burlington House was handed over to the Academy, since British sculpture was admittedly at a very low ebb. Within the past twenty years, however, its vitality has increased a hundredfold; while its exhibition facilities remain precisely what they were.

This inadequacy of sculpture space at the Academy is no new subject, but on the present occasion it is forced upon us with fresh insistence by the injustice done to a number of works by their confined surroundings. We believe, too, that the deficiency is becoming increasingly felt by the sculptor exhibitors, within the fold as well as outside it. Apparently nothing but a re-arrangement of the premises, involving considerable architectural alterations, would really meet the case; and, while we realise the difficulties in the way, we hope that the better housing of sculpture will form part of any scheme for Academy reform that may be devised in the future. Meanwhile one cannot help thinking that the authorities might utilise the existing space more serviceably than they do. During the past two or three years it has become the custom to place a few modest-sized works of sculpture in one or two of the picture galleries adjoining the sculpture section proper, and this season Rooms VI., IX., and XI. contain a couple of pieces each. Why should not this method of relieving congestion be extended? What, for example, is there to prevent the third room being used for sculpture? It is as capacious as any other two rooms put together; and even a double line of sculpture ranged down its centre would in no way interfere with the public's enjoyment of the "pictures of the year" that are generally hung in this gallery. The variety afforded by the sculpture would very possibly add zest to the public palate for the pictures. Failing the possibility of so altering the premises as to give the sculpture the chance that it has not at present, we modestly commend this suggestion to the authorities.

In regard to the sculptural exhibit. A considerable part of it consists of Memorial Groups, all of which suffer more or less from their surroundings. In the Central Hall, the female personification of "The Fine Arts," the full-sized model of the bust of one of a series of four bronze figures on Vauxhall Bridge, by Mr. Alfred Drury, demands the transference of one's mind to an imagined setting on an imagined site; as seen here, it conveys little beyond the idea of bulk. The same difficulty of appreciation meets one in the case of Mr. Albert Toft's "Model for part of Welsh National War Memorial," and in that of Mr. Thomas Brock's group of "Justice," a half-size model of a portion of the National Memorial to the late Queen; though, as regards the latter, we should be disposed to think that the slightly-stunted figures would appear even more so when seen from a distance below. It is difficult for the practised eye, and impossible for the unpractised one, to gauge the complete effect of a group of public statuary from these huge "bits" exhibited without reference to their architecture and at a range that overpowers one with its closeness. Manifestly, to give even sufficient architecture to suggest the rest with models of these dimensions would be impossible in any exhibition room; and consequently we deprecate the showing at the Academy of any but sketch models of these and similar public works. But even small sketch models are—thanks to the lack of space—exhibited here with quite inadequate architecture attached to them. Instance Mr. W. R. Colton's "Centre of Design for the Royal Artillery South African War Memorial," in which the tiny symbolical figures of Peace and the War-horse are almost meaningless on the top of their ridiculous little pillar—the solitary fragment of an elaborate architectural scheme, in unison with which, of course, the sculpture was designed. One grows impatient at the futility of public sculpture as represented by the Academy; the more so because the British public is just beginning to take an interest both in its own architecture and in the sculpture wherewith it is adorned, and any object-lesson that tended to prove the relationship between, and the interdependence of, the two arts would be a valuable educative force. At present, as far at any rate as public works are concerned, the influence of an Academy exhibition is calculated to abet the divorce of one from the other.

Furthermore, the works that are not so dependent upon their architectural setting—that is to say, the portraits and certain pieces of imaginative sculpture—are seriously affected by the close proximity of their neighbors. The truth is that every species of sculpture demands a good deal of space for its exhibition if it is to be seen properly. The eye tires of sculpture much more readily than of paintings, wherein the constant variety of colors acts as a stimulus to the attention. Sculpture has not the same power as has painting of producing an instantaneous appeal. Contrasts between the good and the moderately good are less plainly marked, more subtle; generally it is only upon careful investigation that the full merits of a work become apparent, and since such investigation involves detachment from one's immediate surroundings, it is obvious that the less assertive these surroundings are, the better. Now, in the present exhibition a group like Mr. Bertram McKennal's "Tragedy Enveloping Comedy," jostled as it is on both sides, is in serious danger of being overlooked. It is not a striking group in the ordinary sense; that is to say, it is not characterised by vehemence or eccentricity of pose or gesture. The two figures are quietly classical and serenely grave, and it is not till one has had time to analyse their classicism and their gravity that one realises the intellectual force behind them. Analysis reveals many things. The idea has been worked out to a detail. From Tragedy's face, with its tender intensity, to the voluminous folds of the drapery, a corner of which Comedy holds so closely to her breast, there is not a line or fold that has not significance The modelling is firm and broad—like the Greek—from which source also come the types, more especially that of the Tragedy; and the sentiment, chastened as it is, is that of Euripides. But what is Greek is so in spirit rather than in form. There is little trace of the Greek as we see it reproduced by Chantrey and Flaxman, of the idealism that became so stereotyped a convention. Naturalism, carefully curbed as it is, is the prevalent note in the modelling of the nude Comedy. Mr. McKennal is at heart a realist.

The realism in our modern sculpture derives, of course, directly from the French school. French influence in this respect is acknowledged by a great many of our younger generation of sculptors, and may be considered the most important of all the influences at present affecting the development of the English school. Most of the figure-work here shows it in a greater or lesser degree. We find realism very tenderly yet emphatically present in the child form of Mr. Henry Pegram's impressive marble group, "Into the Silent Land." It is in Mr. E. G. Bramwell's intense "Hero Mourning over the Body of Leander"; in Mr. D. Burns Brown's "The Sowers"; in Mr. J. Havard Thomas's "Terpsis"—rather too prominently perhaps, for the child, child-like, is a trifle top-heavy; even in Mr. F. Derwent Wood's "Atalanta," with all its perfection of surface finish. The contortionist struggles of Mr. Harold Parker's "Prometheus Bound" represent it in its vehement form; but it is in its quieter phases that it is mostly employed by English sculptors, and employed with English reticence. The representation of violent action is not popular with our sculptors. We excel in lyrical rather than dramatic expression, partly because the national talent tends the former way, but also because we still retain a certain horror of being ridiculous or indecorous. And this clinging to decorum, while it has lost us much in art, has so far preserved in our sculpture a reticence in the use of naturalism in the modelling of the human form, without which its borrowment from our Latin neighbors might prove a national danger. As it is, it is a formative influence of the first value. In the minor branches of sculpture, particularly in that class of works which are half sculpture, half objets d'art, the present generation has to thank Mr. Alfred Gilbert for showing how much artistic fancy can go to the execution of a small piece in more than one material. The exhibition contains several of these trifles—statuettes, plaquettes, medallions—and many of them evidence as delicate workmanship and feeling as one could wish for. Mr. Walter Winans's "Mermaid" statuette, in ivory and silver, is a case in point; and in the "small sculpture" generally lies a good deal of the promise that is afforded by the section as a whole.

Communications.

THE CARRYING OF THE COLORS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The infantry battalions of the new Territorial Army are to carry colors. There is to be a ceremonial presentation of the new colors to deputations from a large number of regiments by the King at Windsor. The best friends of the new force must regret that it is being thus committed to a useless piece of display that will, if anything, tend to diminish its efficiency.

The practice of carrying colors belongs to the vanished past, and its perpetuation in the present is a mistake. There was a time when every company of foot, every troop of horse had its standard. It was carried by the junior officer, hence the names that officers of this rank in our own Army were known by till some thirty years ago. The "ensign" was the officer who once carried the company flag in the infantry; the "cornet" bore the smaller cavalry standard, and cornet was originally the name for a small square flag. As time went on this multitude of flags was found to be useless, and was reduced until each regiment had only two colors—the national flag, or "King's color," and the regimental color, bearing the name, number, badges, and battle honors of the corps. Semi-civilised and savage armies, like the old feudal levies, cling to a display of numerous flags. In the unreformed Chinese Army there was a forest of flags fluttering almost side by side along the line. In the Dervish Armies of the Sudan pointed pennons of various hues were carried in hundreds, so that the capture of a number of them was a feature of every little encounter. As war becomes a scientific business, it is found that there is a better use for brave and intelligent men than to employ them as banner bearers. In the old days of close order drill, the colors of the regiment had their use. They were the prominent point on which the line formed. They guided the advance. They were a rallying centre in a moment of disorder. Once fighting in extended lines, with the rifle as the chief weapon, became a feature of war, men began to realise that colors were out-of-date and a useless encumbrance for which there was no longer a place. Thus when, a little more than a century ago, the famous Rifle Brigade was formed and light infantry drill was introduced into our Army, the new corps was given no colors. It never felt the want of them, and the Rifles have as proud a battle record as any red-coated line regiment. It was this happy precedent of the Rifle Brigade that saved the Volunteers from the infliction of colors during their forty years and more of useful existence. Yet there were always pompous Volunteer colonels who longed for the theatrical display of colors and color parties. They were never taken seriously. Meanwhile after many a noble life had been sacrificed in "saving the colors," or carrying them into battle under aimed rifle fire, and after Lord Wolseley had said that to order an officer to take colors into action was, under modern war conditions, equivalent to committing murder, it was decided that British regiments should no longer take their colors into the field. In the South African War every unit, before proceeding to the Cape, left them in safe keeping at home. The colors had become a ceremonial relic of the past.

But ten years after this thoroughly sensible proceeding, the War Office yields to the clamor of a number of lovers of courtly ceremony and theatrical display, and decides that Territorial units are to have colors. First of all a pair of colors will cost from £50 to £60. This means that in the next few weeks about £6,000 will be spent on these elaborate toys. The money might surely be better employed in promoting good rifle shooting. But this is the least of the waste involved in the new departure. So far, it has been an accepted principle that the Territorials are to devote the scanty time available for drill to practical work. They are warned that they are not to practise a considerable number of the close order movements in the Drill Book, in order to have more time for extended drill. They are told there is to be as little as possible of ceremonial drill. And then into their battalion drill is imported all the complications that result from the presence of a color party. Officers and sergeants have to learn a number of new movements, and some of the smartest young lieutenants and sergeants in each battalion will be told off for the utterly useless business of marching hither and thither with a pair of elaborately decorated flags, which, if ever real work is to be done, will be left in the custody of the mayor of the town. Perhaps it will be said that colors are not really out-of-date. For in pictures of the Japanese bayonet attacks on Russian positions, one sees, well to the front in each battalion, a flag flying, and surely the Japanese are up-to-date soldiers. But this battle flag was not a regimental color in the sense of our Army regulations. It was the Japanese national flag made of very light stuff, entirely without costly embroidery, and marked only with the regimental number. There was no elaborate ceremonial centreing around it. It was carried into action by a sergeant of the leading company and kept rolled round a light staff during the earlier stages of the fight. It was displayed only in the final rush to close quarters, when it not only helped to rouse the enthusiasm of the men, but also served as a signal to the supporting artillery to cease fire, so that the shells might not drop among the leading companies as they closed with the enemy. While we put away our colors on the eve of war, these battle flags were given to the Japanese regiments as they went to the front. If we took our colors into battle there would be some reason for giving them to the Territorials, though even then there would be no reason for wasting money on mere theatrical display, or imposing an elaborate ceremonial drill on men who have not much time for learning the strictly necessary fighting formations. Even the Japanese precedent rightly understood will not justify this costly piece of theatricalism.—Yours, &c.,

An Old War Correspondent.

May 27th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

GEORGE MEREDITH AND THE ABBEY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The wrong done is not to George Meredith, whose fame it cannot touch, but to the Abbey, and to us for whom a truly national place of burial were a thing beyond price. Is this possession to be withheld from us, still more deplorably from the English of the days to come, at the discretion of an unknown priest? That we may not see a play while the Censor's brow is clouded is hard, but this loss will go re-echoing.

Strange that the great rejected should be vouchsafed two services—one hears his appraising laughter—but consistency is not demanded of a church. Neither is the clearing of issues; yet this is sometimes unavoidable. Here at least the prospect is plain before us. Only those to be accepted whose views do no more than respectable violence to the Articles, or whose words let them be supposed indifferent to truth—already a small, surely a decreasing, proportion of our great ones. The Abbey an Anglican heaven in miniature! Do we submit?—Yours, &c.,

Richmond, May 25th, 1909. C. S.

FOX AND PATRIOTISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In last week's NATION Mr. Toynbee quotes the well-known passage in a letter to Grey, expressing the pleasure he took in the triumph of the French Government over the English (in the Peace of Amiens), as a proof that Fox was wanting in patriotism. Mr. Toynbee is not, of course, the first to take this view, and M. Sorel remarked to me once in conversation that he was surprised that so many English writers had failed to see that Fox was "un bon Anglais." The reason surely is that it is difficult for men who have been brought up in the atmosphere of our upper-class education to do justice to the attitude of the Opposition to the war of 1793. To Fox, as to most Liberals since his day, the question at issue in the first years of that war was whether or not the English oligarchy was to destroy the French Revolution and to restore the Bourbons. Had that attempt succeeded, the experiment of the "Holy Alliance" would have been made under most favorable conditions, and all Europe would have been imprisoned in the clutches of a combination against revolutionary, nationalist, and democratic ideas. Fox, who had fought a hopeless battle for all the obscure reformers whom the Government at home (in its implacable persecution) had thrown into prison or shipped off to Botany Bay, rejoiced that that capital aim had not been achieved, and I imagine there are few Liberals who do not so rejoice to-day. But such rejoicing can only be called unpatriotic by those who believe that the interests of liberty can never be reconciled with the interests of England. What Fox himself thought on this subject appears from his speech in the House of Commons on November 3rd, 1801:—

"Sir, there are many persons who think and lament that the peace is a glorious one for France. If the peace be glorious for France without being inglorious to England, it will not give me any concern that it is so. Upon this point the feelings and opinions of men must depend in a great measure upon their conceptions of the causes of the war. If one of the objects of the war was the restoration of the ancient despotism of France, than which I defy any man to produce in the history of the world a more accursed one; if, I say, that was one of the objects of the war, why then, I say, it is to me an additional recommendation of the peace that it has been obtained without the accomplishment of such an object. My undisguised opinion is that if the condition for the restoration of the Bourbons had succeeded, the consequences would have been amongst all the kings of Europe a perpetual guarantee against all people who might be oppressed by any of them in any part of the world. All countries, therefore, must be benefited by the failure of such a project, but none more so than Great Britain. To the people of this country the consequences would have been fatal."

The oligarchy suspected by Fox of these designs did not show more spirit and tenacity in prosecuting the war with France than it showed after the war was over in resisting domestic reforms and defending its economic and political preserves against the English poor.—Yours, &c.,

May 27th, 1909. J. L. HAMMOND.

FIRE BRIGADES AND INSURANCE COMPANIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The chairman of the Fire Brigade Committee of the London County Council appears to think he has made a discovery, and he wishes to have the patent for it before any one could have the chance of snatching it from him. The old horse he trotted out, however, is so worn with service that it would seem a pity to disturb its well-earned rest. He says:—

> "The total expenditure on the fire brigade during the year ended 31st March, 1908, was £29,330 16s. 1d. on capital, and £272,286 15s. 3d. on maintenance (including pensions but excluding debt charges). The net expenditure on maintenance including pensions and debt charges, but deducting receipts, that is, the amount actually raised from the ratepayers in the year 1907-8, was £283,908 10s., which represents a rate in the pound of 1·55d. The gross amount insured against fire in respect of property in the County of London during the year 1907 was £1,055,200,172. The expenditure on the brigade for the year 1907-8 (i.e., the total of the amounts actually spent on capital and on maintenance, and not counting debt charges), viz., £301,617 11s. 4d., was therefore approximately ·029 per cent. of the gross amount for which property in London was insured against fire. The amount of the contributions received from fire insurance companies (at the rate of £35 per million of the gross amounts insured) in 1907-8, was £35,007 19s. 6d."

That the subject is no new one may be gathered from the fact that the fire insurance companies so far back as 1888 issued a public manifesto traversing the contention that inasmuch as they derive the chief benefit from the services of the brigades, they ought to contribute towards the cost of their maintenance. They maintain, with perfect justice, that they ought not to be called upon to contribute, either annually or otherwise, towards such expenses, and thus they argue:—

> "The function of Fire Insurance Companies is to indemnify their policy holders against loss or damage by fire; the protection of life and property is a matter with which it lies beyond their province to deal. They contend that this latter is a public duty, just in the same manner as are protection from murder and robbery, the construction of drainage and other sanitary works, the maintenance of roads, &c., and as such, it should in the interests of the community at large be discharged at the public expense. The duty of providing the necessary appliances for the preservation of life and property from fire belongs to the Local Authorities, and the cost ought to be defrayed out of the rates which they are authorised to levy for that purpose.
>
> "This principle has been recognised by the Legislature, which not only in passing the 'Town Police Clauses Act, 1847,' but in every other General Public Act authorising the maintenance, out of the rates to be levied thereunder, of firemen, fire engines, and other appliances and requisites for extinguishing fire, has not authorised any charge for the use thereof in the case of fires occurring within the boundaries of any city or town to which such Act applies; and it has accordingly been on more than one occasion judicially decided that a ratepayer is entitled, without any charge whatever, to the services of the local brigade for the extinction of a fire upon the premises."

It is for Mr. Hoare to remember that fire insurance companies are voluntary associations, through the medium of which a number of policy holders contribute to a common fund for the purpose of indemnifying any fellow policy holder who may suffer the misfortune of a fire upon his premises. The premiums paid for securing such indemnity are adjusted according to average losses. On this head the fire offices say:—

> "If, on the one hand, owing to the want of sufficient fire-extinguishing appliances, or to any other cause, losses become more numerous or more serious, a corresponding increase must be made in the rates of premium in order to maintain a fair percentage of profits, and the insured are thus made to suffer for the insufficiency of the appliances. To whatever extent, therefore, the insurance companies contribute, whether voluntarily or under compulsion, to the cost of appliances, the burden of the prudent who protect themselves against loss by means of insurance, is increased for the relief pro tanto of the imprudent who neglect to take a similar precaution.
>
> "If, on the other hand, the average number or extent of fires is diminished, the public ultimately reap the benefit, because experience shows that the practical effect of any diminution of fires is that the public insure at less cost."

It must, on reflection, be apparent that the attitude of the fire insurance companies is both logical and reasonable. It is never contended that life insurance companies should contribute towards sanitary improvements, or that marine insurance companies should share in the cost of harbors of refuge, lighthouses, &c., and yet no one will deny that their interests in such matters are quite as vital as those which the insurance companies are deemed to have in organisations for fire extinction. Mr. Hoare must shake himself and his broom before he again poses as a man with a new idea.—Yours, &c., INSURANCE MANAGER.

THE CAUSE OF THE LIBERAL SET-BACK.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a recent number of THE NATION I noticed an able analysis of recent bye-elections. Is it not time we began enquiring a little more closely into the cause of this Liberal set-back?

The issues of Liberalism are numerous, but can be summed up as tending to one aim—progress. Any organised antagonism to progress threatens all its expressions, threatens Liberalism itself. Such organised antagonism, I think all agree, we find in the House of Lords. The House of Lords forms the chief bar on our way to progress, and to be removed requires the united efforts of all progressives. It requires, furthermore, concentration of effort in this direction, and last, but not least, a favorable opportunity. This opportunity offered itself to the Liberals almost immediately on their accession to power, but for some mysterious motive they refused to take advantage of it. The only reasonable explanation that suggests itself is that they were unprepared for dealing with the question of the House of Lords—unprepared for the rapidity with which the Lords would take the offensive, and by vigorous action seek to re-establish the fortunes of their party—unprepared for the tremendous majority which gave them the opportunity of proving they meant business.

Here was a party returned to power with an almost unprecedented majority, a party put in power by all shades of opinion—its adversaries discredited in the eyes of the country—with the clearest mandate to remedy certain abuses. Men who had never voted before in their lives, voted for this party, and men who had hitherto consistently voted Tory, now gave their votes to the Liberals. Was the General Election a gigantic farce, or were the men who voted in earnest when they recorded their votes?

I am afraid the truth is, the Government did not then succeed in convincing the country that they also were in earnest.

They introduced a measure, the one they were pledged to above all others, and with what result?

With the result that this very first measure of a Government just returned by a tremendous majority was contemptuously cast out by the champions of a party which had just suffered a crushing defeat at the polls.

I do not wish to say anything about the merits of the measure itself—the preposterous thing was the high-handed action of the House of Lords. Now we may fairly ask, what on earth were the Liberals returned to power for? Was it to carry out the wishes of those who supported them, or those of their opponents? Would not the Government have been wiser, not to say more courteous, to act as if it assumed that the electors were in earnest when they voted Liberal? Its duty, having expressed its will, was next to enforce it.

Not taking the proper steps to do so, it showed confidence neither in its own measure, nor in itself, nor in the electorate; and thereby forfeited the confidence that numbers had placed in it.

This action, or rather want of action, was a great tactical blunder, a blunder which gave the advantage to its opponents from the start. It showed, and for party purposes most effectively, that the Tories had, at least, the courage of their convictions.

The Lords played a daring hand of bluff; but they had probably taken measures to assure themselves that the Liberals would not appeal to the country. The instinctive political sense of the Lords enabled them to triumph over their adversaries, who, for the time, were rendered dizzy by the height of their power; and the cause of real progress has probably been thrown back for another decade.

Forecasts of what would have happened had the Liberals appealed to the nation, must be in the nature of prophecy. Still, by all the laws of human probability, I think it can be safely said that the Liberals would have been returned; with a smaller majority, it is true, but with a majority large enough to settle once for all the vexed question of the supremacy of the House of Commons.—Yours, &c.,

D. P. COULTON

The Green, Southgate.

A QUESTION OF IDEALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am indeed obliged to Miss Delf for clearly and unreservedly stating the ideal for which Free Traders are striving—namely, "the greatest good of the great number." It is a most damaging admission, seeing that such an ideal is essentially un-Christian and immoral. It was to secure "the greatest good of the greatest number," I suppose, that a former London County Council overworked the engine-room hands on its fleet of Thames steamers all through a tropical summer. It is to ensure "the greatest good of the greatest number," no doubt, that so-called "Liberal" principles bid us buy in the cheapest foreign market and ask no questions as to how that cheapness is obtained. I will say no more, except to express an opinion that people, whose ideal is "the greatest good of the greatest number" should at once join the ranks of the Socialists; for they are out of place among those whose ideal is that essentially Christian one—"the greatest good of all."—Yours, &c.,

IMMO S. ALLEN.

London Institution,
Finsbury Circus, E.C.
May 18th, 1909.

INEQUALITIES OF THE INCOME-TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are three chief points at which difficulties will arise in levying the income-tax in accordance with the resolution of the House of Commons. In any system which imposes a tax, increasing automatically according to an arbitrary non-graduated scale at various stages, inequalities in the treatment of incomes about those points are bound to be found. An anomalous condition of affairs has obtained since 1907 in regard to the taxation of earned incomes which are slightly in excess of £2,000. By the Chancellor of the Exchequer's new scale other anomalies of a like kind will be created.

At three points taxpayers, whose incomes just exceed the maximum income subject to a lower rate of change, will be penalised.

| CASE 1.—EARNED INCOMES. | | Tax. |
|---|---|---|
| A.—£2,000 | taxed at 9d. in £ ... ... | £75 |
| B.—£2,001 | ,, ,, 1s. ,, ,, ... ... | £100 1 0 |
| C.—£2,026 | ,, ,, 1s. ,, ,, ... ... | £101 6 0 |

That is to say, taxpayer B earning £1 per annum more than A will be charged £25 1s. in excess of the tax demanded from A. Even in the case of an earned income of £2,026, the taxpayer C will be worse off after the visit of the tax-collector than his fellow-taxpayer A.

| CASE 2.—EARNED INCOMES. | | Tax. |
|---|---|---|
| A.—£3,000 | taxed at 1s. in £ ... ... | £150 |
| B.—£3,001 | ,, ,, 1s. 2d. ,, ... ... | £175 1 2 |
| C.—£3,026 | ,, ,, 1s. 2d. ,, ... ... | £176 10 4 |

As in Case 1, the incomes slightly in excess of the maximum income chargable at a lower rate are penalised. It is clear that C, after paying his tax, will be worse off than A will be after discharging his indebtedness to the State.

CASE 3.—INCOMES EXCEEDING £5,000.

| | | Tax. |
|---|---|---|
| A.—£5,000 | taxed at 1s. 2d. in £ ... | £291 13 4 |
| B.—£5,001 | taxed at 1s. 2d. in £, with super tax of 6d. in £ on excess over £3,000 | £341 15 0 |
| C.—£5,054 | | £346 3 4 |

At £5,054 the taxpayer will be left with £4,707 16s. 8d., as compared with £4,708 6s. 8d. left to A.

These anomalies can be removed by a simple device which this writer begs to propose. By imposing transitional charges at critical points, the scale can be made sufficiently elastic, thus:—

CASE 1.

Earned incomes exceeding £2,000 and not exceeding £2,055 (tax), 9d. in £ on £2,000; 10s. in £ on excess (transitional charge).

Earned incomes exceeding £2,055 and not exceeding £3,000, 1s. in £.

CASE 2.

Earned incomes exceeding £3,000 and not exceeding £3,055, 1s. in £ on £3,000; 10s. in £ on excess (transitional charge).

Earned incomes exceeding £3,055 and not exceeding £5,000, 1s. 2d. in £.

CASE 3.

Incomes exceeding £5,000 and not exceeding £5,118, 1s. 2d. in £ on £5,000, and 10s. in £ on excess (transitional charge).

Incomes exceeding £5,118, 1s. 2d. in £, and super tax of 6d. in £ for every £ over £3,000.

This device gives a fairly graduated scale:—

INCOME.—(Earned.)

| | Tax | |
|---|---|---|
| £2,000 ... ... ... ... | £75 0 0 | Budget Scale. |
| £2,001 ... ... ... ... to £2,055 ... ... ... ... | £75 10 0 to £102 10 0 | Transitional Charges. |
| £2,056 ... ... ... ... | £102 16 0 | Budget Scale. |
| £3,000 ... ... ... ... | £150 0 0 | Budget Scale. |
| £3,001 ... ... ... ... to £3055 ... ... ... ... | £150 10 0 to £177 10 0 | Transitional Charges. |
| £3,056 ... ... ... ... | £178 5 4 | Budget Scale. |
| (All Classes.) | | |
| £5,000 ... ... ... ... | £291 13 4 | Budget Scale. |
| £5,001 ... ... ... ... to £5,118 ... ... ... ... | £292 3 4 to £350 13 4 | Transitional Charges. |
| £5,119 ... ... ... ... | £351 11 8 | Budget Scale. |

The principle of accommodation charges is, it will be seen, susceptible of applications to the system of charging small incomes subject to abatement, in which cases of hardship arise at the critical points—£400, £500, &c.—Yours, &c.,

INCOME TAX REFORMER.

May 27th, 1909.

"THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article on "The Break-Up of the Poor Law" you state that the great divergence between the Majority and Minority Reports is one of principle. This is true, but surely there may be people who, while believing in the main in the principle which underlies the Minority Report, yet fail to see how the proposed machinery can be made to work in such a way as to effect its own ends without causing worse evils to follow. To take one point; you compare the children, the sick, and the unemployed with the aged, and say that as the State has undertaken to provide for these last—outside the Poor Law—it should do the same for the rest. But with the aged there is no question of the repayment of what is granted them, because it is obvious that their working days are over. The case is different with the other classes mentioned above; while the different Committees concerned with their relief are not to wait for an application to be made to them, but are to search out and relieve all cases of need, yet the Registrar of Public Assistance is to decide in each case what is to be repaid, and to take steps to recover it. Is there not a danger here that in releasing the people from the burden of pauperism, we may be hanging round their necks instead a burden of debt?

To many who are practically acquainted with the working of the Poor Law, the difficulties connected with the duties of the registrar seem insuperable. Take the question of medical relief: we should have the Medical Officer of Health not only giving medical treatment, but ordering home aliment in any case of sickness that came to his notice, absolutely without regard to the pecuniary circumstances of the case. It is true that the registrar would be required to sanction all grants of home aliment, but it would in practice be difficult for him to disallow what the expert had recommended. Such a scheme, while it ignores and supersedes any provision for their treatment in sickness which the poor have made for themselves, also by its vastness surely makes it impossible for the registrar (it is proposed that six should deal with the whole of the metropolis) to take into consideration all the circumstances—educational, sanitary, moral, and economic—of each family as a separate unit, as the report states that he is to do.

Two other questions suggest themselves. Can a scheme be said to put an end to overlapping which takes no account of the work of provident clubs and friendly societies or of the huge sums dispensed in private charity? And in many places can we rightly say that the health authority which permits those insanitary dwellings to exist into which we read that outdoor relief is constantly sent, is any more fit than a Board of Guardians to be entrusted with the care of birth and infancy and medical relief?

Much of the Minority Report—especially that part which deals with unemployment—is so admirable that it seems ungrateful work to criticise. But to criticise is, at any rate, better than to condemn, and I wish entirely to dissociate myself from the condemnation of the reports and the recommendations contained in them in which so many Guardians have joined.—Yours, &c.,

(MRS.) C. D. RACKHAM, P.L.G.

4, Grange Terrace, Cambridge,
May 26th, 1909.

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Magrath, in your issue of May 8th, dismisses in a very lofty fashion the ignorance of those who regard Henry VIII. as the prime author and founder of the Anglican Episcopacy. Mr. Magrath may read history, if he pleases, through ecclesiastical glasses, but some of us prefer the less distorted view of Mr. Lecky, who declares in his "History of Rationalism" that the Anglican Church was "created in the first instance by a Court intrigue." The Report of the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Courts (1883) certainly sustains this view; and further, it is borne out by the rigid refusal of Rome to recognise the validity of Anglican orders or to treat the English Church as other than schismatical. Surely Rome may be supposed to know her own business in this matter.

Mr. Magrath's interpretation of English history, however, is a minor point in this controversy; his position is much more serious when he implies that Episcopacy was "founded directly by our Lord," and that outside of an Episcopal succession the true Church cannot exist. When will Anglo-Catholics learn that dogmatism is not proof? Before these astounding claims can be admitted one or two questions need to be answered, and certain evidence produced. For instance: When did Jesus found episcopacy? When did any one of the Apostles ordain a bishop? Where is the evidence of Episcopal succession from the Apostles to the present time?

No answer to these questions can be given that does not rest upon what in the last analysis is pure surmise—and yet we are asked to believe that upon this unproved and unprovable assumption depends the very existence of the true and only Church.

The Evangelical conception of the Church can at least claim a more solid foundation than that. Mr. Magrath pours scorn upon the ignorance of others, but what is one to say of his own ignorance of the Free Church position when he caricatures it by saying that "anyone is at liberty to found a Church, invent their own rules, system of ordination, &c."? That is a familiar taunt which would be impossible if Anglicans really took the trouble to understand us. Our position as Free Churchmen is not a plea that we are at liberty to do or to think as we like; our contention is much more serious than that: we are free in our own minds only because we are bound by the mind of Christ. We claim to be under authority as much as the sacerdotalist, but the authority that controls us is spiritual, not ecclesiastical; we affirm with the most advanced Roman or Anglo-Catholic, the doctrine of the "Real Presence" of the Lord Jesus Christ; but we hold that that Presence is not mediated by the priest through the sacraments; it is immediate, direct from God to the soul of every believer. And for this we have the highest authority: "Where two or three are gathered together in My name there am I in the midst of them." Christ is in the Christian assembly—a real presence, because a spiritual reality; and, to quote an authority whom even Mr. Magrath will respect: "Where Christ is there is the Church"—it may be in a Quaker meeting, in a Roman or Anglican Cathedral, in a Methodist Class-meeting, a Presbyterian Assembly, or in a Congregational Meeting-house—wherever and under whatever denomination, the faithful disciples of the Christ are assembled in His name, to fulfil His word, there is a Christian Church and a branch of the Church Catholic. That is the Free Church position, and it is as scriptural as it is free. Moreover, it has a supreme right to the name of Catholic; for it is a Church from which there are no dissenters; against which there are no protestants, and it rules no man outside of the Church who does not unchurch himself by reason of his own want of Christian character. The sacerdotalist declares, "if you are not in my Church, you are not in the Church"; but from the Evangelical point of view—which is also most truly Catholic—we realise that the various denominations correspond to the differing spiritual needs of different people, and that every denomination, therefore, has its place in the universal Church, as a witness to its own particular aspect of the truth.—Yours, &c.,

LEYTON RICHARDS.

61, Queen Street, Peterhead, N.B.
May 13th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to the letters appearing in this week's NATION in reply to my reply, will you permit me one word more in order to point out that your correspondents tumble over one another in their eagerness to substantiate my argument? Solomon affirmed that in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird, but Mr. Chitty, Mr. Brayshaw, and Mr. Magrath are pathetic illustrations of that wise man's ignorance. They fervently assert that the Anglican Church is a branch of the One Catholic Church, and speak of the Greek and Roman Churches as "other branches." By so doing they deliver themselves into my hands, tied and bound. If either the Greek or Roman Church admitted it was a branch they would have a case, but neither of these Churches admits any such thing. Each claims to be not merely a tree, but the tree. It is left to defenders of the Anglican position to claim the modest rôle of a branch. The admission is of the utmost importance, owing, of course, to the fact that it is the trunk and not the branches of a tree which possesses the roots—Apostolic succession. It was this lack of roots which made Newman say the Anglican Church was not a divine creation, not directly founded by our Lord; and it is the same lack which explains the touching desire of this "branch" for union with either the Roman or Greek Church.

Mr. Chitty, using a different metaphor, emphasises this humiliating admission. He says, concerning the refusal of Rome to recognise Anglican orders, "a son does not cease to be begotten of the common parent because his brother calls him a bastard." What else can these words mean save that the Roman Church claims to be the only legitimate son—not one of three sons, not a "branch," but the son, the "tree" itself. This was the contention of my previous letters. No member of the Greek or Roman Church would admit what your correspondents admit concerning the Anglican—that either Church was a "branch." The High Churchman calls the Anglican Church a branch because such it is in the eyes of the Roman Church—a branch lopped off the Roman tree by Henry VIII.—just as the Roman Church is, in the eyes of the Greek Church, a branch. Our position as Free Churchmen is that there is one tree, one Holy Catholic Church, with many branches, and that if you could limit the number to three, or thirty-three for that matter, it would not be a living tree, but a block of dead wood.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD MUDIE-SMITH.

9, Clifton Villas, Maida Vale, W.
May 23rd, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Perhaps a quotation from Lecky's "History of the Eighteenth Century" may not seem out of place in connection with the controversy in your paper about the Anglican and Nonconformist Churches. Some of your correspondents seem to hold the same views as regards the continuity of the Anglican Church, as the Non-Jurors, whose theory is thus expressed by Lecky (Vol. I., p. 107): "The Nonjuror theology represented . . . . that the Church of England in violently severing itself from the authority of the Pope, proscribing the religious worship which before the Reformation had been universal in Christendom, persecuting even to death members who were guilty only of remaining attached to the old order of things, and branding a leading portion of its former theology as 'blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits,' had done no act at all savoring of schism."—Yours, &c.,

X. Y. Z.

May 25th, 1909.

---

"TO VINDICATE LEIGH HUNT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As I have always considered THE NATION to be the true successor to the old "Examiner" of a hundred years ago, it seemed specially fitting that the article under the above heading should have appeared in its columns. "Character," said Emerson, "always publishes itself," and Leigh Hunt, like every other writer, has drawn his own portrait in the thoughts he put on paper. If any reader finds there the slightest trait of "meanness," the explanation can only be found in Emerson's other saying of: "As we are, so we see."

Carlyle did not usually accept false coin for genuine, and he writes of Leigh Hunt as being a "gifted," "gentle," "patient," and "valiant human soul." He also says of the latter's Autobiography: "This book has been like a written exercise of devotion to me; I have not assisted at any sermon, liturgy, or litany, this long while, that has had so religious an effect upon me." Surely these weighty words, from a master-prober of "shams," should bring down the scales against the apologised-for "copy" of Dickens with a decisive bang!—Yours, &c.,

R. H. B.

May 25th, 1909.

---

Poetry.

THE WAY OF LIFE.

As when a traveller, setting forth,
Is mocked by sudden rain,
And knows not whether to go on
Or turn him back again—
So I, with hesitating mind,
A way of life do strive to find.

And as the traveller distraught,
Beneath broad-hanging trees,
Seeks for a while from wind and rain
A little sheltered ease—
So I, by questionings opprest,
Seek for some quiet place to rest.

And as the traveller, knowing not
The storm has long time ceased,
Because the rain has pierced the leaves,
Believes the storm's increased—
So I in quiet places find
There is no rest for troubled mind.

And as the traveller, passing on,
In due time gladly sees
That what he thought was growing storm
Was only rain-drenched trees—
So I my way of life do find
By leaving shelter far behind.

ST. JOHN G. ERVINE.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

READERS will be interested to learn that since he wrote "The Showing up of Blanco Posnet," the "simple and even crude melodrama" banned by the censor, Mr. Bernard Shaw has finished another drama which bears the title, "Press Cuttings, Compiled from the Correspondence and Editorial Columns of the Daily Press." The new play deals with "Dreadnoughts," scare-ships, and German invasions, but it centres mainly in a brilliantly ironical discussion of women's suffrage and the idea of universal military service, out of which Mr. Shaw constructs a satirical commentary of modern English politics and social life. The play is in the rollicking vein of "You Never Can Tell," and if the Censor can be induced to pass any play with the slightest relevancy to modern life which is not a vulgarly suggestive travesty of one side of it, it ought to afford much entertainment to the play-going world.

* * *

AMONG Mr. Fisher Unwin's announcements is an important work on French literature by Madame Duclaux (Mary Robinson). It is to be called "The French Procession: A Pageant of Great Writers," and all the most distinguished French men of letters from Racine to Anatole France enter into Madame Duclaux's pageant. Her long residence in France, where she has made the acquaintance of many of the modern writers she studies, as well as the freshness and charm of her former works, both in French and English, leads us to expect from Madame Duclaux a book that is sure to heighten our appreciation of French literature.

* * *

A NEW work by M. Anatole France is announced for early publication by his publishers, Messrs. Calmann-Lévy. It is called "Les Sept Femmes de la Barbe-Bleue, et Autres Contes Merveilleux," and includes a number of tales in the same vein as the author's delightful fairy story "Abeille."

* * *

Two volumes of reminiscences that are likely to interest the religious world are announced for autumn publication by Messrs. Nisbet. Their authors are Mr. Eugene Stock and Miss Agnes Weston, both of whom have been engaged for many years in work of a philanthropic and religious character. Mr. Eugene Stock was secretary of the Church Missionary Society from 1873 to 1906, and the present flourishing state of that institution is largely due to his efforts. He is the author of a "History of the Church Missionary Society," and of a volume of Sunday School lessons which is probably the best manual of its kind in existence. Miss Agnes Weston is known to everybody connected with the Navy as the founder and head of the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth. Her memoirs can hardly fail to throw a good deal of light upon the ideas and motives that influence the lower deck. The same publishers have in preparation a "Life of Bosworth Smith," one of the most successful of Harrow assistant-masters, by Lady Grogan, and "Admiralty Policy and Naval Reform," by Mr. Carlyon Bellairs.

* * *

THE section of Mark Twain's autobiography which has just been published by Messrs. Harper under the title "Is Shakespeare Dead?" is a very entertaining, if not very convincing, book. It seems that Mark Twain was converted to believe the Baconian authorship of the works usually attributed to Shakespeare out of a pure spirit of opposition to the Mississippi pilot under whom he served as pilot-apprentice. His early belief was revived and strengthened upon reading Mr. George Greenwood's "The Shakespeare Problem Restated," and he felt constrained to write the present book as a protest against the "thugs" who still hold that Shakespeare wrote Shakespeare. Mark Twain's main argument is founded upon the thorough and comprehensive knowledge of law that is shown in the plays, though he also emphasises the fact that not a single Stratford inhabitant seems to have remembered the least incident in Shakespeare's early life. Both arguments are presented with Mark Twain's accustomed shrewdness and humor. Mark Twain has little faith in the power of reason to carry conviction. "It took several thousand years," he says, "to convince our fine race—including every splendid intellect in it—that there is no such thing as a witch; it has taken several thousand years to convince that same fine race—including every splendid intellect in it—that there is no such person as Satan; it has taken several centuries to remove perdition from the Protestant Church's program of post-mortem entertainments; it has taken a weary long time to persuade American Presbyterians to give up infant damnation and try to bear it the best they can; and it looks as if their Scotch brethren will still be burning babies in the everlasting fires when Shakespeare comes down from his perch." Admitting most of this, we may still hold that there is rather more evidence for Shakespeare than for witches, or infant damnation.

* * *

A HISTORY of "Explorers in the New World Before and After Columbus" is to be published next month by Messrs. Longmans. The author, Mrs. McMurrough Mulhall, deals at length with the story of the Jesuit missions in Paraguay, her work being partly based upon researches in the Vatican records. She is the first woman to whom permission was given by Leo XIII. to work in the Vatican library.

* * *

WITHIN the next couple of weeks Messrs. Macmillan will issue Mr. Theodore Jervey's work on "Robert Y. Hayne and His Times." English readers may be pardoned for knowing but little of General Hayne and Mr. Jervey admits that few, if any, of the public men of the United States have been so neglected by students of history. Even to the average American he is only known as the man who gave rise to one of Daniel Webster's greatest oratorical triumphs. Hayne, however, seems to have played a great part in Southern politics during the early years of the Union, and it is mainly in this aspect that he is considered in Mr. Jervey's study. Messrs. Macmillan have also in the press the final volume of their great "Cambridge Natural History," which was first undertaken about sixteen years ago. The volume now promised deals with the Crustacea, and is edited by Dr. Harmer and Mr. A. E. Shipley.

* * *

THE National Home Reading Union has this year decided to hold its annual summer assembly in London, and a series of lectures and excursions will begin on June 14th next and continue throughout the week. The aims of the Union are to guide readers in their choice of books, to direct and assist self-education, and as far as possible to unite its members into a great reading guild. The bibliographical lists it issues are of distinct value, and the general activity of the Union is of a most useful kind.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Oxford Lectures on Poetry." By A. C. Bradley. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"Essays in Freedom." By H. W. Nevinson. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"The Condition of England." By C. F. G. Masterman. (Methuen. 6s.)

"No Refuge but in Truth." By Goldwin Smith. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Nelson and Other Naval Studies." By J. R. Thursfield. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"The Turkish People." By Lucy M. J. Garnett. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"English Literature in the Nineteenth Century." By Laurie Magnus. (Melrose. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Human Economics." By A. H. Gibson. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Giuseppe Baretti and His Friends." By L. C. Morley. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Calvin in His Letters." By the Rev. H. F. Henderson. (Dent. 1s. 6d. net.)

"Round the Lake Country." By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. (MacLehose. 5s. net.)

"Sir Guy and Lady Rannard." By H. N. Dickson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Madame du Barry: D'après Documents Authentiques." Par Claude Saint André. (Paris: Paul. 5 fr.)

"Hippolyte Taine: Essai d'une Biographie Intellectuelle." Par A. Laborde-Milaà. (Paris. Perrin. 3 fr. 50.)

"Contes de Caliban." Par Emile Bergerat. (Paris. Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE OVERPLUS OF WEALTH.*

By an undesigned coincidence Mr. J. A. Hobson has given to the world a theoretical exposition of the principles of democratic finance at the very moment at which Mr. Lloyd George has been administering a practical demonstration. But if Mr. Hobson's work on the industrial system is a profound justification of the principles of the Budget, it contains in it the germ not of this Budget only, but of a series, and, indeed, of a scheme of social reform connected through the medium of finance with the first principles of economic theory. Few things are more significant of the undeveloped state of general education on matters of public concern than the impression made by Mr. Harold Cox's clever dialectics on such questions as the taxation of the unearned increment. But if we boil down Mr. Cox's arguments to their essence, they amount to this—that the enhanced value of land is not the only form of unearned increment, nor is "rent" the only kind of income into which "social value" enters as a factor. All this the reader will find between the covers of Mr. Hobson's volume, but he will find it treated at a level of analysis which lies entirely beyond the reach of Mr. Cox's word-play. The famous "unearned increment" of land is only one form of what Mr. Hobson calls the "unproductive surplus," but Mr. Hobson's conclusion is not that land should escape, but that the whole of the surplus, so far as ascertainable, should be laid under contribution. In the general conception of a surplus, in fact, Mr. Hobson sees at once an explanation of economic dislocation, of the contrasts of excessive wealth and poverty, and the succession of booms or "slumps," and a basis for practical amelioration by sound finance and constructive social legislation.

His central doctrine may be very briefly stated. It turns on the distinction between "costs" and "surplus." In the normal price of all articles there is an element which is essential to the working of the economic system. Everyone concerned in production must have something for his trouble, and in the long run and on the average he must have enough, or he will cease to produce. How much is "enough"? That is an exceedingly difficult question to answer in general terms. It depends on a thousand different factors, on the kind of energy put into the work, on the cost of living, on the social position of the particular producer, and the ideas and standards current in his class. But for the moment we are concerned not with the application, but with the general idea, and we can clearly understand what Mr. Hobson means when he defines the cost of a given factor in production as that which is necessary to maintain it, to induce and enable people to keep up the output of energy of brain or hand, for example, upon which that factor depends. This being understood, we can follow easily his further step, which is that everything beyond this cost may be regarded as a "surplus." Why there should ordinarily be a surplus—why the price of an article should exceed its cost is not at first sight so easy to say. Some have attributed the whole margin to the rent of land; others to other causes. It is the great merit of Mr. Hobson's book that he generalises the conception of surplus, conceives it as a normal incident of exchange, and shows that it depends not on the possession of any single factor in production, but upon any sort of economic advantage which gives its possessor a "pull" and enables him to get the better half of the bargain in an exchange. The surplus then in Mr. Hobson's view does not fall to the landlord class alone, but to the capitalist, the financier, the business manager, sometimes to the professional man, to the artist, and even to the artisan. The essential distinction in Mr. Hobson's economics, and the point is of most far-reaching importance, is not between labor and capital or between capital and land, but between cost and surplus, between that portion of the reward obtainable through exchange which is necessary to maintain and stimulate the energy of the producer, and that which is not necessary. To distinguish these two portions is for Mr. Hobson the foundation of sound finance, and the starting point of constructive social reform. But, to complete this account, a further distinction must be drawn within the surplus itself. Part of it is necessary to stimulate additional output of energy; that is to say, it is necessary for industrial progress. This may be called the productive surplus. The residue is not necessary, and, in fact, while enriching individuals, serves no social purpose. This may be called the unproductive surplus.

The reorganisation of the industrial system turns, according to this view, on the treatment of the unproductive surplus. In the first place the distinction between this and all other elements of wealth is the basis of sound finance. Every tax laid upon costs or on the productive surplus will in greater or less degree hamper industry by diminishing the incentives to production or impairing the efficiency of producers. No tax on the productive surplus, even if it reached 20s. in the £, would have any such effect. It is a tax on unearned income and neither weakens the motives nor increases the difficulties of earning. No doubt in practice the discrimination between what is earned and what is unearned may be a complicated matter, but for the moment we are concerned with theory, and as a matter of theory, we find in Mr. Hobson's distinction of costs and surplus far the best statement available. The problem thus set to democratic finance is that of evolving methods of ear-marking the elements of unproductive surplus in wealth and of concentrating taxation more and more upon them. Not that there is a hint of anything confiscatory in Mr. Hobson's proposals. This taxation is always to be strictly limited by the consideration of the utility of the objects which the proceeds can be made to serve, and this depends on the measure of the collective wisdom. Nothing is gained by the acquirement of public revenue directed to an irrational expenditure on armaments or even on relief works.

On the other hand, in the diversion of the surplus to such objects as serve to nourish the best powers of the mass of the community, or to increase the real collective wealth of society, Mr. Hobson sees the solution of the problems of poverty, including even that of unemployment. He is right, in our opinion, in connecting periodic unemployment with the magnitude of the unproductive surplus, but the particular linkage which he establishes is, to our thinking, questionable. He holds in effect that the very magnitude of the surplus falling at present into private hands is such as to prevent its judicious and useful expenditure. Unable to lay out his income in enjoyment, the rich man is driven to accumulate more and more capital. The result is a greater aggregation of fixed capital than is actually required by the public economy, and a consequent period of general over-production, followed by a "slump" in which accumulation is arrested and equilibrium is temporarily restored. This is an interesting and original theory, but leaves some serious questions unanswered. To mention one only, we find it difficult to understand why if the means of production are thus cheapened there should not be a responsive demand for the necessaries with which after all the mass of the people are insufficiently supplied. The only answer that suggests itself is that the lines of profitable investment are not clearly seen, and this will be more readily intelligible if we conceive the surplus wealth of the rich as devoted to the production and enjoyment of luxuries in undue proportion, as compared with necessaries. If we apply Mr. Hobson's guiding principle and rank "necesseries" among the elements of cost as including all things that tend to maintain and stimulate production; and "luxuries" as all things that have no such effect, it is natural to infer that it is the employment of too great a proportion of our energy on luxuries that will tend to defeat itself in time by causing a general arrest of producing activity, and it is then quite easy to understand that the diminished consumption of luxuries which the stoppage directly necessitates will render possible a period of restored activity. This criticism, however, would not invalidate Mr. Hobson's main result, which is that all proposals for the relief of unemployment must ultimately be judged by their effect on the standard of life in the community as a whole. The diversion of the surplus "either directly into wages, or into public expenditure for steady purposes of popular support and progress is the only method of securing full and regular employment."

It is always difficult to estimate the effect of a contemporary work of high originality, and we think it probable that Mr. Hobson's theory still admits of many modifications of varying degrees of importance. But we shall be surprised if it does not make a deep impression on the course of thought. Resting on an analysis of the social and individual elements in wealth which cuts far below the ordinary conceptions alike of socialism and of individualism it offers a firmer theoretical ground than we can find elsewhere in economic literature for the work of the social reformer and the democratic statesman.

* "The Industrial System: An Inquiry into Earned and Unearned Income." By J. A. Hobson. Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.

THE STAGE IN THE PAST.*

THERE are signs on every side that English drama is to be given another chance to justify its existence. On the one hand is the growing and prosperous scheme for a National Theatre, on the other there is the promise of two Repertory Theatres which are to be in action in the course of the next twelve months; but of all signs and omens by far the best is the new spirit that has breathed on the dry bones of English playwriting, bringing the theatre once more into some recognisable relation with life. Robertson, who worked in the 'sixties was, perhaps, the herald of the new day; but one cannot say that his plays had a permanent influence. We fell back into the night of melodrama and false sentiment till the coming of Ibsen; and there are many who will recollect the fury with which the sincerity of Ibsen was greeted by some of our dramatic critics. Ibsen's work was not a commercial success; it is possible that a few of his more fervent admirers damaged their cause by regarding the master as a prophet, which he was not, instead of being content to announce him as a great dramatist, and the influence which he exercised on certain English playwrights was largely of a mechanical kind. Those interested in the theatre will no doubt recall half-a-dozen plays which were in their day thought very daring and very original because certain well-known and accustomed tricks were abandoned; because, for instance, the old "tableau" at the end of the last act was omitted, and the characters were not lined-up, in appropriate attitudes, across the stage. But in reality the pill was the old, old pill of melodrama and convention and false sentiment; the "Ibsenism" was merely a thin coating that might deceive the eye for a moment, but could not disguise the after-taste of ancient and familiar dramatic drugs. Or in other cases we had a curious "mixed" drama; out of a dozen characters three, let us say, might be real human beings, while the rest were theatre "mannequins"; and the writer has seen a piece in which the hero wavered from act to act, beginning his stage career as a character of farce, flickering into humanity for a brief instant, and finally shuddering back into the impossible. It has been the work of Mr. Bernard Shaw and of Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker to give us a theatre which it is possible to take seriously; and the Court management has, it may be said, brought into being a school of dramatists who may have limitations, pre-occupations, mistaken ideas on many subjects; but who are at all events in earnest, who write plays that deserve serious attention and serious criticism. And now, as has been said, we are within measurable distance of the Repertory Theatre; and we may hope that the "long-run" system, which is bad for the play and often ruinous to the player, has done its worst.

At such a point as this in our theatrical history, it is interesting to look back on the past, and lovers of the stage will find a great deal of informing and entertaining matter in "A History of Theatrical Art," by Karl Mantzius, the fifth volume of which has just appeared. In France the author is chiefly occupied with the influence of Voltaire, in England Quin and Garrick are his prominent figures, but his best chapters are those which deal with the dim and strange origins of the German stage, now so accomplished and illustrious:—

> "Germany was overrun by English, French, Dutch, and Italian acting companies. Some of these obtained permanent Court appointments, others toured from place to place. Some of them preserved their nationality, others gradually assimilated themselves to their German public. At last independent German companies ('bands') were formed.
>
> "The plays were of the most easily intelligible sort. English actors presented coarse and popular adaptations of famous plays from their own country, even of Shakespearean pieces, copiously intermixed with dances, music, and acrobatic tricks, things that everybody could understand; Italians as a rule gave operas, but also improvised plays, with harlequins' lazzi; the Dutch performed farces and pantomimes; the French the plays of their own great dramatists, Molière, Racine, and Corneille, as well as lighter plays, by Destouches, Dufresny, &c., and French ballets."

The whole German stage in those days offers a good many analogies to the "booth" or "portable" of modern England, which, compared with the regular theatre, is as a daubed copy to a masterpiece. And as the English booth is usually a "family concern," so, in Germany, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there were actor-families, of which "all members of both sexes, from fathers and mothers down to the infants of three years, had to share in the stage work, to unite their efforts in what was mostly a hard fight to earn their bread." The plays acted by these strollers were not of a very high order. One was called "The Vicious Life of the Ill-famed Rogue, John Sheppard, in London, His Extraordinary Practices and Shameful End, with Harlequin, a merry, faint-hearted, and luckily hanged assistant in the Thieves' Guild." Another play was "The Feats and Death of Charles XII.," from which the following extract is given. Charles soliloquises:—

> "Almighty Ruler of this immense earth! . . . Who am I? Lord, Thy slave. . . . Charles XII., a son of Charles Gustavus (to whom the Swedish throne had been bequeathed by Queen Christina of world-wide fame), was my father, and my mamma was Ulrica Eleonora, daughter of Frederick III. of Denmark, whom he begat by Sophia Amelia, Princess of Brunswick-Lüneburg, who on the 19th of June, 1682, gave me birth between 7-8 in the morning, to the joy of the whole Swedish Kingdom."

It is not surprising to find that these plays were performed with a sort of Chinese ceremonial. The Hauptagent, or principal actor, had to learn certain "sublime movements"; kings had to acquire a series of curls and twirls of the sceptre, and novices were obliged to pass an examination in "sceptre action." The principals were always arranged on the stage in a semi-circle, with fixed rules for the manner in which this semi-circle was to be entered and to be left; the diction was an "ever-recurring crescendo, beginning with an ominous murmur" and ending in "an inarticulate roar." Scenery was sometimes confined to two pieces of wall-paper; yellow for interiors and green for the open air. Costume, too, was primitive:—

> "Lace collars and cuffs were cut out of white paper; the gold embroideries were cut out of gold paper and sewn on the stuff; the princesses wore no stockings in their shoes, and the heroes had to content themselves with old worn-out wigs."

Frau Schröder, a successful actress, left a company in 1741 because the management refused to increase her salary to nine shillings a week; and it may be pointed out that about 1831 Mr. Crummles paid very little more than this, and that after his day a provincial actor was content with twelve shillings a week and happy on fifteen shillings. Such were the beginnings of the theatrical art in Germany.

A very interesting topic is suggested by a certain plate in the English section of the book. The plate in question shows Quin in the part of Coriolanus. A preposterous helmet with a preposterous plume waving from it adorns his head; he wears a full-bottomed wig and his coat is a mad exaggeration of the fashion of the period, the skirts being distended by a kind of crinoline of wicker-work. He has just descended from a gilt armchair to welcome his weeping mother, who kneels at his feet in a dress which suggests the Widow Wadman. Dr. Mantzius points out very well that Garrick's usual stage costume—the ordinary evening-dress of his period—represented a distinct reform; and, of course, the mad disguise in which Quin and his contemporaries appeared was a late seventeenth century corruption, borrowed from France. In Shakespeare's day correct costume was at least attempted, sometimes with sad results. Thus, in 1634, "Cromes, a broker in Long Acre," was committed by the Master of the Revels to the Marshalsea "for lending a church robe with the name of Jesus upon it, to the players in Salisbury Court, to present a flamen, a priest of the heathens." And, to go back to earlier days, the Mystery and Morality players were costumed with a certain propriety. Miss Hamilton Moore, author of "English Miracle Plays and Moralities," tells us that "saints wore

* "A History of Theatrical Art in Ancient and Modern Times." By Karl Mantzius. Volume V. "The Great Actors of the Eighteenth Century." Duckworth. 10s. net.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW BOOK by C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND is the title of Mr. MASTERMAN'S new book, which is one of enthralling interest and indispensable to the student of the new social and industrial conditions. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE TURKISH PEOPLE, by LUCY GARNETT, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net., is a description of the life and customs of the modern Turks.

The two following books will be published on June 3—

THE PYRENEES, by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., contains many Maps and Plans by the author, and is published at 7s. 6d. net. It is historical, descriptive, reminiscent, anecdotal, practical, geographical, political and literary.

ENGLISH COSTUME, by GEORGE CLINCH, is the latest volume of "The Antiquary's Books." It is full of illustrations and is published at 7s. 6d. net. The author traces the subject from prehistoric times to the end of the eighteenth century.

On June 10 will be published IN UNKNOWN TUSCANY, by EDWARD HUTTON, with Illustrations in Colour. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. An account of a summer spent among the peasants in Southern Tuscany. It is full of delightful descriptions of the Italian country side.

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published a new novel by M. E. FRANCIS, entitled GALATEA OF THE WHEATFIELD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. A new novel of the Sahara, where cultivation merges into the vast desolation which fascinates the European. Here the woman meets the desert man who would lead her farther. How far she goes is the theme of the story. The demand for this book, by the author of "The Garden of Allah," is very great. A Second Edition is printing.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. With 4 illustrations in Colour and others from Photographs. Crown 8vo, 6s. This is a most entrancing story of motoring in England, in which topography and love are delightfully blended. A Second Edition is ready.

GENERAL LITERATURE

NAPOLEON'S MARSHALS. By R. P. DUNN-PATTISON. With twenty Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"Written with admirable balance of narrative and appreciation. The whole band stands dramatically defined—a marvellous galaxy of military talent."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE BLUE BIRD: a Fairy Play in Five Acts. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. F'cap. 8vo, deckle edges, 3s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.

"We remain spellbound by the charm of the play. It will haunt its readers for many a day."—Times.

ENCHANTERS OF MEN. By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE. 10s. 6d. net. Contains vivid studies of twenty-three beautiful, witty, and fascinating women. It is finely illustrated.

THE BRETONS AT HOME. By FRANCES M. GOSLING. 10s. 6d. net. A charming book, descriptive of Breton peasant life, with its rich harvest of legend and history. It is profusely illustrated in colour and from photographs.

A SUMMER IN TOURAINE. By FREDERIC LEES. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, and 87 from Photographs. Also a Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This magnificently illustrated book is a complete and absorbing description of France's most delightful province.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. In 6 vols. crown 8vo, 6s. each.

Volume VI. This volume completes the translation of this great book.

WALKS IN PARIS. By GEORGES CAIN. Translated by A. R. ALLINSON. With 118 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This is a delightful medley of description, gossip, and antiquarian lore.

DRUGS AND THE DRUG HABIT. By H. SAINSBURY, M.D., F.R.C.P. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The object of this book is to define the postition of the drug, to show its use and its abuse, and to discuss the broad lines upon which prevention and cure of disease should proceed.

DANTE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.

An account of the connection of Dante with English literature, quoting all the references to the great poet from Chaucer to the death of Cary in 1844.

CRIMINAL TYPES IN SHAKESPEARE. By AUGUST GOLL. Translated by Mrs. CHARLES WEEKES. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

This book reviews the great criminals of the plays, and shows how Shakespeare, by his genius, was fully up to the modern standard of criminal psychology.

A HOLIDAY IN CONNEMARA. By STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A sunny human book, full of pretty word pictures, and studded with natural stories. Everywhere the book is touched with sympathy and insight."—Daily Telegraph.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ROYAL NAVY. By DAVID HANNAY. Vol. II. 1689-1815. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This is the second and completing volume of Mr. Hannay's well-known history of the Royal Navy. It commences with the year 1689, and carries the history down to the year 1815.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF IGNEOUS ROCKS. By ALFRED HARKER, M.A., F.R.S., Fellow of St. John's College, and Lecturer in Petrology in the University of Cambridge. With 112 Diagrams and 2 Plates. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

RAMBLES IN SUSSEX. By F. G. BRABANT. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The rambles are real walks and rides, arranged so as to include the whole of the county, their main objects being (1) to observe and describe the characteristic features of the scenery, adding simple explanations of their causes, not expressed in technical language; (2) to give a short account of every old building, and an adequate description of all important ones; (3) to relate clearly and accurately the very interesting historical and literary associations of the county. The illustrations will include reproductions of six of Turner's Sussex views, recently sold at Christie's.

MONMOUTHSHIRE. By G. W. WADE, D.D., and J. H. WADE, M.A., Authors of "Somerset." With 32 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Small pott 8vo, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Little Guides.

FICTION

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND, and other illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE LIGHTING CONDUCTOR. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, 1s. net. [Second Edition.

THE OXFORD YEAR. By OONA H. BALL, Author of "Barbara Goes to Oxford." With 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GALATEA OF THE WHEATFIELD. By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. Blundell), Author of "Hardy-on-the-Hill." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL. By BERNARD CAPES. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.

"A fine piece of craftsmanship, full of colour and thrilling."—Sketch.

"A romance of romances. Not for one moment does the interest flag; the story is told with the most fascinating skill."—Bystander.

"An original work, romantic and moving. Mystery, passion, romance, the book is full of them all."—Times.

"Mr. Capes is at his best in this rich and powerful book."—Morning Leader.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.

"Mrs. Croker is always amusing; her theme is made fresh and vivid, and Katherine herself is delightful."—Standard.

"The charm is the tenderness of the human touch throughout."—Liverpool Post.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.

"Wholesome and invigorating from first to last."—Scotsman.

TO BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY

AN HONEST MAN. By R. H. BRETHERTON, Author of "The Mill." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 3.

THE BISHOP AND THE LADY. By MARTIN LUTRELL SWAYNE. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 10.

DEEP SEA WARRIORS. By BASIL LUBBOCK. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 10.

WATCHERS BY THE SHORE. By J. E. PATTERSON. Author of "Fishers of the Sea." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 24.

gilded wigs and sometimes beards, nor were wings forgotten for the surpliced angels. Caiaphas and Annas went in bishops' rochets, our Lady had her crown. . . . . The souls of the saved at Doomsday went in white, those of the damned in black and yellow." The devil had great horns, and demons wore coats of horsehair, to make them look like hairy monsters. At the present time costume is carefully studied, and the chief fault to be found with the production of an historical piece in London is that the dresses are far too good. Paradox rules on the stage as elsewhere; and it is curious that "the real thing" seldom looks real. The color scheme is the great matter; once this is obtained the cheaper the stuffs the better the effect. The cheapest velveteen will look better than the costliest velvet, the tapestries should come from the scene-painter's shop, and not from baronial castles, and Persian carpets for the stage are best manufactured, not in the Orient, but with some coarse canvas and plenty of red and blue and green paint.

The translation by Louise von Cossel is on the whole very well done. Here and there one finds a slip. The death of Adrienne Lecouvreur was not "mystic," though it was certainly mysterious; and the phrase "forfeit him five shillings" is rather American than English.

THE MANSFIELD SCHOOL.*

The Anglican communion is not co-extensive with the English Church, nor its distinctive teaching with English Christianity. We should rather speak of the English Church, Established and Free: an estimate of English religion which left the Nonconformist Churches out of the reckoning would take the part for the whole. The historical State Church is the inheritor of a great tradition: it represents the nation on the religious side with dignity; Englishmen of a certain temperament and training find their natural home in its fold. But it takes all sorts to make a people. The decorous and academic atmosphere of Anglicanism has never been congenial to Celts—Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and Cornwall have failed to acclimatise themselves to it—while, in England proper, a large proportion of the religious middle and lower classes is drawn to a more bracing air. Préférons, n'excluons pas. The British Church is larger than the several bodies, Episcopalian and Presbyterian, which compose it, and between which an interior unity subsists in spite of differences of organisation and under different confessions of faith. From another point of view, English theology could ill afford to lose the contributions of non-Episcopalian Churchmen. The book before us strikes a note at once strong, free, and spiritual, which contrasts with the caution, almost amounting to meticulosity, which characterises much Anglican divinity. This too often gives the impression of an elaborate process of clearing the throat, preparatory to utterance. Here is is not so. The Mansfield divines have something to say, and they say it out plainly; confident of the faith that is in them:—

> "That doubts not seekers find, and at the last
> The single-hearted needs must see the King."

This is the standpoint in which the English mind at its best acquiesces, as satisfying the legitimate demands both of heart and head. Neither can be overlooked, because the distinction between the two is not real, but rational; man is one.

The eighteen essays cover a varied subject matter—theological, historical, economical; "other unity we have not aimed at than this, that the essays and studies should fall within that broad and generous conception of theology and religion for which you have always stood." This outlook is characteristic of that large view of science, as something over and above the partial sciences which constitute it, which is making way among us. The technical scholar is indispensable: we can never with impunity anticipate the ultimate, leaving the intermediate steps untaken. But his labor subserves a more comprehensive end than his own. Knowledge is not a series of monographs; the master student is he who can combine, unify, and breathe life into the results achieved in their several fields by other men.

As dealing with questions of special interest to the Church of our own time, the essays on "The Religious Principle of Congregationalism," on "The Eucharist in the Early Church," and on "The New Testament doctrine of the Atonement in the light of the Historico-Critical method," may be singled out. In spite of the tide of medievalism, now on the ebb, which made the last century ecclesiastically one of reaction, no serious scholar asserts the divine institution either of Episcopacy or of its outcome—and destroyer—the Papacy. "That the order and government of the primitive Christian Chuch was Congregational may now be regarded as beyond controversy." Hooker, with the Canons of 1604, maintains, not that the Episcopalian form of Church government is essential, but that it is not unlawful. The Bidding Prayer speaks of the Church of Scotland as "pure and apostolical"; at none of the various attempts to introduce Episcopacy into that country was there any question of the re-ordination of Scottish presbyters; the leading English divines communicated freely with the non-Episcopal Churches abroad. And with great propriety. The development of Christian organisation, as of Christian doctrine, was a matter of circumstances and expediency; no religious founder, it has been said, ever left so much to be done by his followers as Christ.

What brought about the transformation of primitive Christianity into Catholicism was the material growth of the community; from a little flock it became a mixed multitude; dogma, organisation, ceremonial seemed indispensable for a World Church. Those things were not the creation of a priesthood—this is a Voltairean fallacy; they were not invented; they grew. Nor had the Reformers of the sixteenth century, though they wished to correct abuses, any thought of getting rid of the external fabric of Christendom. Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, and our own Elizabethan statesmen, nothing was further from their intentions than to place the Government of the Church in the hands of "the common man." Congregationalism stands for another principle; hence the opposition which it encountered. It took the Anabaptist ground, presupposing "that the members of a Christian Church shall be Christian people, and that to such are entrusted the rights and privileges both of Church government and Church discipline." It is an immense assumption; and, if it be objected that it is unwarranted, the Congregationalist will probably answer not only that it is essential to New Testament theology, but that man becomes Christian by being treated as such, that "to believe all things" is the first step towards the attainment of the end desired. He may also fairly urge that the other Churches are moving in this direction; and say with Dr. Dale:—

> "We take the New Testament seriously. We believe that those whom Christ redeems from 'this present evil world,' and translates into His kingdom, receive a divine life and a divine light, and are taught of God. Congregationalism attributes to every Christian man amazing prerogatives and powers, insists that these are the ground of grave duties, and requires the polity of the Church to be so constructed that every Christian man shall be charged with the responsibility of taking part in the maintenance and defence of the truth of Christ, and in the assertion of His authority."

Nominal or half Christians, however, are not got rid of by ignoring their presence. There ought not to be such persons, but there are, and it is a question whether it is not the wiser course to recognise their existence rather than either to exclude them, or to treat them as if they were what they are not. Each alternative has grave disadvantages. In all the Churches the problem of discipline is one of the most thorny of our time.

No critical theory is more perplexing to the ordinary believer than that recently brought forward, in France by M. Loisy, and in Germany by Johannes Weiss, with regard to the relation between the Last Supper and the Eucharist. The theory in question, if not proved, cannot be dismissed out of hand; and Dr. Bartlet's essay on "The Eucharist in the Early Church" has the merit of exhibiting it in a religious light. These are questions too near the heart of Christendom to bear discussion from a merely critical standpoint—a comparison between the Virgin Birth as treated by Lobstein and by Herzog is suggestive—where to state without comment is to mis-state. It is not meant that feeling can either make or unmake facts—these stand or fall by their evidence; but that feeling gives the perspective and background in and against which the facts stand And

* "Mansfield College Essays." Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.

From CHATTO AND WINDUS'S LIST.

THE WORKS OF ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE

SELECTIONS. 6s.
THE QUEEN-MOTHER; and ROSAMOND. 7s. 6d. net.
ATALANTA IN CALYDON. 6s.
CHASTELARD: a Tragedy. 7s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. First Series. 9s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. Second Series. 9s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. Third Series. 7s.
SONGS BEFORE SUNRISE. 10s. 6d.
BOTHWELL: a Tragedy. 12s. 6d.
SONGS OF TWO NATIONS. 6s.
GEORGE CHAPMAN. (In Vol. II. of G. Chapman's Works.) 3s. 6d.
ESSAYS AND STUDIES. 12s.
ERECTHEUS: a Tragedy. 6s.
A NOTE ON CHARLOTTE BRONTE. 6s.
A STUDY OF SHAKESPEARE. 8s.
SONGS OF THE SPRINGTIMES. 6s.
STUDIES IN SONG. 7s.
MARY STUART: a Tragedy. 8s.
TRISTRAM OF LYONESSE. 9s.
A CENTURY OF ROUNDELS. 8s.
A MIDSUMMER HOLIDAY. 7s.
MARINO FALIERO: a Tragedy. 6s.
A STUDY OF VICTOR HUGO. 6s.
MISCELLANIES. 12s.
LOCRINE: a Tragedy. 6s.
A STUDY OF BEN JONSON. 7s.
THE SISTERS: a Tragedy. 6s.
ASTROPHEL, &c. 7s.
STUDIES IN PROSE AND POETRY. 9s.
THE TALE OF BALEN. 7s.
ROSAMUND, QUEEN OF THE LOMBARDS: a Tragedy. 6s.
A CHANNEL PASSAGE. 7s.
LOVE'S CROSS-CURRENTS. 6s. net.
WILLIAM BLAKE. 6s. net.
THE DUKE OF GANDIA. 5s.
THE AGE OF SHAKESPEARE. 6s. net.

COLLECTED POEMS, in 6 vols., 36s. net the set.
TRAGEDIES, in 5 vols., 30s. net the set.

The ART and LETTERS LIBRARY

Large crown 8vo, cloth, 8 Coloured Plates and 24 Half-tones, 7s. 6d. net per vol. Edition de Luxe, small 4to, printed on pure rag paper, 5 additional Coloured Plates, parchment, 15s. net per vol.

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS FROM VASARI. Collected and arranged by E. L. SEELEY.
ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE: their Stories as set forth by Vasari, Ridolfi, Lanzi, and the Chroniclers. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY.
STORIES OF THE FLEMISH AND DUTCH ARTISTS, from the Time of the Van Eycks to the End of the Seventeenth Century, drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by VICTOR REYNOLDS.
STORIES OF THE ENGLISH ARTISTS, from Van Dyck to Turner (1600-1851). Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by RANDALL DAVIES and CECIL HUNT.
THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. Translated by Prof. T. W. ARNOLD.
WOMEN OF FLORENCE: a Study of their Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento. By Prof. ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. Translated by MARY G. STEEGMANN. With an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. 2 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-tone, large crown 8vo, cloth 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

R. L. STEVENSON'S AN INLAND VOYAGE. Illustrated in Colour and Black-and-White by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net.
NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE-MAKING. By C. J. HOLMES, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

COLOUR BOOKS.

Large foolscap 4to, cloth, 20s. net each.

THE RHINE. By H. J. MACKINDER. With Illustrations in Three Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, and Maps.
SWITZERLAND: the Country and its People. By CLARENCE ROOK. With 56 Illustrations in Three Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, and 24 in Two Tints.
THE COLOUR OF LONDON. By Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A. With Introduction by M. H. SPIELMANN, F.S.A., and Illustrations in Three Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO.
THE COLOUR OF PARIS. By MM. LES ACADEMICIENS GONCOURT. Translated by M. D. FROST. Edited by LUCIEN DESCAVES. With Introduction by M. L. BENEDITE. Illustrated in Three Colours and Sepia by YOSHIO MARKINO.
CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, Litt.D. With Illustrations in Three Colours by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S.
ASSISI OF ST. FRANCIS. By Mrs. ROBERT GOFF. With Introduction by J. KERR LAWSON. Illustrations in Three Colours by Colonel R. GOFF, and Reproductions of the chief Franciscan Paintings.
DEVON: ITS MOORLANDS, STREAMS, AND COASTS. By LADY ROSALIND NORTHCOTE. With 60 Illustrations in Three Colours by F. J. WIDGERY.
THE GREATER ABBEYS OF ENGLAND. By the Right Rev. ABBOT GASQUET. With 60 Illustrations in Three Colours by WARWICK GOBLE.

THE SULTAN AND HIS SUBJECTS. By RICHARD DAVEY. With Photogravure Portrait, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE RUSSIAN BASTILLE

(THE FORTRESS OF SCHLUESSELBURG.)

By I. P. YOUVATSHEV. Translated by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT,
Author of 'The Curse of the Romanovs.' Demy 8vo, cloth, with 16 Plates, 7s. 6d. net.

The author, a Russian naval officer of considerable talent and erudition, was suspected by the Government as one of the 'thinking officers,' and suffered two years' solitary confinement in Schluesselburg. He gives a graphic description of the inmates of the prison, whose tragic fate invariably concluded in the madness or suicide which only a strong will enabled the author to escape.

THE PARADISE OR GARDEN OF THE HOLY FATHERS. Being Histories of the Anchorities, Recluses, Cœnobites, Monks, and Ascetic Fathers of the Deserts of Egypt between A.D. CCL. and CCCC. circiter. Compiled by ATHANASIUS, Archbishop of Alexandria; PALLADIUS, Bishop of Helenopolis; SAINT JEROME, and others. Translated out of the Syriac, with Notes and Introduction, by E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, M.A., Keeper of Assyrian and Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum. Two vols. large crown 8vo, with Frontispiece Reproductions from the Syriac MS., 15s. net.

OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS, as Translated out of the Latin by RICHARD WHYTFORD (A.D. 1556). Re-edited into modern English with an Historical Introduction by WILFRID RAYNAL, O.S.B. With Reproductions in Four Colours, and Decorations in Line, after Water-Colours by W. RUSSELL FLINT. The binding after a fine Sixteenth Century example. Large crown 8vo, with 8 Plates in 4-Colour, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, crown 4to, pure rag paper, with four additional Plates in 4-Colour, bound in Parchment, 15s. net; also in whole pigskin with clasps, copying the Sixteenth Century binding, 25s. net.

ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY (New Vols.). 2s. net, cloth; 3s. net, leather.
STEVENSON'S ESSAYS OF TRAVEL.
W. S. GILBERT'S ORIGINAL PLAYS. 3 vols.

THE ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE PARIS SALON FOR 1909. With over 300 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 3s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE JUNE PRINCESS. By Constance Smedley.
THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN. By Peter Lauristoun.
IDOLATRY. By Alice Perrin.
A QUESTION OF MEANS. By M. B. Cross.
A CASTLE OF DREAMS. By Netta Syrett.
THE ROAD OF NO RETURN. By A. C. Inchbold.
THE MERRY HEART. By Frank Swinnerton.
JULIAN REVELSTONE. By Justin McCarthy.
A ROGUE OF RYE. By Willmott Dixon.

London: CHATTO and WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS

NOW READY OR DURING JUNE.

| | | | Gallery. | Colour Surface. | Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| ITALIAN SERIES. | | | | | |
| No. XIV. | MANTEGNA. | M'na, Child and Cherubim ... ... | Milan ... | 20½ × 16¾ ... | 17s. 6d. net. |
| ,, XV. | TITIAN. | Bacchus and Ariadne ... ... | London ... | 25 × 23 ... | *25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XVI. | CARPACCIO. | Vision of S. Ursula ... ... ... | Venice ... | 27 × 26¼ ... | *25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XIX. | RAPHAEL. | M'na della Colonna ... ... ... | Berlin ... | 22 × 16¼ ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ENGLISH SERIES. | | | | | |
| Eng. III. | HOPPNER. | Countess of Oxford ... ... ... | London ... | 19¼ × 15½ ... | 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, IV. | ROMNEY. | Lady Hamilton with a Goat ... | ... ... ... | 25 × 20 ... | †*21s. 0d. ,, |
| NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES. | | | | | |
| N.P.S. II. | Unknown. | William Shakespeare ... ... | Stratford ... | 18 × 13¼ ... | †12s. 6d. ,, |
| FLEMISH SERIES. | | | | | |
| Fl. VI. | VERMEER. | The Pearl Necklace ... ... ... | Berlin ... | 21⅛ × 18 ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, VII. | TERBORCH. | The Concert ... ... ... ... | ,, ... | 21¾ × 17⅛ ... | †*15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VIII. | Q. MATSYS. | The Magdalen ... ... ... ... | Antwerp .. | 17¾ × 11¾ ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, III. | FRANZ HALS. | A Family Group ... ... ... | London ... | 24¾ × 14¾ ... | *21s. 0d. ,, |

* Postage of Prints STARRED, 9d.; of all others, 6d. (three or less in parcel). † Signifies that prices will be raised on publication.

List post-free. The COMPLETELY ILLUSTRATED Catalogue, with particulars of Annual Subscription, Frames, &c., Three Stamps.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, London, W.

here, as throughout, evolution is the key to the thought process; the medieval doctrine of the Eucharist is the shape which the Eucharistic idea took, and took necessarily, in the mind of the time. Each successive age interprets its inheritance; and medievalism, it must be remembered, was a reaction consequent on the fall of the old civilisation. The threads that had been dropped were taken up at the Renaissance; the modern is akin rather to the ancient than to the medieval mind.

The traditional doctrine of the Atonement is as great a crux in the Reformed Churches as is that of the Eucharist in the unreformed. At the Reformation it stood for a protest against the sacerdotal view of Christianity; and brought the individual into immediate relation with Christ. The ethical difficulties which beset it were then not obvious; it needed a prophetic soul to see, with an early Baptist writer, that "the sacrifice of Christ's body doth not reconcile God unto us, which did never hate us nor was our enemy, but reconcileth us to God." Mr. Andrews gives an admirable summary of those Jewish notions without a knowledge of which it is impossible to understand the later doctrine, concluding that, though Jewish thought cannot explain the origin of the latter, it is quite certain that Jewish thought influenced its interpretation. The main question is answered by him much as it was by Jowett fifty years ago:—

> "The essential element for us is the simple fact—Christ died for our sins. The New Testament writers asked, as they were bound to ask, What does this statement imply? In what way does Christ's death avail for our forgiveness? And they answered these questions in their own way, using, of course, the categories of their own age. We are not necessarily bound either by their explanation or the terms they used. We can take the same fact, and work out its philosophy for ourselves. If we prefer to use the terminology of Kant instead of the language of the ancient sacrifices, there is nothing to prevent us. Two provisos must, however, be firmly insisted upon. First, the surrender of the particular interpretation must not involve the surrender of its basal part. And secondly, the alternative for us is not between the interpretation of Paul and something lower and inferior. The only alternative open to us is between the interpretation of Paul and something of equivalent value in the language of modern thought."

Since "Contentio Veritatis" nothing so stimulating has been published in English theology. We do not include Scottish under this head.

SAVAGES.*

A DIRECT and authoritative piece of journalism, Mr. Fraser's latest book should appeal to every class of the community that is interested—and who is not?—in the study of anthropology. The volume is stuffed with information relating to the many quaint subjects of the King. It contains lively accounts of practically all the savage peoples under British protection, of their appearance, and of their manners and customs where these are mentionable; and it comes with special authority from one who has travelled and "roughed it" in many distant quarters of the earth. Mr. Fraser frankly admits that for some of the intimate details of certain tribes he is indebted to other travellers and other books; but the fact that his pages are in part compilation does not dispose of his first-hand observation and experience in the other part, which are in themselves a qualification for dealing with the whole subject. Additional popularity is likely to accrue to the work by reason of the light and often amusing style in which it is written. Much of the material is funny in itself—to the Western and civilised mind at any rate—and the author's sense of humor does not lose its opportunities. Besides this, while there is no serious attempt to deal with the philosophical questions involved in a comparison of the living races of mankind, many of the facts revealed suggest openings for philosophic discussion.

Nearly every tribe in Africa, Asia, Australia, and the Pacific islands, to which reference is made, is distinguished by some curiosity in the way of custom or belief. The Kachins, a hill-tribe of Burma, outdo all others as regards their explanations of certain natural phenomena. They believe, for instance, that an eclipse is a dog attempting to swallow the moon. Earthquakes are ascribed to the wrigglings of crocodiles in the sea that is under the earth. In Hausaland lunatics are allowed to help themselves to what they fancy in the market; a way of shifting the responsibility of their upkeep from the state to the individual, that hardly commends itself as a fair one to the average civilised mind. The Andamanese have a passion for adopting each other's children, for no other reason apparently but domestic variety. Nobody is expected to attend a Nicobarese funeral unless he or she is accompanied by a pig as a contribution to the subsequent festivities. There is quite a Gilbertian touch about the hygienic conditions of the Fiji prison. The building is walled on three sides only, the fourth being left open so that the prisoners can enjoy a walk to the hills when they feel the need of exercise; and such is the attraction of the life of incarceration with hard labor that they invariably return. What constitutes family relationship is a matter of different opinions in different countries; but—in this connection—our own little list of forbidden marriage alliances pales in significance before the corresponding category of the gentle savage. By the time one has finished with tribal and sub-tribal disabilities and totemship regulations, the choice of any one would seem, in most cases, to be limited to one or two persons. The "woman" question is, of course, an important one among the colored dependents of this Empire, but in regard to its treatment there is seemingly not much progression to record. In the country about the river Niger a lady selected for marriage is carefully fattened before the ceremony, her husband's æsthetic taste demanding this style of beautification above all others. She is also painted red, as soon as affianced, in order that the young men of the neighborhood may take notice and look elsewhere. Woman's lot in most of the other districts dealt with, whether monogamy or polygamy or polyandry be practised, is somewhat similar, though its details vary in grotesqueness; but a notable exception is the country of Assam, where "women's rights" are respected by the Khasis to the extent of allowing the whole territory to be legally under female ownership, to the utter exclusion of the other sex.

If the men of certain tribes are to be believed, woman has not played the part she should have done in the ordering of their destinies. A New Guinea cannibal, taxed by a European with his malpractices, explained that his tribe first adopted the disgusting habit of eating their neighbors owing to the demand of their wives for this form of meat. The Kayan headhunters allege that they would have remained content with hair-hunting had it not been for the taunting feminine cry for something more substantial. It was woman also who was responsible for tattooing; and almost as bad a charge as any is preferred by Mr. Fraser himself on p. 284, when he states that the preservation, and perhaps the development, of the Zulu tongue—which boasts the astonishing vocabulary of 20,000 words—is chiefly due to the women, "whose vocabulary is far in excess of that of the men." However, the attractiveness of this subject must not be allowed to lead the reviewer astray; more especially as there are dozens of other equally interesting topics dealt with in these pages, which have not yet been even mentioned. Such, for example, are the real nature and functions of the Australian boomerang, an instrument which, one may note in view of the geographical theory that Australia was once united with the Asian continent, is only used by one other race dwelling in southern India; the thieving profession as practised by some tribes on the Indian frontier; the philosophy of savage doctoring; the customs of marriage by capture and coyness, the education of an Indian dancing-girl, the short way with land-crabs, smoke signals in common use, and sundry methods of cooking and currency. The photographs, too, over seventy in number, are very entertaining, and some additional spice is provided by the inclusion of a few reproductions of savage caligraphy.

* "Quaint Subjects of the King." By John Foster Fraser. Cassell. 6s. net.

CAUTIONARY TALES.*

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD and Madame Claire de Pratz are foewomen worthy of one another's steel. These novels, both written with a stern moral purpose, which treat, femininely,

* "Daphne; or Marriage à la Mode." By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Cassell. 6s.
"Elisabeth Davenay." By Claire de Pratz. Mills & Boon. 6s.

ENGLISH REVIEW

No. VII.

JUNE NUMBER NOW READY.

CONTENTS.

Modern Poetry—

"GEORGE MEREDITH, O.M."

JOHN GALSWORTHY. GERALD GOULD.

EDEN PHILPOTTS. EZRA POUND.

| | |
|---|---|
| CAMILLE PELLETAN | La Paix et la Guerre en Europe |
| ELLA D'ARCY - - | "Agatha Blount" |
| P. WYNDHAM LEWIS | Some Innkeepers and Bestre |
| ST. JOHN HANKIN - | A Man of Impulse |
| JOSEPH CONRAD - | Some Reminiscences (part ii—iii) |
| H. M. TOMLINSON - | The Fog |
| OLIVE GARNETT - | A Certainty |
| STEPHEN REYNOLDS | The Holy Mountain |
| THE MONTH: EDITORIAL | The Critical Attitude |
| BRITANNICUS - | The Dominance of the Irish Question |
| H. BELLOC - | On Licensing |
| F. NORREYS CONNELL | John Millington Synge |
| CAMILLE MAUCLAIR | Le Roman Français Contemporain |
| EDWARD THOMAS - | Two Poets |

Price 2/6.

Half-Yearly Volume, July to December, 15/-, should now be ordered in advance.

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

Books of Note.

DEDICATED BY GRACIOUS PERMISSION TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

THE STORY OF THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY, 1661-1902.

By Capt. Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations including 6 Coloured Plates. 2 vols. super-royal 8vo. Edition de Luxe, limited to 40 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary Edition, £3 13s. 6d. net.

"Sir George Arthur has earned the gratitude of all his companions in arms for the manly and spirited fashion in which he has told his stirring story."—Daily Telegraph.

RADIOACTIVITY AND GEOLOGY.

An Account of the Influence of Radioactive Energy on Terrestrial History. By J. JOLY, M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S., Professor of Geology and Mineralogy in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A most fascinating book."—Liverpool Post.

CHAPTERS ON SPANISH LITERATURE.

By J. FITZMAURICE KELLY. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A delightful volume, full of sympathy, learning, and judgment."
—Observer.

"We have no hesitation in saying that this volume forms the most valuable English contribution to Spanish letters since the same author gave us his history of Spanish literature."—Athenæum.

"I have never met with such an illuminating work on Spanish literature."—Mr. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM in the Nation.

ENGLISH HERALDIC BOOK STAMPS.

Figured and Described by CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. About 300 Illustrations. Super-royal 8vo, 25s. net.

This is the first English book on the subject. A detailed Prospectus can be had from the Publishers.

THE DOMINION OF DREAMS.

By FIONA MACLEOD. New Edition, Pocket size. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Shortly.

THE NOVELS AND POEMS OF

GEORGE MEREDITH.

Library Edition, crown 8vo, 6s. Pocket Edition, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ORDEAL OF RICHARD FEVEREL.
BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER.
SANDRA BELLONI
VITTORIA.
THE EGOIST.
EVAN HARRINGTON.
ONE OF OUR CONQUERORS.
LORD ORMONT AND HIS AMINTA.
THE AMAZING MARRIAGE.
DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS.
THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY RICHMOND.
RHODA FLEMING.
THE SHAVING OF SHAGPAT.
THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS.
SHORT STORIES.
POEMS. 2 volumes.
AN ESSAY ON COMEDY.

Full List on application.

THE NEWEST NOVELS.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."

"This most entertaining social comedy."—Times.

"For good, festive, but not facetious novels, it would be hard to beat him."—Observer.

THE STORY OF THYRZA.

By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod."

"A strengthening tale builded of charity, human kindness, and the humour which has tears behind it."—Daily Chronicle.

THE PERJURER.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

Mr. Norris has never written a more delightful story.

THE ACTRESS.

By L. C. HALE. [Shortly.

THE

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.

MIDSUMMER NUMBER. Price 2s. 6d. net.

Contents. [Next Week.

| | |
|---|---|
| G. K. CHESTERTON. | Milton and His Age. |
| Lt.-Col. ALSAGER POLLOCK. | The Officer's Training Corps. |
| Major P. A. B. SILBURN, D.S.O. | The Possible Secession of South Africa. |
| M. M. PATTISON MUIR. | The Prose Romances of William Morris. |
| A. G. D. CRAWSHAY. | An Armenian Household. |
| R. P. HEARNE. | The Universities and Aeronautics. |
| CURE de CAMPAGNE. | A Sunday Dinner-Tab |
| S. C. KAINES SMITH. | Mr. Rackham and The Fairies. |
| C. B. BULL. | Some Aspects of Oxford Athletics. |

Book Reviews, &c.

This Review appears during each Academic Term.

A Specimen Copy may be had on application.

Annual Subscription 8s. 6d. net.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.
10 Orange Street London W.C.

of the grave issues of Marriage, Divorce, the impending subjugation of man by woman, the New Feminism, "men-masters" and woman's duty, make the reviewer feel as though he had strayed into the danger-zone between two Amazon fortresses, each of which is engaged in a furious bombardment of the other. While Madame Claire de Pratz is attacking the hydra-headed evils that arise from woman's dependence on man, Mrs. Humphry Ward is waging war on the Feminists who, she holds, are undermining the sanctity of marriage, the blessed fabric of the family, nay, imperilling the very State itself. To prove their mutually destructive points, the two ladies exalt or abuse their sex's conduct wherever such may help their case. While the Feminist heroine, Elisabeth Davenay, is made an exquisite figure of womanly grace, wisdom, love, charity, and every other virtue, the American Feminist, Daphne, is shown as egoistic, flinty-hearted, and vindictive beyond words. But on one point the two ladies are agreed, viz., that man, however weak and erring he may be, should be pitied rather than despised. And there the agreement ends. The new woman, in Elisabeth Davenay, refuses to marry the masterly André, "because I should no longer be myself, but an integral part of you. . . . I shall no longer be the conscious Elisabeth, but the emotional one"; the new woman, Daphne, after reflecting that there is "no need to cringe any more to the insolence and cruelty of men. A woman's life may be soiled and broken, but in the great human workshop of America it can be repaired," flees away with her child to that great workshop, with the disastrous sequel, to the family, of disease, drink, death, and mental and moral ruin! We are, however, constrained to admit that while Madame Claire de Pratz's shots repeatedly find the target, Mrs. Humphry Ward's shells fly high and burst wide. Of course a masculine reviewer may be prejudiced, but is it not easier to kiss the hand that corrects us than salute it when it hovers, threateningly, over our erring sisters? What ranges us on Madame Claire de Pratz's side, however, is that her book is an interesting treatise disguised as a novel, whereas Mrs. Humphry Ward's work is a particularly feeble novel, crystallising violent polemic in the form of bad art. Her style and treatment are, indeed, so banal and crude that it is only in the book's insistent moral purpose that one recognises the hand that penned "Robert Elsmere."

Roger Barnes, a youthful "Apollo, a magnificent figure of a man . . . possessed of an absurd and superfluous beauty of feature, who has been educated at Eton and Oxford, and belongs to the rich English world," but whose father has failed leaving his widow and son with only a pittance, retrieves the family fortunes on a visit to New York, by wooing and winning the imperious and capricious Daphne Floyd, "the orphan daughter of an enormously rich and now deceased lumber-king." Lumber-kings who leave orphan daughters generally are "deceased," though, as Mr. Floyd was an Irishman, he may possibly have "been an exception." Daphne, poor, sinful child, who is as ready to discuss the relative divorce laws of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania as the girls of fifty years ago were to talk of "Evangeline," is not only handicapped by the Irish blood of her "boastful, mercurial" father, but by the fact that her mother was Spanish, and addicted, as Spanish mothers so often are, to "wild laughter and wilder tears." The attentive student of Mrs. Humphry Ward's novels will scent disaster from these simple premises. And any lingering hope he may cherish is pitilessly dashed when he learns the dark connubial history of Daphne's bosom friend, Mrs. Verrier. The unfortunate Mr. Verrier was a Jew not received in New York society. "Mrs. Verrier couldn't do without society and began to dine out and go to parties by herself. Then people didn't ask her as much as before." Then Mrs. Verrier "and her people began to talk to Mr. Verrier about a divorce. Then one night he took the train to Niagara, and two days afterwards he was found thrown up by the whirlpool, where all the suicides are found." Mrs. Verrier has "poured upon the hapless Daphne" all that wild philosophy of "rights" which Mrs. Humphry Ward, pace Mrs. Fawcett, holds is a most sinister sign of the modern woman's degeneracy. Anyway, Roger and Daphne are united in the bands of holy matrimony, and the cynic might suggest that it is to cut the knot of such ill-assorted unions that the American Divorce Laws have come into being. An interval of three years of transitory bliss, broken by Daphne's fits of temper, is bestowed upon the young couple, before the author rings the curtain up upon a domestic scene at Heston Park, Lady Barnes' ancestral mansion, which Daphne is taking over "at a high rent." And now Art, like the serpent in Eden, whispers to the American Eve that she shall "restore" the family mansion. "Never restore the house of your mother-in-law," is obviously one of the first axioms for a young couple's well-being. But Daphne is an "advanced" woman, and being advanced, she is naturally reckless. Dr. Lelius, the great German art-critic from Würzburg, and she, between them, remove the ugly family portraits, "bad Lelys and worse Highmores," from their sacred places, and hang them in a passage upstairs. Then Daphne snubs the Archdeacon! and outbids the Duchess, for a piece of Sèvres, in the latter's own house. Then Roger flirts, more or less innocently, with an old flame, Mrs. Fairmile, and after months of brooding wrath and jealous tears, and a farcical scene of "assault and cruelty" in a lumber-room, Daphne rushes off to America, bearing with her the child, Beatty, the darling of broken-hearted Roger. By the iniquitous Divorce Law of South Dakota, Daphne is freed from her husband, and given the custody of the child. But, as the journalists say, an avenging Nemesis is at hand. Once the protecting hedge of marriage is broken through, man's foot, we know, slips on the edge of the precipice. "Laissons nous aller à cette loi qui emporte tout dans l'abîme, et il n'y a plus de société, plus d'humanité, plus rien," is the terrible saying with which Mrs. Humphry Ward opens Part III., and she certainly spares no scenes of tears, disease, and death, to freeze our blood at Feminist iniquities. Roger, that young Apollo, takes to the bottle! His letters to Lady Barnes are "simply heart-rending." Then "he seemed to lose his head." Then "in New York he was struck down by influenza and pneumonia." And, to crown all, when Roger's family friends have gathered round him to condole, and the ideal young English wife, Mrs. French, is murmuring re the Dakota Divorce Laws, "When would America—dear, dear America!—see to it that such things were made impossible!" a cable comes from Washington to say that the child, little Beatty, has "died of convulsions!" Mrs. Humphry Ward, one would think, could scarcely beat this stage-managed effect, but the closing chapters are funny beyond words. The wicked Feminist, Mrs. Verrier, established on her invalid couch, in the hotel facing the Falls of Niagara, hears a "plaintive human cry" in the roar of the waters. It is the obsession of her "dumb remorse" for the tragedy of her husband's death. How true to life this is—the remorse of the guilty soul—we are murmuring, when, hey presto! on turning the next page the murder is out. Poor misguided Daphne and the sinister Mrs. Verrier are merely stalking horses for Mrs. Ward's attack on the general "Feminist movement," and "the suffrage camp."

We have not space enough to deal with the awful issues of the guileless tale. In the last fifty pages the atmosphere is that of a hospital for incurables. The innocent characters are all stricken down to show the responsibility of the guilty. Poor Lady Barnes has "a paralytic stroke"; the good person, Mrs. French, has a "nervous break-down." Roger's "terrible attack of septic pneumonia in New York left the heart injured and the lungs weak," and "the drinking habit led to . . . the verdict of phthisis." He, it seems, has "only two years to live," and Daphne, who has just been "shattered" by the anguish and guilt of Mrs. Verrier's death-bed, with her last message—"Marriage is mysterious and wonderful. . . . I have fought a long, long fight, but God is Master—I bless—I adore—" is recalled to England to face "the dark presence of ruin and death, of things damning and irrevocable, which flapped their sombre wings in her face." Vae Victoribus! is the harrowing cry. "The piteous story of little Beatty's last days" is wrung from the now sobbing Suffragist by the maudlin Roger, who remarks, sotto voce, "Marriage is a big thing." The wicked wife, repentant alas! too late, "throws herself on the floor with the cry, 'Roger, let me stay with you!'" but Roger knows better, and the novel closes with a passage eloquent of the intense enjoyment the sin of the transgressor can be made to yield the righteous and the pure in heart. "Where others feel the tragedy of suffering, the pure in heart realise with an infinitely sharper pain the tragedy of guilt." Evidently the author's intense relish

Books of the Season

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE

Uniform with "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. 2 vols. 25s. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"The literature of letters will be searched in vain for a parallel to these volumes. Even the love-letters of the Brownings suffer by comparison."

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF NAPOLEON

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

OBSERVER.—"Full of sparkling interest. . . . M. Turquan's volume is a very amusing and interesting companion."

WHEEL MAGIC

By J. W. ALLEN. With a Dedication to Thomas Seccombe. Being Revolutions of an Impressionist. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

.*. The charm of the bicycle is so elusive that no great writer has hitherto attempted to describe it. In this book an attempt is made to catch the spirit of the wheel in a lyrical fashion, as Izaak Walton caught the spirit of angling.

Six-Shilling Novels

JOAN OF THE HILLS T. B. CLEGG
Author of "The Love Child."

The present story opens in London, but Mr. Clegg is soon back in Australia, describing the life on a remote Australian station, with its refreshing bush atmosphere.

THAIS ANATOLE FRANCE

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A very triumph in its imaginativeness."

SOMEONE PAYS NOEL BARWELL

TRUTH.—"A novel of extraordinary promise, written in the form of letters, all so characteristic that their writers are clearly realised. Certainly a first novel of unusual promise."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH ALICE HERBERT

EVENING STANDARD.—"A fine and real Novel, executed with finish and distinction. Quick, unforced humour. Passionate sincerity and feeling. Exceedingly clever. A notable novel. It will stand."

MRS. GRAMERCY-PARK. [Just out
A. GORING-THOMAS

SIXPENNY PIECES A. NEIL LYONS
Author of "Arthur's."

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD.

FICTION FOR WHITSUNTIDE

A Story of Adventure—with humour.

MOON OF VALLEYS.

By DAVID WHITELAW, Author of "The Gang."

A Capital Yarn and a Charming Heroine.

THE SPITFIRE.

By EDWARD PEPLE.

By CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY.

A Clever Story of New Zealand.

THE TRAGEDY OF A FLIRTATION.

By H. B. VOGEL,

Author of "A Maori Maid."

The Success of the Season

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER.

By BARONESS ORCZY,

Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."
Illustrated by H. M. BROCK.
Third Edition Now Ready.

An Idyll of a Cornish Fishing Village.

PENELOPE ANN.

By J. HENRY HARRIS,

Author of "The Fishers."

The Story of William Devereux's successful play, now being performed at the New Theatre by Miss Julia Neilson and Mr. Fred Terry.

HENRY OF NAVARRE.

By MAY WYNNE,

Illustrated by H. M. BROCK.
Sixth Edition.

ALL AT SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

NOW READY. By the author of "We Three and Troddles."

THE RUNAWAYS. By R. ANDOM. 3/6.

NOW READY.

FROM LAND'S END TO THE LIZARD.

By A. G. FOLLIOTT STOKES.

A companion volume to "From St. Ives to Land's End," with many Illustrations and Map. One shilling net, cloth.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

1909 Issue. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Statesman's Year Book. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the year 1909. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Litt.D., formerly Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. 8vo, 10s. net.

First and Second Series. Complete in 1 vol.

The Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language. Selected and arranged by F. T. PALGRAVE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Artemis to Actæon, and other Verse. By EDITH WHARTON, Author of "The House of Mirth," &c. Extra crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Greek Architecture. By ALLAN MARQUAND, Ph.D., L.H.D., Professor of Art and Archæology in Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. net. [Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities.

New Work by the Writer of "Confessio Medici."

Faith & Works of Christian Science. Extra Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

New 6/- Novels.

THE WHITE SISTER. A Story of Rome. By the late F. MARION CRAWFORD.

GERVASE. By MABEL DEARMER.

Author of "The Alien Sisters," &c. 6s.

The Psychology of Thinking. By IRVING E. MILLER, Ph.D. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

THE MOTOR THAT WENT TO COURT. A Story. By FREDERIC COURTLAND PENFIELD, Author of "Present-day Egypt," &c.

WITH THE COIN OF HER LIFE: A Story of Thirteen at Table. The first of three stories with the same motive, by one of the following writers: MARGARET DELAND, S. WEIR MITCHELL, OWEN WISTER.

THE TWO LARGEST DIAMONDS. By GEORGE F. KUNZ, Joint author of "The Book of the Pearl."

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

NOW READY. Vol. LXXVII. Price 10s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

In commemoration of the 100th Anniversary of Paine's Death (June 8th).

A 25s. Book for 1s. 6d.

Now Ready, unabridged, 368 pp., in paper cover, 1s. 6d. (by post 1s. 9d.) and in handsome cloth binding, gilt tops, 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 10d.),

DR. M. D. CONWAY'S GREAT WORK,

THE LIFE OF

THOMAS PAINE

(originally published at 25s. net).

Also now ready, uniform with above, but in cloth only, 440 pp., 2s. 6d. net by post 2s. 10d.

THE WORKS OF THOMAS PAINE,

comprising "The Age of Reason," "The Rights of Man," and a selection from his miscellaneous political writings.

The two volumes, in cloth, gilt tops, will be forwarded, carriage paid, for 5s.

Catalogue and copy of "Literary Guide" (16 large pp.) free on receipt of post-card.

LONDON: WATTS & CO., JOHNSON'S CT., FLEET ST., E.C.

TRUE RELIGION v. FALSE THEOLOGY.

REASONABLE RELIGION without SUPERSTITION.

THEISTIC SERMONS by the

Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, B.A.

Gratis and post free to any part of the world on application to

MR. F. AUMONIER, 32, Warrington Road, Harrow.

of this delicious "pain" is responsible for this Cautionary Tale for Suffragettes.

Madame Claire de Pratz's story contains very interesting scenes and descriptions of the life of the Parisian bourgeoisie, seen through a Feminist's eyes. Her analysis of the struggle between the instincts of "the serf-woman of the past and the free woman of the future" in the person of her heroine, Elisabeth, would be convincing if Elisabeth were not such a terrible specimen of the "perfect" woman! Perfect women, if they exist, must be too insufferable for words. The author must, we think, be English or American, for no one but an Anglo-Saxon could be so idealistic and so naïve in her solemn mission of "teaching and enlightening others."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The second and concluding volume of Mr. Demetrius C. Boulger's "History of Belgium" (published by the author at 12, Bloomsbury Square, E.C.) takes up the narrative after the battle of Waterloo and brings it down to the death of Leopold I. in 1865. The period of Dutch rule is treated in a hundred and fifty pages, and the remainder of the book is given up to the reign of Leopold I., Queen Victoria's uncle and close correspondent. He was elected after the Revolution of 1830, though at first Lord Grey refused the sanction of the British Government to his candidature, and, at a difficult and critical time, was unsparing in his efforts to consolidate the independence of the Belgian people. His diplomacy made Palmerston an enthusiastic champion of Belgium and succeeded in the more difficult task of winning over the Duke of Wellington, whose friendship with the Prince of Orange more than once menaced the Belgian horizon. He had, as her letters show, a firmer support than either in Queen Victoria, who wrote on a monument in St. George's Chapel that he "held the place of a father in her affections." Leopold's intervention in our affairs was less happy than his use of our diplomatic support. Mr. Boulger is to be congratulated on the completion of his history. It is a work of laborious research that has been thoroughly performed.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, May 21. | Price Friday morning, May 28. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 5/8 | 85 1/16 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85½ | 85⅝ |
| Steel Common ... ... ... ... | 61 1/16 | 62¼ |
| Rand Mines ... ... ... ... | 9¼ | 9 21/32 |

Thursday's Bank return showed a reduced reserve, somewhat lower than that in the corresponding week of last year, when the Bank rate had been reduced to 2½ per cent. Very large sums were borrowed on the same day at the Bank of England in connection with a particularly heavy Stock Exchange account. Speculation, of course, centres in the Kaffir market. A concerted effort has been made to force up prices, and the public has rushed in with an enthusiasm hardly seen since the long boom which preceded the Boer War and the short boom which followed on the conclusion of peace. City writers are beginning to recall the price histories of leading shares. For instance, Rand Mines were 9⅞ on Thursday and 9 15-16 on January 1st. In 1899 they rose to 11¼, in 1902 to 13 3-16. Between then and January 1st of this year the lowest price they touched was 4 1-16. Or, again, Modderfontein touched 13¼ in 1899, 15 9-16 in 1902, falling afterwards as low as 3⅞. On January 1st they had recovered to 11¼, and on Thursday the price was 13 5-16. A more wildly speculative market is hardly to be conceived of than this, in which even the more solid securities show such enormous fluctuations. Perhaps the position of the Kaffir market now will put an end to the anxiety of stupid investors about the repatriation of the Chinaman. In view of the favorite and oft repeated cry that one sees in certain newspapers that the Liberal Government has undermined confidence and credit, &c., it may be worth while to quote the City editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette," who really says a good deal more than Mr. Winston Churchill claimed at Manchester:—

> "Unemployment is an unknown factor on the Stock Exchange, and the difficulty is rather to procure competent assistants than for the needy clerk to secure employment. Little is heard of the need to advertise for business, the overcrowding of the "House," and the other perennial subjects of slack times. The markets have enjoyed all the thrills and overflow business of the Kaffir "boom." Paris seems equally excited with ourselves, and the cabled summaries of Johannesburg news show that the excitement is as marked there, and testifies to the belief of the magnates that they can unload still further upon the public. The gilt-edged investment markets are held back by the flow of new issues, but the vast quantities of capital awaiting employment will alter these conditions ere long, and the general activity of business will be followed by higher prices for the better classes of securities. The rise in Kaffirs is merely the barometer sign of returning confidence.

This want of unemployment on the Stock Exchange is no doubt to be ascribed mainly to cheap money. It has been helped by the improved outlook in foreign affairs; for, of course, the near Eastern crisis was constantly checking the speculator and investor. The output of new issues is simply enormous, but with peace all the world over, the mass of loanable capital seems to be growing rapidly enough to absorb all legitimate ventures. Trade, I am afraid, is still very slow generally, the improvement being retarded by the American tariff uncertainty and also by doubt about the harvests. The worsted trade in the West Riding and the linen trade of Belfast are among the brightest spots. Unfortunately there is a prospect of serious labor troubles in the coalfields of South Wales and Scotland.

The Rubber Market.

The business in rubber shares is naturally overshadowed by the activity of the larger market in mines, but in its own way rubber has had quite a remarkable boom, and prices have risen at a great pace since the beginning of the year. The reason, of course, is that several big companies that began planting early have recently begun to produce rubber and pay dividends. For a long time the value of these estates has been a matter of eager discussion, and "bull" and "bears" have fought each other round the question whether wild or tame rubber was likely to win in the end, and whether production will finally outstrip demand. This question, as I need scarcely point out, is at present, and will for a long time remain, unsettled, but for the moment the rubber estates are doing uncommonly well, and, in spite of the increase in supply the market is very firm, the quotation for Para fine hard being 5s. 6d. at the end of last week. At this price there is a good margin over the cost of production, and the companies that have already reached the producing stage are making large profits. Most of them are moderately capitalised and can afford to pay very handsome dividends. Thus the Anglo-Malay has declared a dividend of 30 per cent., against 20 per cent. last year; the Linggi Plantations 60 per cent., against 20 per cent.; the Selamgor 75 per cent., against 41½ per cent.; and the Pataling 45 per cent., against 35 per cent. With dividends such as these to attract speculators, a boom is natural, and the shares in most cases stand at a very high premium. To explain the present position of the market I give a few figures showing the amount paid off and the present quotation of one or two shares:—

| Share. | Amount Paid. | Price May 26th. |
|---|---|---|
| Anglo-Malay ... ... ... ... ... | 17/6 | 5¾ |
| Bukit-Rajah ... ... ... ... ... | £1 | 7 5-8 |
| Cicely ... ... ... ... ... ... ... | £1 | 8 5-8 |
| Consolidated Malay ... ... ... ... | £1 | 4 5-16 |
| Golden Hope ... ... ... ... ... | £1 | 2¾ |
| Highlands and Lowlands ... ... ... | £1 | 2¾ |
| Linggi ... ... ... ... ... ... | 2/- | 20/6 |
| Pataling ... ... ... ... ... ... | £1 | 9 7-8 |
| Sumatra Para ... ... ... ... ... | £1 | 2½ |
| Vallambrosa ... ... ... ... ... | 2/- | 22/3 |

In face of these figures it ought not to be necessary to advise caution. There is no need to be bearish, but in an undertaking that has not really "found itself," premiums of 500 per cent. obviously leave room for more pretty big losses. The only sane advice that can be given is to make very sure before investing. Blind speculation in such a market is sheer madness, and no one should be tempted to buy without understanding the state of the industry, as well as the position of the particular company.

Lucellum.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"
(REGISTERED).
A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BOOKSELLERS.

10/6 FOR 5/6 Post Free. ABROAD 6/-
THE VARIORUM REFERENCE BIBLE
With Footnotes giving a Digest of the Various Readings and Renderings.
Edited by Cheyne, Clark, Driver, Goodwin and Sanday.
Handsome Morocco Yapp. Specimen Page post free.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'
BOOKSELLERS.
NEW AND SECOND-HAND.
All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION
Is Now Ready and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

The Daily News
is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.
This means that Liberals all England over are able to get the representative Liberal organ every morning at the same time as their local daily.
LONDON AND MANCHESTER
Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

Buy The Saturday Westminster
Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."
Because it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
It costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.
It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy
Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."
£17 17s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.
Full particulars from the Secretary.
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. | 84, Piccadilly, W.
82, Strand, W.C. | 25, Cannon Street, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON,
Goldsmiths College (Training Department).
LECTURER IN ENGLISH.

A LECTURER (MAN) in English Language and Literature will be needed in the above Department in September, 1909. Initial salary between £180 and £250 according to attainments and experience.

Applications should be received by June 9th. Full particulars can be obtained from The Warden, Goldsmiths College, New Cross, S.E.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

GIGGLESWICK SCHOOL.

Six Scholarships (£60 and under) will be offered on June 16th. Examination at Giggleswick, in London, or at Preparatory Schools. Particulars from Head Master, Giggleswick School, Settle, Yorkshire.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

MALVERN COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATIONS, JUNE 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, one of £87, five or more of £50, five or more of £30 (£21 for Day Boys) per annum. Faber Exhibition of £12 awarded to boy who does best in Examination. Council Nominations, value £12 per annum, may be awarded to boys who do well but fail to obtain a Scholarship.—For particulars, apply to the Head Master or Secretary.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

Head Master: ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

PREPARATION FOR UNIVERSITIES.
CITIZENSHIP COURSE.
LEISURE-HOUR WORK.

For Copies of Prospectus, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.
BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.
(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.
Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13 Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

What is to be the future of the six-shilling novel? Will it be killed by "sevenpennies" and new novels at a florin? These questions and the "novel crisis" generally, are discussed by Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. W. J. Locke, Sir Gilbert Parker, and other leading novelists in the June BOOK MONTHLY, which is now on sale, 6d. net.

Publishers, SIMPKIN MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION
Is Now Ready and will be sent free, on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. M. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL Wm. McIntosh
STONEWELL RESTAURANT T. M Hey, Proprietor
MARKET HALL RESTAURANT Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line,
52 , ... ... 6d. ,,

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, MAY 29, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 10.] SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Diary of the Week ... ... 333

Politics and Affairs:—
The Character of the Imperial Press ... ... ... ... 336
The New Land Taxes ... ... 337
A War of Steel and Gold ... 338
A Warning from the Past ... 339

Life and Letters:—
Thought and Instinct ... ... 341
Ouida's Idea of Women ... 342
The Outer Fields ... ... 343
The River... ... ... ... 344

Short Studies:—
A Late Adventure. By Edward Thomas ... ... ... ... 346

Music:—
"Pelléas et Mélisande." By E. A. Baughan ... ... ... 347

The Drama:—
A Skit and an Invective. By William Archer ... ... 348

Communications:—
The Party and the Budget. By A Radical Member ... ... 349
Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt. By Aaron Watson ... 350

Letters to the Editor:—
The Break-up of the Poor Law. By Mrs. Sidney Webb 351
The Imperial Cable Service. By Professor Edward Shann 352

PAGE

The Incorrigible Censor. By A., S., and C. E. Maurice ... 353
The Johnson Bicentenary Celebration. By the Mayor of Lichfield ... ... ... ... 353
"The Consolations of Science." By J. Allanson Picton ... 354
Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies. By S. J. G. Hoare and A. E. Brown ... ... 354
Abbey—or Pantheon? By the Rev. T. Hill ... ... ... 354
The Anglican Church and Nonconformists. By Charles Magrath ... ... ... ... 355
Inequalities of the Income Tax. By St. John G. Ervine ... 355

Poetry:—
Blossoms. (From the Chinese.) By L. Cranmer-Byng ... ... 355

The World of Books ... ... 356
Books to be read ... ... ... 356

Reviews:—
A Critic of Our Times ... ... 357
An Inaccurate Book ... ... 358
Richelieu as Hero ... ... 360
A Psychological Novel ... ... 360

Books in Brief:—
The Fortnightly Review ... 362
The Nineteenth Century and After ... ... ... ... 362
The Contemporary Review ... 362

The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... 364

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Last Friday the break of the German bloc was consummated by the resignation from the Finance Reform Committee of the Liberal and Radical members, accompanied by the Socialists. The Free Conservatives remained, and the Conservative-Centre rump at once hastened to appoint officers, to vote taxes, and to adjourn over Whitsun. The proposals it will lay before the Reichstag provide for estimated additions to the revenue of £1,900,000 from indirect, and £7,000,000 from direct taxes. The indirect taxes include duties on beer, spirits, cosmetics, tobacco, wines, lighting and cooking apparatus, railway fares, matches, tea, coffee, milling, and exported coal. The direct taxes are £3,000,000 on unearned increment from land, and £4,000,000 on unearned increment from stocks and shares. The "North-German Gazette" calls this a "serviceable foundation" for reform, and although the export duty on coal and the duty on stocks and shares are not acceptable, it is obvious that the Government has made up its mind to take its revenue from any party if only it can get them. An effort will be made to induce the National Liberals to join in the new political combination, and it would be surprising if they did not surrender their anti-clericalism, their last vestige of principle. It is significant, however, that Count Posadowsky, ex-Secretary to the Interior, insists that Germany's finances require £35,000,000, not £25,000,000, of new revenue, for the hope held out by the Government of economies amounting to £10,000,000 is quite vain.

* * *

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made an appeal to the great Friendly Societies meeting at Whitsuntide to appoint a small representative body to discuss with him the details of a scheme for State insurance against invalidity and other industrial evils. He repeats his earlier guarantee that no Ministerial scheme shall inflict the slightest damage on the voluntary organisations. His appeal has been met by diverse societies in a somewhat different spirit. The Ancient Order of Shepherds unanimously passed a resolution accepting Mr. George's assurances and agreeing to come on to the Committee. The Manchester Unity of Oddfellows, on the other hand, in spite of a warning from their Parliamentary agent against condemning a plan which they had not seen, passed a series of hostile motions, while some of their leading speakers used language more of political prejudice than of serious consideration. Apparently the Manchester Unity are disposed to accept State aid only for those whom they exclude from their benefits, or who cannot obtain them. A minority protested against the assumption that State insurance was wrong when neither they nor other Friendly Societies attempted to cover the whole ground.

* * *

We are glad to see that the Ministerial Whips are arranging the fight for the Budget, and fixing continuous relays of Liberal supporters right up to October, should the rather limited critical powers of the Opposition be unexhausted by the Day of Pheasants. Members are asked to choose between continuous attendance till the end of September, or a month's holiday, divided up into fortnights, taken either in July, in August, or in September. This is the right spirit; but the line must also be cleared for the Budget, and not blocked with too many rival projects. Mr. Harold Cox has given notice of an amendment to the Second Reading, objecting to the imposition of taxes for the "private benefit" of individuals—an objection which seems to apply less to the Budget than to the protective tariff which Mr. Cox opposes and his Parliamentary allies propose.

* * *

The ratification of the South African Constitution proceeds apace. The threatened opposition in Cape Colony has blown over, and the Legislative Assembly has adopted the Act with only two opponents. The Orange Colony and the Transvaal Legislatures have both accepted it, and only Natal stands out, sharply and contemptuously upbraided by Sir George Farrar, the ablest of the Progressive leaders, for its selfish isolation. Probably, however, the referendum, which is to be taken next week, will over-rule the politicians. The Durban Chamber of Commerce has already passed a motion in favor of Union by sixty votes to four. The Colonies seem nervous of a general revision of the Act by the House of Commons, but this is not to be feared. But the Imperial Parliament must scrutinise in freedom the provisions for the rights of three-fourths of the subjects of the Crown in South Africa.

* * *

On Thursday of last week the Deakin-Cook combination managed to defeat the Australian Laborites by the unexpectedly small majority of nine. The tiny group of four led by Sir W. Lyne voted with the Cabinet, and its separation from Mr. Deakin is so pronounced that it finds the name "Judas" too good for him. The Fisher Cabinet asked the Governor-General for a dissolution, but Lord Dudley refused it, probably because general elections are due next year in any case. The Cabinet has therefore resigned, and Mr. Deakin has now formed a Ministry out of former friends and foes. The coalition has gained its immediate purpose—the Laborites are out of office, and cannot appoint a High Commissioner or delegates to the Naval Conference. But it is difficult to see what else it can do except mark time. The two sections differ fundamentally on every important issue, and the basis of their agreement is that sleeping dogs should be let lie. It is said that the new Ministry will favor assistance to the Imperial Navy as well as the building up of an Australian Navy, but that does not constitute a domestic policy. It can hardly be doubted that the postponement of grappling with such great questions as the relation between Commonwealth and State finances, the New Protection, and national land defence will damage the prestige of the Coalition.

* * *

The Russians seem to have succeeded in ruining a promising settlement between the Shah and his subjects. The Nationalist Committee at Teheran which was conducting the negotiations has dissolved in despair, and Nasir-ul-Mulk, the Liberal Premier, refuses to return from abroad. The Shah, despite the protests of Tabriz, has appointed Ala-ed-Dowleh, a creature of despotism, with the worst reputation, Governor of Azerbaijan. The Russians meanwhile are modifying the terms of the loan to the Shah so as to permit him to do what he likes with the money. The Russian commander's conduct at Tabriz has provoked the greatest bitterness throughout Persia, and several hundred Nationalists, including Satar Khan, have taken refuge in the Turkish Consulate. The Nationalists have appealed to the Turks for help, and a force of 2,500 men has occupied Suj Bulak and Maragha. A conflict between Russia and Turkey therefore looks like being added to Persia's other troubles. Finally, to leave no doubt that they mean to stay, the Russians are collecting a large supply of sleepers at Tabriz to build a railway from Sulfa. The House of Commons should lose no time in waking up the Foreign Office if the partition of Persia is not to be consummated irretrievably.

* * *

The reputation of the Indian police and the lower courts has been dealt a blow by the Calcutta High Court, which, on appeal, has acquitted the defendants in the Midnapore bomb conspiracy. Originally twenty-six men were tried in the Sessions Court, but the chief Crown witness withdrew his depositions, and the charges against twenty-three were dropped. The remaining three, however, were sentenced to long terms of transportation, and it is these who have now been acquitted. The High Court, in delivering judgment, said that the evidence against the prisoners was extorted, and that the recording magistrate violated the spirit and the letter of the law. The judges thought it quite possible that the police had placed the bomb where it was found. This judgment comes on the top of the acquittal of all the prisoners in the Barah political dacoity case, and of most of the prisoners in the Alipore conspiracy case, and it confirms the general conviction in India that the native police are utterly unreliable, and that the administration has been much too reckless in starting gigantic sedition prosecutions.

* * *

The malevolent article in the "Times" on Crete, to which we referred a fortnight ago, seems to have done its work, and a strong and, as it seems to us, unwise anti-Greek agitation is being conducted by the Turkish Press in Constantinople. The "Tanin," one of the original organs of the Young Turkish Party, threatens the immediate invasion of Greece in the event of a single Greek soldier landing in Crete, and actually proposes to destroy the present thoroughly satisfactory rule of a Greek Commissioner and to replace him by a local Governor. The new Foreign Minister, Rifaat Pasha, takes what we should call the old Turkish line of declaring that no Cretan question exists and that Turkish sovereignity is unquestioned. He will find, we are afraid, that neither of these positions will hold. Turkish suzerainty in Crete is represented by a flag on a rock in Suda Bay and by nothing else. Crete is Greek in fact, and the attempt to keep her Turkish in name is vain. The islanders will settle that point for themselves without calling on the Greek Army, and Europe, with her strong sympathy for Young Turkey, will not allow her to waste her new stores of strength and credit in restoring a sham.

* * *

Count Zeppelin's steerable balloon, or airship, made a notable but not wholly successful flight, lasting for thirty-eight hours, from Saturday night till Monday morning. It started from Friedrichshafen, on Lake Constance, voyaged northwards against the wind in the direction of Berlin as far as Bitterfeld, and then, beaten by the air-currents, turned south and west, and finally came to grief in a gust of wind near Göppingen. The envelope and structure of the car were rent and torn, but next day Zeppelin II. was able to complete its return flight. The distance covered in the original journey was about 900 miles. The experiment is interesting, but it merely confirms earlier trials. The airship is still virtually mastered by the wind, and only sails by its leave. One of our hysterical papers notes that if Count Zeppelin's balloon had been directed towards London it could easily have accomplished the journey there and back to Lake Constance. The journal does not explain what it, or a hundred vessels like it, could have done when it arrived, or in what respect such an experience advances the use of airships in war.

* * *

Mr. J. G. Talbot, one of the most respected of Conservative members of Parliament, has resigned his seat for the University of Oxford, which he has held for thirty-one years. Setting party reasons aside, we cannot but hope that the University will do itself the honor of choosing Lord Hugh Cecil as Mr. Talbot's successor. In this way it can render the State precisely the kind of political and intellectual service it is best able to give. It can restore to the House of Commons a man of great distinction, who, by a simple act of personal consistency, has fallen out with one party without attracting the sympathies of the other. It can also give back to active political life a leader who, by his oratorical gifts, his real, if sometimes unattractive, high-mindedness, and his bent of mind, is especially adapted to follow it. Further, we should have said that a University so largely dominated by conservative and ecclesiastical influences might well find room for the most brilliant of Lord Salisbury's sons, and one of the most devoted, if not the most judicious, of Anglican laymen. Save on the one question of Free Trade, Lord Hugh Cecil's opinions are far removed from ours. But his banishment from the House is an absurdity, and the University can correct it by performing a very useful act of proportional representation.

* * *

Mr. Burns made one of his picturesque surveys of social evils in opening a Tuberculosis Exhibition at Whitechapel on Wednesday. He painted vigorously the deadly character of this scourge, from which the world loses five million people a year, our share being 80,000, or the population of a city like York. Mr. Burns truly said that the main parents of consumption were poverty, ignorance, and drink, and he read to workmen and workwomen one of his interesting little lectures on the value of air space in the home, and the folly of parlors overcrowded with cheap furniture and bad ornaments. He showed that in London, and, indeed, in all towns, the death rate from this plague, as from its companions, is nicely proportioned to the degree and character of the over-crowding. It is just to add that both Mr. Burns's Bills—the Housing Bill and the Milk Bill—are blows struck at this scourge of mankind.

* * *

The wholly inoffensive reference by Mr. Asquith to Austria in the course of his speech on the two-Power standard seems to have caused some emotion in Vienna. The Austrian papers hasten to explain that Austrian "Dreadnoughts" cannot be aimed against England, and the "Fremdenblatt" points out that in the event of war the Austrian fleet would be countered in the Mediterranean by the French fleet, while for the lack of stations it could not operate in the North Sea. Probably the agitation of the press is due to determination to make a public opinion favorable to the new venture. The most pointed comment on the Austrian plans is provided by the presentation of the Italian naval estimates to the Italian Parliament. They provide for the building of two more "Dreadnoughts" and the fortification of Brindisi, which watches Austria. The "Morning Post's" Rome correspondent expresses the true moral when he says that "this increased expenditure has been provoked by the news of the proposed strengthening of the Austrian Navy. It is not to aid but to counteract her ally that Italy is now arming, despite all the official talk about the Triple Alliance."

* * *

The International Congress of Applied Chemistry was opened by the Prince of Wales on Thursday week, and, after a very interesting series of papers and discussions, came to an end on Tuesday last. The point most emphasised—and one to which this country has never given proper weight—is the intimate bearing of chemical research not only upon industrial progress, but upon the whole course of daily life. The science of food, or, to give it its horrible scientific term, bromatology, was a leading theme. Papers were read describing how the food supply in different countries is controlled, and the best means of discovering adulteration were considered. On Tuesday the hygiene and legal section of the Congress passed a strong resolution condemning the wholesale pouring out of noxious smoke and fumes from factory chimneys on our town populations, and recommending inspectors acquainted with the chemistry of fumes.

* * *

We have no space to deal adequately with the reports of the Royal Commission on Shipping Rings. Neither the findings of the Majority nor of the Minority are very decided. The former report concludes cautiously in favor of the system of shipping "conferences" and "deferred rebates," the latter, with equal caution, against it. Both admit that it has led to high rates, to the diversion of trade, and, in the South African case, to action against the interests and wishes of the communities in question. They differ on the point whether the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. The main remedy offered by both parties is limited supervision by the Board of Trade. Only Sir David Barbour proposes hostile action on the lines of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, which makes the working of these "rings" illegal.

* * *

A real leader of men and of thought, and a politician of the highest character and the best instincts, has died in Dr. Theodor Barth, the greatest of modern German Radicals. Dr. Barth's position—that of a Free Trader, an anti-Jingo, and a Radical broadening out from pure individualism to a conception of State activities more in harmony with the necessities of modern life—is thoroughly intelligible from our point of view, for it is powerfully maintained in our politics. But it led to Barth's severance from the two main bodies of German Liberalism, whose alliance with Imperialism and Protection ensures for it shameful defeat and oblivion. Dr. Barth used and left many organisations in the effort to keep Liberalism true and vital. He passed from the Liberal Union to the Radical Union, and finally to the Democratic Union, out of which he hoped to build a bridge between German Radicalism and Socialism. This, after the failure of his admirable paper, "Die Nation," was the work of his last days, which closed in glorious strife, devoted to noble and essentially practical ends.

* * *

The latest feat of the Censor is not his least remarkable performance. It is stated in the press that he has refused Mr. Tree permission to produce a play by Mr. Hall Caine on modern Egypt, on the ground that Lord Cromer, acting, we suppose, as an amicus curiæ of Lord Althorp and Mr. Redford, has read it, and, in the present state of Egyptian opinion, thinks it unfit for presentation. Let us add a brief remembrance of his other more recent acts. On the one hand he has licensed "The Devil," a gross play which the opinion of the dramatic critics set down as repulsive and immoral, and "Samson and Delilah," which contravenes his self-imposed rule against the presentation of Biblical subjects. On the other, he has refused to the Follies, one of the most innocent and agreeable entertainments in London, a licence for an entirely harmless and amusing parody of "An Englishman's Home."

* * *

The obscure dealing with the Duke of Norfolk's Holbein has come to an end by an offer from a lady of £40,000, which, with national and private contributions, gives the Duke his £62,000 of more or less unearned increment, and Colnaghi their £10,000 profit. On the whole, we think, the Lady comes better out of this unpleasant business than the Duke. It would be interesting to calculate what the selling value of the picture would have been had it not been enhanced by its long stay in the National Gallery.

* * *

The Australian cricket team has now been thrice beaten, their failure against Surrey being quickly followed by a defeat in the first Test Match at Birmingham. The English Eleven, which did not include Hayward, won on a slow and soft, but not extremely difficult, pitch by ten wickets. Both elevens may be said to have failed in the first innings, but the critics attribute the small score of the Englishmen to their own timidity more than to the strength of the Australian bowling, and are disposed to regard the Australian batting as both tame and incorrect. Some allowance must be made for the fact that the Colonials, used to fast and absolutely true wickets, made some of their first appearances in England on slow and rain-soaked or treacherous ones. However, they seem to want something of the characteristic Australian power of combination in the field, a serious defect.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CHARACTER OF THE IMPERIAL PRESS.

The Imperial Press Conference, which meets to-day, deserves, and will receive, a warm welcome from the journalists of these islands. Some of them will meet old friends among its members, and all will extend an affectionate greeting to their colleagues in the outer fields of Empire. The Government will be their chief entertainers, and they will also meet most of the personalities who contribute conspicuously to the politics, the literature, and the arts of the Motherland. They will be welcomed, they will also be flattered, and they will be able to distinguish between the two kinds of reception. If the elder generation may find our journalism a little weakened, and not a little dependent, they will also find it a livelier and more freely colored chronicle of the world's doings than its predecessor of twenty years ago. And on our side we shall find much both to respect and to admire. The sensational developments of the last decade have not been without their effect on Colonial journalism, but it remains, for the most part, more serious than our own, and more practical. We do not to this day produce a better type of daily journal than the "Melbourne Age," while we have never succeeded in founding a satirical paper which, like the "Sydney Bulletin," aims at reflecting the form and color of the life of an entire people. Most of the South African and Canadian newspapers follow the better and stronger models of British journalism. They speak for more restricted, more selected, populations than our own, fond like us of amusement, and choosing the same forms of it, but living nearer to Mother Earth, or maintaining, by law and by custom, or by the deliberate exclusion of colored labor, a higher standard of personal dignity and comfort.

Eleven millions of white folk, spread over three vast continents, present different problems from those which confront forty-two millions, penned up in two small islands. But the press which will be represented in the coming conferences speaks for a completer form of democracy than we have realised, or than perhaps exists outside the Swiss Republic. With the important exception of Protection, Colonial journalism has little or nothing in common with our own Conservative press. It is fairly divided between different forms of what we should call Liberalism or Radicalism. The practical politics of Australia is fixed on lines which scarcely differentiate it from that of our own Labor Party. Our prepossessions concerning Established Churches, the blessing of hereditary Houses and the curse of State Socialism, affect colonial thought no more than the constitutions of Nineveh and Tyre. While no revolutionary movement has as yet taken root in the self-governing dependencies, the more practical ideas of State interference are current coin of all parties, and in Australia, and to some extent in South Africa, they form the basis both of government and of political thought. No one can accuse the typical British colonist of want of initiative. But his conception of State activities, both in the sphere of education and control, and of actual industrial responsibility, is far wider than our own. To journalists familiar with the problems of railway nationalisation, State aid to industry, an Eight Hours law, Trade Boards, and the State recognition of Trade Unionism, none of Mr. George's or Mr. Churchill's recent experiments will present any difficulty whatever. Many of them are perfectly acquainted with the valuation of sites and the resulting taxation of land. One colony actually possesses the halfpenny tax on the capital value of undeveloped land which is a leading proposal of the Budget. Others have led the way in the imposition of graduated death duties, and the scale now suggested is a slight variation of that which obtains in New Zealand. The higher taxation of great properties could arouse no storm, for no school of colonial journalism would be weak enough, or subservient enough, to oppose it. A few months ago we reformed our marriage law on lines familiar to every British colony. The problems of local option and local veto, women's suffrage, and high licences on public-house property still perplex our statesmen; but the colonies have either solved them or experimented in them. The friendly eyes of our visitors will open wider at the meaner aspects of European town life, at the want of personal care, tidiness, and self-respect in their swarming inhabitants, than at the revolutionary feats of the Government and the Labor Party. Not all the love of the "old country," nor the immense attraction of her art and learning, her tradition and charm and splendor, can quite dispel a touch of condescension in the British colonist when he compares his fuller and more daring political life with our own reserves and timidities.

Two immediate questions will, we suppose, occupy the Conference, on one of which we hope that some solution will be arrived at. Professor Shann, of Melbourne University, describes elsewhere in this journal certain evil effects on Colonial opinion of the Imperial cable service, with its double defect of high rates and severely condensed and recklessly heightened phrasing. Mr. Shann gives as an example the over-colored versions which reached Australia even of our naval scare, and of the speeches of our political leaders upon it. The result was to produce the impression that an immediate situation of great peril existed between Germany and Great Britain. New Zealand responded with a generous offer of a "Dreadnought," which, on consideration, we are afraid, she will find to be beyond her means, while in Australia a severe and, as it turns out, highly disturbing conflict arose between rival ideas of Imperial Defence. The self-governing Colonies are, in fact, so far away from these shores that the attempt to create an intellectual nerve-centre for the Empire seems more likely, under the conditions which now prevail, to produce a succession of "nerve-storms." The same trouble was created, not, we are afraid, without malice, at critical stages of Imperial policy in South Africa, and it is eminently suitable for consideration both by the Government and by the Conference. For our part, we hope that when the problem of Imperial Defence is seriously treated, as it must be treated later in the year, regard will be had by the Admiralty and by the Prime Minister to the actual lines on which Colonial policy has developed. We think it unlikely that we shall ever get the Colonies to come in as large contributories to the Imperial Navy, unified in control, and now mostly concentrated in home waters. And we do not think it would be quite fair to ask them. Their white population is still small, their communities, though prosperous, are not rich as we understand riches. The opposite theory of subsidiary Colonial squadrons gains strength, in spite of Mr. Deakin's late legislation, and it appears to promise definite relief for our own Navy in the earlier stages of a Continental war, while it seems to be the only possible basis of an Imperial Naval policy. If, in spite of all the loyalty of the Colonies to the Crown, and their feeling for the land of their fathers, we ever cease to think of them as sister nations, devoted to their own way of life and inevitably bound to their own interests, we shall revert to the path of error in which we lost America, and but for Liberal policy, would have parted from Canada and South Africa as well.

THE NEW LAND TAXES.

The text of the Finance Bill has dissolved many doubts and difficulties, and affords an ample justification for Mr. Lloyd George's refusal to enter into controversies of detail in the initial debates upon the Budget resolutions. The land taxes, which constitute the most novel, and in a proper sense the most revolutionary, proposals, are remarkable alike for the skill and the moderation with which their two-edged purpose is pursued. The main object, to secure for the Exchequer a considerable and not excessive share of that value, peculiar to land, which the growing needs of a population increasing in numbers and wealth imparts to a factor limited by nature, is carefully and skilfully achieved. The moderation of the policy is displayed in the many limitations, exceptions, and allowances which impart a necessary intricacy to the text of the Bill. Not merely is there elaborate provision, in the definition of the taxable increment and undeveloped values, for the various improvements which though connected with land are in reality capital, and for any elements of value due to goodwill or other personal factors, but the prime principle of excluding from the new taxation site values which have accrued in the past and comprise the claims of the Exchequer to future unearned increments is rigorously applied. No landowner can truthfully maintain either that something which is not land-value is taxed as such, or that new taxes are unfairly or onerously imposed upon land-values which he has bought and paid for. It is on future publicly created increment that the taxes lie. To this rule there is, indeed, one exception more apparent than real. So far as the prices of recently purchased lands have comprised by anticipation certain expected future increments, their existing values and prices will suffer a reduction by reason of the public encroachments on these future increments. But even here the loss can hardly be great, for during recent years the growing probability of such taxation as is actually imposed must have been reflected in the selling price of land.

The chief criticism directed against taxation of reversions, on the ground that the "windfalls" which they brought to the lessor may already have been subjected to taxation under increment estate duty, is met by a careful proviso against such double taxation, while the exclusion from the operation of the tax of past leases of less than thirty years', and of future leases of less than twenty-one years' duration, removes any really vexatious character from the measure. There still remains, of course, the objection of those who deny that these valuable reversions in long leases are "windfalls," and describe them as ordinary cases of deferred payment, a consideration for which has been given to the lessee in the shape of lower rent. But in the case of growing city lands, this only amounts to the assertion that the landlord is entitled to the whole of any future unearned increments that may emerge at the end of his lease; and the new claim of the Exchequer only extends to the demand that the public shall enjoy a moderate share of what remains after lessor and lessee have each had a profitable use from the land.

The hardest fighting will probably centre round the taxes on undeveloped land and mining values. Here the main fiscal purpose of securing to the public a share of future increments of value is supplemented by the further object of endeavoring to stimulate the best and fullest development of the resources of the land from the standpoint of the national interest. The limitations of the clauses show that this policy is confined to the case of lands ripe for building, which are being withheld from that purpose, either from carelessness, caprice, or, as is more usual, to obtain a price in a future market artificially enhanced by the scarcity due to this policy of holding back. No land of less value per acre than £50, no land of higher value if that value can be recognised as agricultural, will be exposed to this tax. So far as land is concerned, the purpose is to stop the unnatural and injurious scarcity of building sites in our towns and villages, due to the speculative action of landlords, assisted by the present rating and taxing system. No injury, such as has been loudly proclaimed by premature criticism, will be inflicted upon owners of any sort of agricultural land, either by this undeveloped land tax or by the increment tax. Indeed, it appears to us that, so far as the increment duty is concerned, the caution of the drafting has been carried in one matter to an excess which will deprive the Exchequer of its due share in certain increments. For if it be true that, in estimating the "original" site value of land, permanent agricultural improvements, such as drainage, are included in site value, whereas the landowner is entitled to deduct their value when his land is valued later on for increment duty (as appears from clause 2), this process will actually conceal and withdraw from taxation a certain amount of real land increment that may have accrued. We are disposed to think that some error of drafting has here occurred, but so far from involving a grievance to agricultural landowners, as the "Times" hotly insists, it is a leakage in the pipe enabling the State to suck up its share of unearned increment.

A good deal of the resentment expressed against the land taxes is due to a recognition that they tend to interfere with the existing liberty of owners to do with "their land" as they like, regardless of the public interest in this prime necessary of life. They complain that some of the new taxes, for instance, the undeveloped land and mineral taxes and the heavier estate duties, not being payable from current income, will compel them to put portions of their estates into the market, and at prices reduced in amount by the increased supply of land offered under this pressure. This, no doubt, is true. The taxes will conduce to the break-up of large ancestral estates, will increase the supply of saleable land, and will lower its price. All these results are public benefits, which though rather incidental than contained in the main purpose of the Finance Bill, are particularly welcome in a country which has suffered long and severely, both in its cities and in its rural parts, from the artificially restricted ownership and supply of land for human habitation and for industrial and agricultural working. This developmental side of the land policy is, indeed, of more immediate importance than the yield of revenue, considerable as that should be as years roll on. The two purposes, however, are not ultimately separate. For it is the manifest duty of a far-sighted public financier to prefer taxes which will have the effect of stimulating a better and more productive application of the land and labour of the nation, and so of enlarging the revenue both of private citizens and of the State.

A WAR OF STEEL AND GOLD.

In the game of weighting the Balance of Power which began when a Triple Entente faced the Triple Alliance, there is neither finality nor rest. Where each State meets its neighbors with a calculated opportunism, alliances can have no permanence, and understandings only a partial and variable tenure. The past week has exhibited in section, as it were, some of the strains and tensions which go to make the unstable equilibrium of the Triple Alliance. The determination of a school of Austrian patriots to enter the European competition by laying down four "Dreadnoughts," has been much advertised of late—mainly by the alarmists of our own Press. The scheme is as yet only a project. It has not been adopted by the Delegations; still less has the money been voted. Only one slip in which such vessels could be constructed is in existence, and competent authorities have declared that something like six years would be required by the Austrian yards to complete a single "Dreadnought." But none the less Italian opinion has taken alarm, and it is certain that if Austria does seriously meditate such a programme as this, her Italian ally will reply to it with a more than equivalent armament. It is a whimsical fact that one ally within a league which has endured since 1883 should arm avowedly against a partner, but the state of mind which this new fact denotes is far from being novel. Every feud between Italian and German students at Innspruck or Vienna reveals the rooted antagonism of the two peoples. Every Balkan crisis underlines the suspicions of the two Governments. Two years ago Austria carried out combined naval and military manœuvres in Dalmatia, on the pleasant assumption that an Italian force was attempting to effect a landing. At the height of the recent Bosnian crisis, the "Temps" pointed out that Austrian forces had been concentrated not so much to repel a Russian invasion from the North, as with the apparent intention of containing an Italian movement from the south. Despite some recent interchanges of royal messages, the historical antagonism of the two peoples has been emphasised by the refusal of Vienna to participate in a projected exhibition at Rome. In all the Balkan tangles Italy has ranged herself in sentiment and diplomacy with Servia and Montenegro. The logical consequence of that attitude is that she is now coquetting not with Austria, but with Russia.

Italy adhered to the Triple Alliance in a moment of panic and pique. She has ever since asked herself whether high politics really demanded the sacrifices of sentiment and interest which it imposed. She had never quite forgiven the element of self-seeking in Louis Napoleon's Italian campaign, and she dreaded the calculating clericalism which sometimes marked French policy abroad. But it was none the less a paradox that she should have allied herself with the arch-enemy Austria. She resented the French descent upon Tunis so deeply that she forgave Bismarck for facilitating that descent. For a series of years her antagonism to France was real and acute. Then came, in 1893, the alliance between Russia and France. Once more she took alarm, and realised that while the German alliance had secured her on land, she was still exposed in the Mediterranean to the menace of the French fleet. She turned accordingly to us. Some naval pact or other was concluded, much advertised at the time, though its terms remained a secret, and a British squadron visited Italy, as a Russian squadron had visited Toulon. When ten years afterwards France and Great Britain at last came to terms, Italy was treated almost as a member of the partnership. Crispi was dead, and the Franco-Italian feud forgotten. France too had broken for ever with the Vatican. At the Conference of Algeciras, three years later, Italy played the make-weight and the go-between, departing just far enough from her loyalty to the Triple Alliance to give the victory to the Triple Entente. It was King Edward's sudden visit thereafter to Italian waters which first moved Prince Bülow to complain that Germany was being "penned in," while his inspired press declared that Italy had been "debauched." And now the Mediterranean pact, first concluded between Britain and Italy when both were the friends of Germany and the enemies of France, began to wear a new complexion. It was now a link in a new world chain of which the key seemed to be in British hands.

The kaleidoscope is constantly shifting. Of the world flux of diplomacy one can only affirm, wagging a finger like Heracleitus, that it moves. Italy is arranging a rapprochement with Russia, but in which camp does Russia stand? The consequences of the German intervention which suddenly induced Russia to desert her partners in the Balkan crisis, and to accept the annexation of Bosnia without compensations and without a conference, are not fully visible. One notes, however, certain tendencies. The Stolypin-Isvolsky Ministry is slowly staggering to its fall. The internal reaction triumphs all along the line, and most clearly in Polish affairs. The pretence of any loyal co-operation with this country in Persia is less than ever observed. The party which seems to be in the ascendant is, moreover, not only reactionary at home and aggressive in Persia; it frankly prefers a German to a British connection. One asks oneself whether German diplomacy, steadily seeking for the weak point in the Triple Entente, is about to succeed in influencing Russian domestic politics, as for a moment it affected French politics when it forced M. Delcassé to give place to M. Rouvier. The visit arranged between Tsar and Kaiser this month in Northern waters, within a year of King Edward's journey, may have, as the gossips declare, some political significance. But not even in this way will equilibrium be reached. Russia, still hostile to Austria, always respectful to Germany, friendly to Italy, bound by her debts to France, opportunist towards ourselves, is more than ever a loose link in the European chain, a weight which may be shifted from balance to balance. France, as always, asks nervously when we mean to give the entente a value by raising an army. Turkey, anxious about Persia, and sore at the blunders of our diplomatists, is an element of uncertainty, and she is also an element that begins to count. It is a game of shuttlecock, and nothing in it is quite certain, save that there are two partners on the German side; for among all these bonds and understandings only that between Austria and Germany is quite beyond intrigues and threats.

Sir Charles Dilke, always cautious in his language, has, not the first time, expressed this week his doubts of the wisdom of the elaborate manœuvre of "isolation" in which our diplomacy seems to have involved itself. The combination broke down at the critical moment, as from the first we feared it must, because of the military weakness and the internal divisions of Russia. Our doubts go further than any which he has publicly expressed. The movement was unmeaning, for a league with Russia could serve no Liberal purpose. It was also provocative in fact, if not in intention, and has increased and stereotyped whatever egoistic purposes Germany originally entertained. To attempt to isolate her was to challenge her to engage in a capital struggle, a struggle moreover which she can fairly represent to her people as, in its essence, defensive. There is emerging from the process no Liberal group of Powers, no "league of peace," and, above all, no Concert of Europe. While it lasts there is only an endless vista of shifting forces and a hopeless prospect of increasing armaments. No question is decided on its merits. There is no sense for European interests. It is true there is no actual war. The Powers struggle to-day by counting their legions and their battleships. Alliances contend, as it were, by working out a war-game on the map, and within the alliance itself, each Power, as Italy has found to her cost, wins only such consideration as her armaments deserve. It is a war of steel and gold, of credit and brains, if not a war of blood. But surely and slowly these dry campaigns, as Sir Edward Grey predicted, are threatening to submerge civilisation itself.

A WARNING FROM THE PAST.

M. Emile Ollivier's apologia for his share in the inception of the Franco-Prussian War, which he has written in extreme old age, and concludes in the current number of the "Revue des deux Mondes," will have a melancholy interest for those who remember the part he played in that event, and in the closing stages of his master's strange Odyssey through the world of European diplomacy. Ollivier was Napoleon III.'s last experiment in government, the experiment of the Liberal and Constitutional Empire. He was a man of some parts, dexterous and eloquent. But he had not the time to succeed, even if he had had the power. Napoleon's thread was spun before the Ollivier Ministry took it up. Its chief assures us that he and his party had no sympathy with the effort to avert the consummation of German unity and "pen in" Prussia by a ring of hostile States, pursued throughout Napoleon's tardy, confused, and vacillating manœuvres, combinations, and journeyings during the closing years of the later French Empire. He insists that he labored for peace, both against the extreme Imperialists in his own camp, and against the determined strategy of Bismarck. He argues passionately, and with some reason, against the justice of the sentence which for nearly forty years has linked his name with Folly, as the statesman who went to war with a "light heart." And he entirely repudiates the theory that he regarded a Franco-Prussian conflict as "inevitable." M. Ollivier will not listen to such fatalism. War between France and Prussia was no more inevitable than war between England and France, which, in Palmerston's view, was bound to follow our dispute with Louis Philippe over the Spanish marriages. The object of his argument in the "Revue des deux Mondes" is largely to show that his school of politics would eventually have destroyed French anti-Germanism. But M. Ollivier calls a more powerful witness than himself against the theory of "inevitability in war." Bismarck was suspected of wishing to practise it in 1875. But if he ever entertained the idea, he found it necessary to abandon it, and he repudiated it, in 1876, in a speech which contrasts strongly with his cynical avowals as to the doctoring of the Ems despatch. It was, indeed, contrary to Bismarck's practical mind to approve the notion of justifying war by a vague general sense of national danger springing from the advancing power of a possible rival.

> "Imagine, gentlemen," he said, "what my position would have been if I had come to you a year ago and said to you, 'We must have war. I cannot, indeed, give you any precise reason for it. We have not been attacked, and we have not been offended. But the situation is dangerous. We have many powerful armies on our borders. The French Army is being re-organised in an extremely disquieting way, and therefore I want a loan of 200 million thalers, or 500 million marks, in order to prepare for war.' Would you not have been disposed to send for a doctor to ask how, with my long experience of politics, I could commit the colossal folly of coming before you and saying, 'It is quite possible that one day some years hence we shall be attacked, therefore we ought to take the bull by the horns, fall on our neighbors, and tear them to pieces before they are quite ready'? That would be the act of a man who would commit suicide because he is afraid of death, and it would have been taken in face of a situation entirely peaceful and satisfactory, in which no one could have told what was really our casus belli."

Now it is hardly necessary to say that the theory which the most experienced of war-makers rejected as a kind of lunacy is that accepted by most members of our anti-German school. They have contrived to rehabilitate with considerable success both the Napoleonic device of "penning in" Germany and the doctrine of "inevitable" wars, not between two contiguous Powers, both old enemies, both in a state of unstable equilibrium, and both led by practised and adept intriguers, but between two countries who have never had a quarrel, and do not possess a substantial cause of difference in either hemisphere. It was this theory which underlay the diplomacy that preceded the South African War, and was openly advanced to excuse its extreme clumsiness and precipitation. What happened? Our diplomatic differences with the South African Republic were so small to begin with, and were reduced by negotiation to such extreme trivialities, that when hostilities broke out, practically the whole civilised world concluded that they had nothing to do with the quarrel, and that its real cause was our determination to absorb the Dutch Republics so as to compass an "inevitable" development of our South African empire. The veil has only partly fallen upon the danger and mischief that this perverted idealism wrought us. Most of us know now that if British power was imperilled at any period since the Napoleonic wars, the danger zone lay between 1899 and 1902, and that if to-day we are weaker, financially and politically, than we ought to be, our last "inevitable" war is the cause. Does anyone imagine that if our foreign politics of the next ten years is to be conducted on the principle of treating an Anglo-German conflict as a prepared effect of political evolution, we shall emerge from that process unscathed?

It is, therefore, we think, time for the Government to put its foot down and to give the Anglo-German situation a rest. Let us come back from theory to fact. It is now clear that the hasty conclusions on which the panic of last March was based have no sounder foundation than the "scareships" which passed over Lowestoft and were dissipated by the breath of their chief patentee from Berlin a few days later. Mr. George Lambert, who is an official of the Admiralty and a member of the Government, stated on Monday that only eleven German "Dreadnoughts" were on order. If this is the case, it seems quite certain that they cannot all be completed before the spring of 1912, and possibly not by that date. On this point our own Admiralty and the German officials are near agreement. Now, according to Admiral von Tirpitz, the German period of construction for "Dreadnoughts" is from thirty-six to forty months, with a further allowance for trials. Of this statement no real contradiction has been offered from our side, nor, we believe, is it denied that the German programme of shipbuilding, so far from being precipitated or secretly advanced, is actually in arrears. This in its turn implies that not only Mr. Balfour's palpable figment as to seventeen German "Dreadnoughts" in 1911, and twenty-one or twenty-five in 1912, but Mr. McKenna's fears that Germany may have seventeen in the latter year, are equally groundless. Slightly accelerating, therefore, our own rate of shipbuilding, and putting forward the times for laying down keels, we shall be able to maintain our start effectively by building four "Dreadnoughts" this year and four next. We shall have in 1912 eighteen or twenty "Dreadnoughts" and "Lord Nelsons" to Germany's probable eleven and possible thirteen, in addition to our overwhelming superiority in the newer pre-"Dreadnought" type, and in armored cruisers, some of them fit to lie in line of battle. What shadow of reason can exist for adding to this superiority? What case can be made out for the laying down of eight "Dreadnoughts" this year, at the demand of a party that has the audacity to summon the House of Lords to the defeat of the measure that foots the bill for four?

The problem as to the German fleet is therefore a perfectly simple and manageable one, and we ought to clear it of panic-stricken theory. We have only quietly to watch the progress of German fleet-building, and maintain the start we have got in every department of naval activity. If, while keeping the ground open for a naval understanding, we steadily adhere to this attitude, and rely on the natural advantages of an island Power as compared with a continental one, and of a high and vigilantly maintained tradition of skill in maritime war as compared with almost complete inexperience, we shall find that the one point of possible rivalry between Germany and ourselves will sink again to its proper significance, and the general quarrel—a quarrel of nervous and ill-regulated imaginations rather than of serious statesmanship—will abate until it disappears. Doubtless Germany can on her side make this rivalry needlessly costly and irritating to herself and to us. Therein she will show her unwisdom. She cannot beat us on our favorite ground, and she will find no party here willing to favor any such purpose. Considering how small are her over-sea interests as compared with our own, and how completely her position depends upon land power, she cannot in the long run defend a policy based on double supremacy by land and sea. Such an aim is megalomaniac, and, incidentally, quite inconsistent with the highly practical ambitions of the statesman who made her what she is, and who, though he prepared three wars, arranged them all in a single cause—that of German unity and consolidation. But it offers no visible point of actual peril; and if, on the other hand, we took the monstrous line that Germany's growing force and expanding activities called for interference by arms, we should not only violate every canon of international morals, but should inflict an irreparable injury on ourselves. We should estrange France, to whom such a policy opens up a prospect of irremediable disaster or of long and doubtful war, we should affront the public opinion of Europe, we should bring about sure trouble with the Colonies, and, even though, in the event of actual conflict, a kind of naval victory would be sure, we might deliver the fabric of our maritime trade to rivals, and thus sap the vital forces of our nation.

Life and Letters.

THOUGHT AND INSTINCT.

Man is pre-eminently the thinker in this world. He is only one creature among many; but when we classify creatures according to their intellectual power there is no other to be named in the same day with him. Yet his kinship with those below him has implications which may well make him pause before he settles himself into comfortable satisfaction with this attainment, or convinces himself that he has lost nothing by the way as he strove in it through the long ages that have made him what he is.

There are, indeed, moments of illumination in the lives of most men who are of high rank in the race of thinkers when they ask themselves whether they may not have paid dearly, perhaps too dearly, for their obvious gain. Not only Darwin—probably the best-known case—but other men, greater and less, have complained of atrophy of some element in their life, of a loss of this or that once precious possession: the sense of beauty, the power to enjoy, the ability to love and serve with enthusiasm and self-abandonment. The fact is familiar enough; the cause, we know, is not far to seek. We are not surprised when we hear that Darwin lost pleasure in the arts. We remind ourselves that if a man concentrates his interest and attention on facts, brute facts, and on hypotheses concerning them, he can expect nothing else. Elements in psychical life which are neglected, which are never attended to and made use of, wither like idle limbs. The man who buries his talents abandons them. It is what we must expect, and we say that Darwin, like other men, had his compensation. He could not justly look to "have it both ways," when by the very nature of the man he was bound to give himself with all his heart and strength to one way.

But there we leave the matter. We do not, most of us, go on to consider the position of Darwin's race among other races of the world; we do not ask ourselves whether it may have sacrificed something important in the age-long struggle by which it came to the throne of intellect, as he sacrificed to science his enjoyment and understanding of the arts. We are so well accustomed to our throne that we do not examine with sufficient humility, perhaps, the peculiar gifts and graces of the creatures we see at its foot. Nor does it occur to us that we may have thwarted, warped, or neglected some original endowments of the share of life which humanity embraces within itself. Yet it is possible that we men have elements of a kind we see more fully developed elsewhere, which in us are either not estimated at their full value and significance, or lie dormant, like the sense of beauty and the appreciation of poetry in Darwin.

Monsieur Henri Bergson, at least, is trying to teach us that this is what has happened in the course of our development into the kings of intellect. The great life-current which, in its beginning here on earth, holds all elements together, has deposited them in unequal measure here or there. It divides first into animal and plant, and is torpid, as he says, in the plant, awake in the animal, and in greater or less vigor of movement in this animal or in that. Then, among the varieties of its mobile display in animals, it comes to the fullest development of one kind in man, but sets the fulness of another kind in so remote a creature as the insect. We may well, it seems, and profitably, "go to the ant" to find out what is the matter with ourselves. For, unquestionably, our ways of using the intellect have landed us in some very tight places indeed. There are places so tight, so impassable, as to force us to ask whether we have not entered a cul de sac; where the barring of the way of thought, by antinomy and contradiction, may show us that we must go back upon our steps to find out why they have led us so hopelessly astray.

Monsieur Bergson sends us, in his own admirable manner, to consider the gadfly, the sitaris, and the sphex. That élan de la vie, the driving force of life, which has been cramped within the hard envelope of vegetable beings, and the equally resisting armour of such creatures as the sea-urchin and the oyster, has found its greatest freedom in two widely different directions, which culminate in the instinct of the hymenopterous insect, and in the intellect of man. "On a dit," he says, "que les Fourmis étaient maîtresses du sous-sol de la terre, comme l'homme est maître du sol."

M. Bergson tells us that the capital mistake which, transmitted since Aristotle, has vitiated the greater part of our philosophy of nature, is that we see in vegetative life, in instinct, and in the life of reason, three degrees of one and the same tendency developing successively; whereas we ought to recognise that these are three divergent directions of one activity which has been divided, more or less, although never completely and rigidly, as it advanced and increased. In every kind of organism life shows itself in efforts to obtain certain things from brute matter; and in the three ways of vegetative torpidity, instinct, and intellect there are manifest three different, although not wholly distinct, fashions of getting a livelihood and making a favorable place to live in upon earth. It is possible to do this in these several ways, but not, it seems, in all three at once. The force of life has had to choose, as it were, among them. In the sphex and his fellows it has chosen one way, in the man another. The lower creatures have grown elaborate organised tools, by means of which they deal marvellously well with brute matter and with other living things, but within a very narrow range. Man has taken the storehouse of the whole world to ransack for tools which he devises and does not grow. The first plan was crowned with an immediate but strictly limited success; the second is still unfinished, still at its rough beginnings and amid its many failures, but full of a promise to which no bounds can be set or seen.

An insect performs the most elaborate and delicate surgical operations by instinct; operations which we should have to learn how to do, and practise by steps of intellectual guidance and discovery. The insect, it seems, feels, in an interior sympathetic apprehension, the end, the means, and the necessary movement, all in continuity. The tool it uses is, let us say, its sting, an organised part of itself; and with this living tool it acts almost infallibly, as though it saw and knew the whole process and purpose as we see and know in the elaborate consciousness of intellect. We have a faint clue to the mystery; that is, we have in ourselves a mystery not unlike it, a mystery of the life that is not so much intellectual as instinctively sympathetic. Intellectually we know from the outside the complex apparatus of muscle, bone, and nerve with which, in the simplest manner, we give our adversary a black eye; but the way in which we will the co-ordination of a complex multiplicity of means, in willing a perfectly simple movement of our fist, is hidden from us. We only know that there is this way, that we do the deed, like the insect with its infallible sting, or its apparently far-seeing plan for feeding or for producing a generation to come. All we do, when we want to black our adversary's eye, is to hit out. We no more think out the right arrangement of muscles and the apportioning of nerve-power, or the direction of strains in bones and joints, than the insect thinks out its plan or studies its living tool and the problem it suggests to us. The complexity and the problem are all mere affairs of the intellect, not of life and use. Our fists and arms are complex to the anatomist and the physiologist; but we should paralyze our action if we tried to use them as anything but simple instruments that effect a simple movement at our will.

So far we are with the sphex. But when we come to our surgery, we lack his admirable ease. We do not find another person's body as simple as our own; the complexity our intellect makes within a continuous world, by separating it piecemeal for consideration and action, brings difficulty about us—difficulty, and the chance of disaster as well as of success.

We have to learn a way through this complexity; we do not find a simple way, like the sphex. It is true that in the end we do what the sphex could never do, but we do it worse than he does anything; because we have to learn how to do it, and learn, not merely by doing, as we learn to move our limbs, but by putting artificially separated bits of it together, in a pattern intellectually devised, but ill to follow and not easy to see. We learn to know—the insect knows, it seems, without learning—how to deal with exterior things. Instinctive knowledge is commanding, categorical; the knowledge of the intellect is hypothetical and suggestive. If we men had the commanding and categorical knowledge of the insect extended equally through the sphere in which we now exercise—in the main and with many a slip and stumble—the hypothetical knowledge our intellect has procured us, we should indeed be as gods.

But we should have lost something even in this triumph. We should have lost the comforting clarity by which intellect makes its most potent appeal. Categorical knowledge is not intellectually clear; it commands, but in a mysterious way. The kind of knowledge which is intellectually clear is that which we have built up about us, in dealing with a too simple schematic world of one thing isolated by us from another thing, in order that we may construct our tools and deal conveniently with that which (as yet, at least) we do not know from within but only from without. And this clearness is imposed for practical purposes upon things that are not really separate, but are in mysterious and powerful connection one with another. We cut a continuous world into bits that we can handle intellectually, and look at as isolated and as stationary. We lose the sense of continuity and the sense of movement and the sense of life. And then we apply our hypothetical knowledge of things, as they really are not, to life and movement as they really are; and find ourselves barred by that wall of antinomy and contradiction, landed in that cul de sac.

The whole intellectual building is hypothetically constructed like Darwin's intellectual arrangement of species and their histories. But our own bodily actions, for the most part, and still more the operations of the sphex, are not hypothetical; they have rather the nature of instinctive certainty and the character of command. They are of life, not of guess and reasoning about life; they are therefore incomprehensible, mysterious; and, to the intellect, they are vague in spite of all their certainty and their command. They refuse to be analysed without being destroyed; they will not stand still to be measured and weighed.

Therefore they take their place with all other mysterious elements in life as it really is; with all those that are at once most vague, most elusive to the intellect, and most precious. They have kinship with the love of beauty, with the self-bestowing love of all true lovers, with the sense, too, that we call religious. All these elements in life defy the peculiar process of the intellect. Out of them it can make no tools, nor can it with any profit pretend to separate their parts and set them in a spatial pattern. This useful habit, the intellectual habit, is a hindrance, not a help, when it is brought to bear on the secrets and the activities of spiritual life. The love of the beloved and of beauty, the sense of religious bonds, involves an approach as from within, a sympathy of being, an intellectually undefined and shapeless, but experimentally vivid apprehension, as of masterful spirits who live and act by right rather than by rule. In the very highest of our modes of life we depart from the path by which we have reached our supremacy of intellect. We fall back—if, indeed, it is a falling back and not rather an advance and a promise of yet more advance—on the mode which life displays in the little creatures whose eminence is in the greatest contrast with our own.

Yet we cannot separate the one manner from the other, except by just such an intellectual scheme as that which enables us to deal so admirably and effectively with things, and so ill with the mysteries of inner life. Even in the sphex there is some intellectual work; even in our most satisfying clarity of intellectual arrangement a mysterious instinct takes its share. There are no rigid lines of demarcation, there is no special compartment, no marking of clock-time, in the continuous duration of life in ourselves. And as by intellect we unquestionably reign—kings that we are—so by the help of intellect we may extend the reign of all other elements and powers. We may by intellect set Spirit, if we will, to govern over the empire of life.

But meanwhile it is idle to deny that men have learnt to distrust that which cannot be clarified after the intellectual manner. We doubt, wherever we cannot frame for ourselves a distinct image in terms of space and time, in the pattern of mechanics or by means of an abstract scientific symbolism. And only the élan de la vie in ourselves, that strong driving force of individual life, keeps us back from extending doubt to our own activity and to the mysteries we cannot conceal. M. Bergson is doing good service in calling us to consider the ways of creatures that we regard as left behind in the race of life. We may do well to remember that if the manner of life which they have brought to such great and isolated perfection is not allowed for and developed in ourselves, then the manner which we, on our part, have brought to a similar perfection, will betray us. And it will the more bitterly betray us the more we concentrate upon it, to the exclusion of other ideals, the faith, the enthusiasm and the devotion, which are in us directing powers, and make us what we are and shall be.

---

OUIDA'S IDEA OF WOMEN.

The Editor tells us that the two short papers called "The Woman Problem," in this month's "National Review," were written by Ouida more than twenty-five years ago, and were sold by her with the stipulation that they should be withheld from the public till after her death. It is a little strange that anyone should thus have speculated in "futures" with them, but it is stranger still that Ouida should have hesitated about their publication during her lifetime. She did not as a rule conceal her opinions; she rather laid herself out to startle and shock, and there is very little here that would have startled or shocked the most delicate of her contemporaries.

The articles are written with her usual eloquence, her rather unsteady references to foreign and classical literatures, and her fine inconsequence; but one searches in vain for anything that might scandalise her readers or alter her reputation. Still, as she wished it, one is rather glad that publication was delayed, for the articles are a proof how rapidly since they were written the whole aspect of women's position has changed.

A quarter of a century ago Ouida's attitude towards mankind was recognised, though gently ridiculed. Her attitude was prostration before the ideal of the beautiful young Guardsman or the mysterious foreign Count, and each became more fascinating according as his moustaches grew blacker, his cigars more priceless, and his behavior more desperately wicked. To the knees of this exquisite creature Ouida clung with the obstinate devotion of Mrs. Micawber clinging to the neck of her less showy but far more entertaining spouse. "Never, never will I leave my Mr. Guardsman!" she might have cried, and it is undeniable that not only servant maids, but women of high imaginative talent like hers, are subject to similar aberrations of judgment, especially under the dazzle of military accoutrements and lurid sins. Many peaceable and innocent men are caught by the same hallucination, and become reduced to mute obedience at the rattle of a sword or the glance of an iniquitous Viscount. Naturally, it is a frame of mind much encouraged and admired by the bold, bad, and beauteous heroes whom it deifies, and so, for one reason or another, it is widely diffused, and has a certain influence on human affairs.

When Ouida, with this idea fixed before her adoration, describes herself as a dispassionate observer, we may smile, but we know very well what will be her view of "the foam of discontent seething up amongst women at the present day," as she calls it in her gorgeous rhetoric. It will be the beautiful young Guardsman's washy view intensified by passing through the mind of an admiring, but still an unquestionably clever, woman, who can say in fine language what the young Guardsman dumbly feels at the back of his head. The first of the two papers deals with the demand for "Women's Rights," or "Votes for Women," as that demand is now more simply called, and the view does not get much beyond the commonplace objections of the average Anti-Suffragist. All the arguments that have now become so familiar are trotted out with a fine air of freshness. We are told that women cannot vote because they do not fight—an argument very consoling to the young Guardsman, who cannot vote because he does fight; nor does Ouida for a moment consider that in every war, especially during a country's invasion, it is the women who suffer most, and should have, at least, the same voice in the question as the men; though, to be sure, that is not much. Then there is the same familiar argument about equality in privileges implying equality in liabilities, and the same disregard of the truth that if men have certain liabilities, women also have liabilities at least as dangerous and important, such as motherhood. We have next the argument that political rights would not be reserved for exceptional women; just as if they were now reserved for exceptional men. And we are asked the familiar question why so few women display the highest genius, just as though the City offices and Balham villas swarmed with masculine Platos, Shakespeares, and Beethovens.

But we do not wish to dwell on Ouida's views about the suffrage, though they occupy the greater part of the article. The final argument, which she regards as clenching, is that it is unjust for women to demand political rights and still to claim "the courtesies and suavities and securities of their position—the deference, homage, and all the graceful amenities that men have paid to women through the generous concession of the stronger to the feebler being." There is no evidence, either from ordinary human observation or from the example of countries that enjoy adult suffrage, to show that women are more impolitely or brutally treated than usual because they have a vote, nor are the women electors for County Councils among ourselves pushed off the path or made to stand in the tubes with any special malignity. But we quote the passage only to prove how limited Ouida's conception of the whole "woman problem" was. Her mind moved easily nowhere but among the rich and great—the natural sphere of beautiful Guardsmen and wicked Viscounts—or, at lowest, among the refined and well-to-do classes in which these suavities and amenities and deferences are supposed to be displayed. She strongly advocates higher education for women, but it is almost entirely for the comfortable reason that an interest in some one study, science, or pursuit will make their own lives infinitely happier, and relieve their poor fathers of the burden of brainless and dressy young people. She would have young ladies take up learning chiefly to escape dulness, just as, rather earlier in the Victorian age, they took up water-colors or the harp. For one moment she has a glimpse of a higher purpose, when she says that education would render mothers more fit to bring up their children. But it is not for the sake of the women themselves she speaks: it is for "the young boy" who now, she maintains, at his mother's knee "drinks in the poisons of priestcraft, of religious fear, of illogical belief, of credulous bias."

That may be true. One of the greatest of living headmasters has said it is the mothers who ruin the boys; and perhaps it is on the whole worse to learn superstitions from an ignorant mother than nothing at all from an ignorant father, which is the usual alternative. But the point to observe is that in Ouida's mind "the foam of discontent" among women is almost entirely a trivial affair, a new kind of amusement for the wealthy. Of the great economic questions involved in the demand for political recognition she has no conception whatever. For her the laws and social regulations that press on working women simply do not exist. She does not consider working women, and she has never heard of such laws.

> "We think," she writes, "that women on the whole are very fairly placed, and that the remedy for all that is vexatious lies chiefly in their own hands. The influence of women is already very great, and, although indirect, can be almost infinitely extended."

That is the talk of women who can confidently trust to backstairs influence in Cabinets, War Offices, and other public departments. It is as ignorant of the life of the people as the talk that George Meredith used to call the Oriental apprehension about spoiling the tender bloom of womanliness. Ouida never got far away from the class which was the natural butt of satirists from Juvenal to Pope—the class where the perfect woman is mistress of herself, though china fall, and where:—

> "Narcissa's nature, tolerably mild,
> To make a wash would hardly stew a child."

It is the same when in her second paper she speaks of the women whom she sometimes calls the demi-monde and sometimes "Faustina and all her infamous sisterhood." Her object is to show that the cause of their position has very seldom been love and betrayal. That, she says, certainly does not occur more than once in ten thousand times, and, with rather less vehemence, she declares that nine-tenths of the dissolute women never knew what love was. For their motives she looks to discontent with poverty and monotony; desire for the gaieties of an unknown world; the passion for sumptuous attire; the innate avarice, vanity, frivolity, greed of wealth, and impatience of routine. She will allow no "pathetic pictures of Marguerite stretched on the Cathedral steps, or Fanny" (apparently she means Fantine) "desolate in the French streets." The picture she insists upon is the woman she calls Faustina:—

> "A thing all senses and no soul, with insatiate greed, with unappeasible avarice, with continual content in honeyed evil, with unremitting hatred of all that is pure and at peace, with words that breathe poison, with passions that crave only gold."

This Faustina, Ouida tells us, is "a fact," and we think it only too likely. In the circles which the eloquent novelist's imagination haunted, that sort of woman may well exist. She is nature's helpmate to the beautiful Guardsman and the wicked Viscount. It must be rather a blow to the vanity of those gentlemen to hear that only once in ten thousand times do women err for love of them, and that a craving for gold and all the other fine things was Faustina's incentive to accepting their charms. But if Ouida's idols had any consciences left, that reflection might help to soothe their remorse, and with such consolation we may let them go their gilded way. The temptations of wealth and gaiety are common enough; and they do not appeal to women only. But when Ouida takes her Faustinas as the average type of women who sell themselves, she is at least as far wrong as the poets who created Gretchen and Fantine. The circle of her knowledge or her imagination is so limited that it hardly counts. Her judgment on the women she thus universally condemns may be as safely disregarded as her opinion that women's demand for a voice in their own government is but a relief to monotony, like the Berlin woolwork she remembered in her headstrong youth. She wrote some pretty scenes of Italian villages; we must assume she felt quite at home in the realm of vice and luxury she usually depicted; but of the ordinary life of men and women she seems to have known nothing whatever. Her stipulation that these little papers must be withheld till after her death is only another proof of her ignorance.

---

THE OUTER FIELDS.

THE unceremonious welter of a City crowd jostles and tumbles the seeker after City unrealities. He has been to the Stock Exchange and bought a piece of paper that pretends to be some microscopic share of a fleet of steamships, a ten-thousand-acre plantation, warehouses, railways, and other substantialities, yet bears upon its face not even the picture of one of them. Then the crowd, like a torrent all of pebbles, rolls over him head and ears, fills eyes and lungs with insolent tobacco smoke, pokes him in the eye with walking-sticks (carried for no conceivable walking-stick purpose), coughs at him, spits at him, treats him generally as a thing of no account. Just as he is beginning to lose belief in his own existence, an eddy in the pebble-stream throws him to one side, and leaves him stranded in the midst of a world of standing corn.

There is no doubt about it. Here is the bread that fills his phantom ships, pours into his warehouses and pays his slightly less phantom dividends—here growing in very surety, and justifying its own existence rather than that of the London Stock Exchange. The tall stalks intercrossing in delightful random are yellowed by the sun of an open sky, the ears are filled with the fresh vigor of an unclogged world. Nodding, satin-skinned horses measure the almost unlimited circumference of the field, drawing after them a huge machine that reaps, threshes, and bags the wheat in one operation. After one team follows another, and then another, each more real than the last, till surely it is we ourselves perched on the last of them, urging and releasing the lever that now takes more, now less, of the laughing bread forest. An opossum watches us, her young ready pouched, strung up for instant flight should we turn nasty. As the team struggles down-hill near a pond gloomy with reeds, the shy platypus plunges in with a ripple not unlike that of an otter in England. The distant cry of a laughing jackass, perhaps rejoicing over the fooling of a land crab, proclaims that night is drawing near.

Just then, one of those joggers, about whom Jefferies wrote so pathetically, jogs us clean out of Victoria back into the phantom world of London. We face the unrest of the Strand, the jostling pavement people, and the rattling motor-bus and taxi-cab, people for ever running eastward or westward after the ghosts of things. But having slipped through the flying interstices of the traffic we can bring up with a gasp of relief in Ontario or Rhodesia, the one a world of rosy apples and other generous fruit, the other a magic land wherein coffee and maize jump from the ground, and the grains of millet grow as large as peas. Further up, opposite the Hotel Cecil, the gates of Queensland stand open, and at the corner of Trafalgar Square the wheat country of Canada. Great flat-antlered moose look out with melancholy grandeur and ask whether you would like to come and kill them; salmon tell you of rivers packed with fish; all the ducks of sky and water promise you a lovely time if you will only come to British Columbia. Not mere pictures of moose and salmon and wild duck, but the things themselves; the crops themselves by which a man gets his living, the whip with which he drives his cattle, the gun with which he shoots the bear, and the shot bear come to life again to testify to the thrill of the encounter. These real things have a wonderfully convincing air in a world of mere pictures and symbols such as London is. They make even the jogger seem part of a pestilent nightmare.

"Is the old Mother getting a little tiresome?" whisper these winsome daughters, well knowing that the answer must be "Yes." "Then come to us who really want you, and leave the old country that is so constantly saying that you won't be missed." Nowhere is the sense of superfluity so strong as in these jostling town throngs. To the man who has been offering his services all round London, and has found the offer taken almost as a personal insult, it is nothing short of amazing to be stopped in the Strand with a pressing invitation from a country wanting men as the flowers want bees. "Can't be true," says one man as we look into the window side by side, and so earnest does he seem that we forgive him for jogging us out of New South Wales hard on to the pavement of Lombard Street. We assure him that it is in the main quite true, that they have left out the thistles, the nettles as big as elm trees, the mosquitos, the snakes and some other details that are not good for advertising purposes, as also many things that would strongly attract about one man in five. But it really is true that these far-away countries know, as we do not, that a man on the land is an asset to the State worth considerable expense to go and get.

One thing most incomprehensible to an Englishman is the trouble taken by the Government of a live country to see that its farmers get the best crops and stocks on their farms. There are red millet, white millet, Siberian millet, and we know not what other varieties collected from all over the world, experimented on and provided by a thoughtful Government for thoughtful farmers. Similarly, the world has been scoured by the Canadian Government at great and constant expense in case there should be, anywhere, anything that could well be acclimatised in one or other part of the Dominion. Let the English farmer write to his own Government for Thibetan lucerne. If he get it at all, which is extremely doubtful, it will be by the courtesy of the High Commissioner for Canada, whose Government sent one of its numerous special expeditions to Thibet for this valuable seed.

We can see something of these facts in the Australian, Canadian, and African windows. There is no window for Buckinghamshire or Shropshire or Fifeshire. It is the exiles from their empty lands that stand on London pavements and wonder at the hospitality of the distant fields. The pistons of luxury, sport, and artificiality have driven us from the open country into this pool of London, whence we rush through these Colonial syphons so alluringly let down in our midst. It is only the second best, of course, who go, the first best having gone without waiting for so much pressure. Those too much bruised by the action of the home force pump must stay, falling to lower and lower strata of the pebble stream, till they are ground to mere mud. A year ago we heard of a few who had crossed the seas to the outer fields, and who, on later news from England, thought of coming back for the small holdings. Fools, if they had! There is a small holding for one in twenty-three, and then at a rent two or three times higher than that of the large farmers.

You cannot begin at the beginning in Buckinghamshire. You cannot take an axe into the wood and build yourself a log cabin. You must have a town house costing some £70 a room—all very well, perhaps, in some years' time, but a heavy burden on thirty acres of tired meadow. A man should grow, as the wheat he plants, from the seed upward. You do not buy wheat plants half grown to stock your fields with, and the really delightful homestead is the one that has grown out of one's own handiwork, and been paid for as you go along. In a few generations there may be nothing else the world over but the brick-built villa with modern (entirely false) sanitation, with thirty acres of land strictly bounded by neighboring small holders, all of whom are named Grundy. But to-day there is still the prospect of something better—to trek into the unknown, to draw rein at the head of a new valley and say, "Here is the very place," to hew the timber and build the house, to get one's meat on the moor and in the mere, to draw one's fish fresh from the stream, to know no master but oneself. The Colonies are not just like that, without qualification, but they are sufficiently like it to call very loudly to those not quite deadened by town discipline.

---

THE RIVER.

Amid the fragrance of drying hay, the smell of beasts, the scent of ripening fruit, and the moist suggestiveness of new-turned earth, its waters have their rise. Lit by real sun, it starts its course beneath clean blue and bulging, fluffy clouds. And so it comes.

Between flat, yellow meadows where cattle browse and colored shadows swoop across the grass, and red roofs, mellowed with the moss of years, peep out from an encirclement of different greens, it wanders. Blown blossoms float upon its stream. So it glides on. Down through steep, solemn banks of soughing trees, through dusty villages, where sleepy peace and ancient order reign, past guarded rectories and manors of historical repute, past gnarled and shady orchards and hot brick walls and paddocks of long lush grass, on through clear spaces reaching to a spire or bounded by a ridge of furrowed brown, it flows and flows and flows—always continually on. And though occasionally its cool rhythm and peacefulness are sullied by contact with a fussy country-town, it gains again its quietude.

But, as it flows, the calm of its upper reaches changes. The transitions are various and gradual, but each marks the Whither of the River's course. Elaborated boat-houses and house-boats bring to its green repose, at lessening intervals, a gaiety of luxury and paint. The frequency of recent houses interrupts its banks. The flickering lines of light upon its waters are broken continually by the boats of those who row for exercise or sport. And so its features change. Past lawns, where the white-clothed tables spoil the scene, it glides through a stuccoed villadom to the tea and picnic places of the crowd. The wash of hired launches suck viciously along its trampled banks; and the strained blatance of a gramophone or the strumming of strung gut is heard. It has become a holiday resort. Still it gains strength and alters and flows on; and its waters are gradually sullying. Until its widening sides are soiled with grime, and the beginnings of the city's greyness show in a thickening fringe of little houses and chimneyed factories and a ragged dreariness of muddied slums. And then it arrives at that which gives it fame—the paved confinement of a city's waterway.

Thus from the clean, sweet quiet of the land it comes to the Big Grey City of the Great Unrest; and in its coming the simple charm and freshness of it disappear.

But with its confinement it gains dignity and mystery and a beauty of its own. For though its rippling waters have become a turgid flood, discolored and slithering between dead boundaries of brick and stone, and though the fat flatness of its breezy meads have altered to packed areas of smoke and fierce activity, its power to fascinate remains. Only the spell has changed.

For one big, sweeping curve, confusions of packed contours pile up on the double confines of its course, with jagged outlines and conflicting shapes and angles that jut out prominently and overlap and merge and finally fade away to a harmonised irregularity against the sky. Its bridges teem with heaving crowds, rumble with traffic, and thunder with the grind of iron trains. And the stress and busyness and glamor of the city crowd its waters and its banks. So that the attraction of its slipping ceaselessness is more intense.

The contrasts of its different sides are well-defined. Great buildings, rising from a frill of green, push up their ornamented pinnacles, and towering domes bulge and appear to brood; and opposite, across a stretch of undulating flood, gaunt cranes spear starkly to the sky out of a packed irregularity of huddled wharves, and mighty chimneys rise. Stern, weatherbeaten stone façades and stately structures of officialdom and hotel palaces face the grim squareness of windowed warehouses and the distant activities of squat landing-stages, where all is disorder of merchandise and a movement of ordered toil. The broad crowdedness of its big approaches and the flashing hurry of its embankment road make the squeezed alleyways and the slimy flights of steps seem more mysterious. And always upward and away on either side vistas of the city's vastness stretch and spread in massed, successive planes of roofs and spires.

Between these distorted boundaries of wall and wharf a constant traffic plies; and packed blacknesses and broad-beamed shapes break up its dim distances. Black, ladened barges crowd the fairway and the sides, and bump and heave in answer to the slaps and ripples of a swell; or drift, with the lazy indifference of floating things, through the overhanging spaces of the bridges, and just avoid the piers; or wind and swing out and jostle into line again, following unwillingly the thump and bustle of a little laboring tug. Boats struggle diagonally across the flood; squat steamers, swirling tumbled foam, and grunting tugs fuss up and down or hoot insistently and swing and turn; occasionally a vigilant police launch slips swiftly by. The red-brown coarseness of tanned sails adds a patch or fold of color here and there. And lower, where the bubbled currents swirl, tall, ocean-going steamers block the sides; and awkward iron arms swing out from either bank, with a clank and rattling of gear, to bear the burden of an Empire's industry. Commerce is paramount. The contrasts of its confines disappear; and all is monotony of warehouses and wharves.

So it flows on past where the locked dock gates frown, and the sky-lines of its widening sides subside to dreary flatnesses of sour land. And, widening and widening, it sweeps along, through the dwarfed contours of occasional towns, into the quiet of the land again; and then to sea. Thus it completes the cycle of its confluence.

Its course is almost the story of a life. For as you stand and watch, somewhere about its busiest parts, you seem to see the first faint struggle into being, the innocent exuberance of youth, the growing strength, the inevitable period of drab stress, and then maturity, marked with the gatherings of character; and on beyond its strenuousness decreases and its features dilapidate; the universal mingling with the sea is death.

But for a few bridged reaches, it is as if you looked upon a face, scarred with the furrows of a proven, striving prime; and so more interesting than youth or age.

And as a face it changes. At times it is all distant mystery, as when its being is blurred in shrouding mist; at times it frowns, lowering, or seems cold, or relentless with deceptive suavity; sometimes it fidgets fussily and frets with wind that makes all movement more revealing; and in the sun it smiles. At night it is feverishly gay with flashing twinklings, that show or suggest so much, like lighted eyes; or it hugs itself in a solemnness of sombre gloom; and now and then, under the influence of moonlight, it grows soft and its features radiate a charmed secrecy, and its waters gain their innocence again.

But above its majesty and contrasts and variety is the wonder of all that makes it what it is. For always in all its moods it tells so much.

It tells of the reaching activities of scheming men who sit and buy the produce of the earth, and of the immeasurable intricacies of the world's exchange and trade; and it recalls the metallic clang and clamor of driven manufactories. It calls up heaving spaces of encircling sea, and the foreign ports that rise white from out the blue, on arid, pink-tinted coasts. It conjures visions of hot yellow sand and dark palm-fringed shores, and the sickly smell and the tumult of bazaars, and the scorching crowdedness of Colonial cities, and the gay-colored busyness of Continental towns. For all the world helps to swell its industry.

But more than these are the stories of its own—the struggles and strivings and entanglements of herded lives. So many have taken counsel from its sliding tides, or have watched and watched its smooth oblivion, wondering. So many have grown old besides its waters, fighting to keep alive; and still so many have gone to it willingly for death. Pleasure and industry and wealth and order contribute a majesty of mighty buildings; and, amid the intersecting labyrinth of narrow ways, blind misery and clutching poverty and furtive crime wage a continual war against their influence and among themselves. On the flagged pavements of its banks hate sits and scowls, and destitution dozes in the sun, shivering, and happiness and ruin lean and brood. Love peoples the lamp-lit intervals and the gloom with dim couples, whispering. So through the city it becomes a wonderway of life.

Thus always in contemplation of its bridged smoothnesses and piled-up sides, something of its associations stirs the mind with illimitable suggestions of its life-histories. For it has received and given and heard so much of hopes and sin and courage and despairs. But always it flows on.

Short Studies.

A LATE ADVENTURE.

In one of those new cottages sprinkled round about the swollen little town as if by an explosion from within it, lives or tries to live a man who fought for many years in one of the suburbs a losing battle against London. His father had farmed land now covered by streets. He himself was persuaded to sell all but his house and garden to raise money for a business which promised his sons great wealth. He retained barely enough to live upon; the business, an honest one, failed; and in a short time further misfortunes compelled him to open a shop. He converted the house—that was once a farmhouse—into a shop, and not five years ago it could still be seen at the end of a row of gaudy glittering windows, itself a village shop, having but a common house window for the display of wares, the interior gloomy, and approached through a strip of garden where a lime tree put on and shed its leaves with the air of a princess of old romance. The back garden, half an orchard, was bordered along a side street by a high wall, and over that a broad cherry used to lean a gnarled branch and shower its blossom upon the asphalte; the foot passengers complained of the tree, which had grown without foreknowledge of the fact that men would pass below in silk hats, and the branch was lopped. In the shop itself everything was for sale, everything that officious travellers could foist upon the little weak-eyed half-farmer, half-gardener who kept the shop—hosiery, leather bags, purses, cheap jewellery, fishing tackle, cricket bats, umbrellas, walking sticks. A staircase led out of the shop to the bedrooms just as it had done when the window on the narrow landing looked over hayfields to Banstead Downs. When the cat was not lying upon the socks in the window she had very likely been kept away by a litter of kittens somewhere among the seldom-disturbed bundles of unfashionable ties, or she lay in the sun beneath the lime and watched her kittens pursuing the spiral flight of the yellow leaves.

The owner made no concessions except such as he was forced to, as when he bought the stock of jewellery because the traveller praised his cat, or allowed the cherry tree to be mutilated because the new Borough Council commanded. He dressed in breeches, gaiters, and heavy boots, and never wore a coat or took his pipe out of his mouth (except to play with puss). Seldom did he leave the house unless it was to go into the garden or to take a walk down the emptied busy street at night, when the only sound was the cricket's song from the bakers' shops. The little old house rippled over by creeper was beautiful then—the lime tree and the creeper trembling in the gusty moonlight and the windows and doorway hollow and dark and romantic, as if a poet had made them to sting men's hearts with beauty and regret.

No one can ever say what the old man thought as he slammed the door after one of these walks, and was alone with himself. Certainly he regretted the big, decorous high-gated houses that used to stand opposite his, veiled by wistaria, passion flower and clematis; the limes that used to run the whole length of his father's land, but now all gone save the one—how lovely its fallen leaves looked in the as yet untrodden streets in autumn mornings, lying flat and moistly golden under the fog; the balsam growing through the railings; the dark yew tree that looked among bright lilac and laburnum like a negro among the women in the Arabian Nights; the pathway through the churchyard, in the days before they had to rail it in to preserve the decent turf—in vain, for it is now littered with newspapers and tram tickets among the tombs of ——, Esquire, ——, Esquire, for they were all Esquires. He regretted the houses and gardens, but less than their people, the men and women of some ease and state, of speech whose kindliness was thrice kind through its careful dignity, so he thought. And then the children—there were no such children now; and the young men and women—the men a little alarming, the women strong and lovely and gentle enough to supply him with incarnations at once of all those whom he read of in the novels of Scott. They had gone long ago, except those who survived vaguely in the novels. He remembered their houses better, for it was not until after some years that they were pulled down, their orchards grubbed up, and their rich mould carried away in sacks to the trumpery villas round about—dragged along the road and spilt in a long black trail. It was wonderful dark mould, and the thought of the apples, the plums, the nectarines, the roses which had grown out of it made him furious when it was taken to the gardens of people who would be gone in a year or less, and would grow in it nothing but nasturtiums and sunflowers.

There followed a period when the old attitudes, the things that had been handed down from the last revolution, having been broken up, the gardens became a possession of nettles and docks, and fewer and fewer were the crown-imperials and hollyhocks to survive the fall of the houses. The scaffold poles, the harsh blocks of stone, the rasping piles of bricks, the scores of cold earthenware and iron articles belonging to the row of villas about to replace the old houses, looked more like ruin than preparation as they lay stark and hideous among the misty grass and still blue elms. There were days when the thrushes still sang well among the rioting undisturbed shrubberies. But soon men felled the elms and drove away their shadows for ever, and all that dwelled or could be imagined therein. No more would the trees be enchanted by the drunken early songs of blackbirds. The heavenly beauty of earthly things went away upon the timber carriages and was stamped into mud. The butts of the trees were used to decorate the gardens of the new houses. Two, indeed, were spared by someone's folly, and a main bough fell in the night and crushed through a fortnight's brickwork.

These elms had come unconsciously to be part of the real religion of men in that neighborhood, and certainly of that old man. Their cool green voices as they swayed, their masses motionless against the evenings or the summer storms, created a sense of pomp and awe. They gave mystic invitations that stirred his blood, if not his slowly working humble brain, and helped to build and keep firm that sanctuary of beauty to which we must be able to retire if we are to be more than eaters and drinkers and newspaper readers. When they were gone he wondered, still humbly, what would do their work in the minds of the new comers. Looking at the features of the younger people, held in a vice of reserve or pallidly leering, and hearing the snarl of their voices, he was not surprised. They had not been given a chance. How could they have the ease, the state, the kindliness of the old inhabitants? They had no gods, only a brand new Gothic church. Often they supported this or that new movement, or bought a brave new book, but they continued to sneer timidly or brutally at everything else. They were satisfied with a little safe departure from the common way, some mental or spiritual equivalent to the door-knocker of imitation hammered copper. They did not care very much for trees, though they planted them in every street, where the grammar-school boys and errand-boys mutilated them one by one in the dark; they cut off the heads of a score of tall poplars lest perchance the west wind should one day do the same thing when one of the million was passing below.

The new people were a mysterious, black-liveried host, the grandchildren of peers, thieves, guttersnipes, agricultural laborers, artisans, shopkeepers, professional men, farmers, foreign financiers—an unrelated multitude. They were an endless riddle to the old man. He used to stare at their houses as one might stare at a corpse in the hope of discovering that there was something alive there. They were as impenetrable as their houses when at night the blinds of the lighted rooms were drawn, and figures or parts of figures shot fantastically by. He read of their bankruptcies, their appointments, their crimes, their successes, unwittingly, in the newspapers. He could never take it as a matter of course to be continually surrounded by thousands of whom he knew nothing, to whom he was nothing. Well did they keep their secrets, this blank or shamefaced crowd of discreetly dressed people who might be penniless to-morrow.

He turned from them to his garden and cherry tree, and, thinking of those who had walked there and in the long garden on the other side of the fence, he felt at home again with his cat and her long line of descendants. That long garden had survived the big house to which it had belonged. A merchant had lived there with his family of four daughters—dark, tall women whose pride and tender speech the old trees in their garden often recalled. All were beautiful, and they were most beautiful together. They walked. They rode. They played and read in the garden, and the old man could see them there. They were said to be clever, and their father was wealthy. They were nearly always together, and as often as possible with him. They were a tribe apart, of extraordinary perfection of strength and grace, holding their own against the world. And yet, as the old man thought to himself, looking at their garden in the rain, not one of them was ever married. They had moved right into London after selling their house and land. Once or twice since they had come to his shop and made an excuse for going into the garden: they looked into their own as if they had left something there. Thinking of them, he went into his shop and opened a book. A minute black insect, disturbed from among the leaves, crawled over and over the page as he pretended to read: it went in zigzags half an inch long, lost in the black and white desert, sometimes turning the sharp edge and going to the other side of the page; but as a rule the edge alarmed it and it retreated; it was never still. It reminded him of himself. They were both lost upon the vast surface of the earth.

But of course that was not why he left. Nobody knew why he left. In his seventieth year he ran away, bursting out of the crowd as one sheep no braver than the rest will do sometimes, inexplicably. He has brought his cats with him, and he has money enough to last until he is dead. Being considered by his niece as of unsound mind, he is free to do as he will, and is happy when he is alone.

EDWARD THOMAS.

Music.

"PELLEAS ET MELISANDE."

THE present season at Covent Garden will have been made remarkable by the production of at least two remarkable operas, Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande," and Charpentier's "Louise." The first has been performed three times, but it cannot be said that the public at Covent Garden has taken the beautiful little work to its heart; the second is due for production next week. It is to be hoped the Covent Garden management is content with having mounted "Pelléas et Mélisande" with an artistic taste hardly to be expected at Covent Garden, for there is probably but little other reward but contentment. Yet Debussy's work, esoteric as it may be to the vitiated emotional taste of opera-goers, will probably have as great influence on music-drama of the future as Wagner's works have had on opera of the past and present. This influence will be both one of taste and of method. As far as taste is concerned, opera has, for a long while, lagged behind every modern trend of dramatic thought. The very subjects treated by the opera-composer are of the past. Tchaïkovsky a long while bewailed the fact that opera dealt with tragedies of the poisoned cup and dagger type. The massive myths of the Wagnerian drama stand by themselves, and until Puccini chose tragi-comedy subjects in "La Bohème" and "Madama Butterfly," and Charpentier musically illustrated the intimate life of Paris, there was no mean between the heroics of "Tristan" and "Siegfried" and the blood-and-brutality school of the neo-Italian composers. Anything in the nature of tragedy has been emotionally exaggerated in opera. The public has been taught to expect an emotional orgy in opera, and it may well be one of the reasons for the popularity of the art that it panders to sensationalism. The satiated sensualist finds that opera arouses his moribund emotions. A stall at Covent Garden might be a kind of spiritual Turkish bath for those who wish to get rid of a surplus of sensuousness. To most it is, however, a tonic for failing appetites.

For this reason Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" cannot be expected to have an extended appeal. Maeterlinck's dream-play is not for all tastes. The average Briton objects to its symbolism. You cannot label its emotions or its moods. Indeed, many, no doubt, sympathise with Golans's irritable curiosity as to the nature of the love of Mélisande and Pelléas—"et je voudrais savoir." Debussy does not write for the average Briton. He composes for those who have imagination; for those who do not want things explained, but understand by intuition. There cannot be a large public for such music in England. The whole atmosphere of the opera is dreamlike. Its pathos has the delicate hues of the sky in the East when the sun is setting. There is but little of the riot of reds and yellows and purples of the sunset itself. Yet the music is full of emotion, only it is not emotion in the crude, but sublimated by having been passed through the alembic of the imagination. Such a mood is not for Covent Garden, where, tastefully as the work was mounted and performed, it was treated as an opera, with lights in the auditorium only half-down and people chattering and fidgeting in their stalls and boxes. At the full rehearsals, with only a score or two of people as an audience, and with the auditorium quite dark, it was possible to let Debussy's beautiful interludes, which connect and illustrate the scenes, sink deep into the mind. At the performances the buzz of talk dissipated the effect of the music. Music which does not make a brazen appeal to primitive emotions demands concentration for its proper appreciation. If Debussy were a cult his opera would have been treated as if it were a religious ceremony, as the performances of all great art should be.

As it was, "Pelléas et Mélisande" was voted strange and incomprehensible, save by the few to whom a new voice always speaks. And there is a new voice in "Pelléas et Mélisande." It is a voice from the antique world of emotional sanity and balance. You must go back to Gluck for the emotional scheme of "Pelléas et Mélisande." Debussy does not assault your feelings. He arouses them by suggestion; he seeks to make his audience active participators in his art. On those capable of first-hand feeling this music makes a strange effect of reality, precisely because no emotion has been exaggerated. It would be impossible, for instance, to imagine more pathos than Debussy has achieved in the death of Mélisande, by the simplest musical means. This and many another scene in the music-drama will stand as a reformation of operatic taste. According to the subject the character of the music might differ, but one thing will be common to all music-dramas of the future if this sensitive, imaginative art of Debussy's has any influence at all: music will no longer seek to be egotistical when it is allied to drama; its function will be to suggest emotion rather than to realise and exaggerate it.

That is the very opposite of the Wagnerian methods. The composer of "Tristan" and the "Ring," in spite of all his theories, remained an "absolute" musician. His treatment of his subjects was conditioned almost entirely by his egotism as musician. The very form and architecture of his music prove that drama was of subsidiary importance to his mind. To none but a musician would the idea have come of weaving the voice and orchestra into a symphonic whole. The result is most interesting as music, but cannot be defended on any artistic ground. The protagonists of drama are its means of expression, and if their voices are to be interwoven with the author's orchestral commentary, as they are interwoven in Wagner's late music-dramas, they have no real existence of their own. In a practical sense Wagner's method has the disadvantage of making the dramatic speech too measured. The drama halts that the orchestra may speak, and the voices never become dominant. Musicians will object that whether the Wagnerian music-drama is drama or not, it is certainly very fine music. Why should any artistic theory stand in the way of a practice which has given us such magnificent music? There is sense in the question, although it begs the matter at issue. Carried to its logical conclusion, this method of Wagner's swings us back to the old decorative type of opera, which did not pretend to be music-drama; for if music be the main end in view, why omit beautiful musical conventions, such as concerted music, choruses, and ballets? In composing "Die Meistersinger," "Götterdämmerung," and "Parsifal," Wagner seems to have asked himself the question. Debussy, on the other hand, has really been more Wagnerian than Wagner. The drama of "Pelléas et Mélisande" has absolutely conditioned the music. The music and drama cannot be separated. Nearly the whole of Maeterlinck's play has been set to music, and the composer has so subordinated his orchestra that it never once interferes with the speech of the dramatis personæ, but merely provides a shifting emotional background, emphasising and explaining the dramatic situations. The orchestra has a separate existence from the voices, and the two are not woven together symphonically.

The result is a curious freedom of expression, which in Debussy's hands is as plastic as ordinary speech. In writing for the voice the composer has been a trifle doctrinaire. He has himself defended his "sprachmelodie," or constant chant, by declaring that he wished the action should never be arrested; that it should be continuous, uninterrupted. But it is not easy to see, except from the point of view of technical expediency, why the vocal parts should be so persistently unmelodic. Indeed, there are many situations in "Pelléas et Mélisande" which seemed to demand a more lyrical character. A symmetrical melody would interrupt the action, it is true, but the declamation could be more melodious without losing its continuity. The technical expediency is that it is much easier to write flowing orchestral music to voice parts which are practically neutral in character. Immediately the voices become at all melodious there is the difficulty of combining them with the orchestra, so that cacophony does not result. It can easily be done, however, without actually departing from Debussy's methods. This rigid adherence to doctrine is the only weakness of "Pelléas et Mélisande" as a model of what music and drama in strict and sympathetic union can achieve.

E. A. Baughan.

The Drama.

A SKIT AND AN INVECTIVE.

It is just thirty years since Matthew Arnold, in a famous essay, declared the English drama to be "fantastic"—or, in other words, unrelated to anything in heaven, earth, or the waters under the earth. Roughly speaking, that was true: the practice of adapting plays from the French had led both playwrights and the public to forget that any relevance to the actual facts of English life, or of human life at large, could possibly be expected in the theatre. How far we have moved since then! Is not the most popular play of the season (for good or ill) a satiric pamphlet, as directly pertinent as any debate at Westminster to the problems of our national life? Has not His Omnipotence the Censor turned his attention from the licensing of French levity (his chief function of yore) to the silencing of British seriousness? Have we not applauded, only the other day, a play depicting with the sternest sincerity a phase of the struggle between Capital and Labor? And are not two plays running at this present moment, which take their theme from one of the crying abuses of latter-day journalism, and might be described as dramatisations of a series of articles which appeared a few months ago in these columns?

The intellectual merits of "The Earth" and "What the Public Wants" were discussed in my absence by "H. W. M."; but I welcome the opportunity afforded by Mr. Hawtrey's revival of the latter play for a comparison of their technical qualities.

Both the strength and the weakness of Mr. Arnold Bennett's work were thrown into relief by its first-night success at the Royalty. Its cleverness and its perfunctoriness were alike apparent in the fact that it bore without turning a hair, so to speak, its transposition from the key of satiric character-study into that of touch-and-go comedy, bordering on farce. I did not see the original performance, but I can quite well imagine that the piece profited by the change. Mr. Hawtrey's selection of the part of Sir Charles Worgan astonished many people; but he was right in seeing in it a fine opportunity. Nothing could be less like the author's idea than the figure he presented. Mr. Bennett drew a hustling provincial business-man, full of eager, self-assertive energy, and with a very limited sense of humor. Mr. Hawtrey shows us a rattling, airy humorist, a Londoner to the finger-tips, whose delinquencies proceed, not from "a blind spot" in his moral nature, but from sheer congenital irresponsibility. The difference is something like that between Balzac's Mercadet and "Mr. Affable Hawk," as portrayed by Charles Mathews. Of course the specific quality of the character disappears; a Sir Charles Worgan who does not take himself seriously is a contradiction in terms. And manifestly, if the play were a serious one, this transmogrification of the principal character would ruin it. But, as a matter of fact, no real incongruity is felt, because there was no real, fundamental congruity. The play was, in its essence, not an artistic transcript of a phase of life, but a brilliant skit, a vehicle for smart, and sometimes biting, topical allusions. The intervention of Mr. Hawtrey merely makes the skit more brilliant, and (I imagine) more enjoyable. Certainly I enjoyed it extremely, and so did the audience. Only in the third act, the scene in the Worgan home at Bursley, did one feel the slightest approach to tedium. Here the skit gave place to a study of provincial life, interesting only in so far as it was credible, and vitiated, from that point of view, by the incredibility of the principal character. Wherever Mr. Hawtrey may have been born, it was certainly not in the Five Towns. But in truth I am not at all sure that this act would have been very fascinating even if the play had not been transposed from its original key. For reasons to be set forth anon, I am inclined to think the excursion to Bursley an artistic mistake. However, it did not seriously impair the success of the reproduction.

Let us now look, by way of contrast, at "The Earth." Here is no skit at all, but rather a fierce invective, and in one sense an unfair one. It is very like hitting below the belt to draw a character unmistakably intended for a real individual, and then to make the character guilty of a particular piece of baseness which no one believes or suggests that that individual ever committed. That is what Ibsen did in the character of Stensgaard in "The League of Youth"—he unmistakably depicted Björnson, and then made him an unscrupulous adventurer. Another case in point is that of Harold Skimpole and Leigh Hunt. If in this instance the original of Sir Felix Janion had resented the treatment meted out to him, one could scarcely have blamed him; but this personal question has nothing to do with the artistic merits of the play.

I understand that these are held in slight account by the adepts of the new school, who profess an inexorable contempt for everything that is straightforward, and, as they think, commonplace. No doubt, then, I shall sink lower than ever in their esteem if I confess that "The Earth" seems to me a much better play than "What the Public Wants." I do not mean a cleverer play; I do not think that Mr. Fagan's intelligence is as bright and original as Mr. Arnold Bennett's; but it is quite good enough for practical purposes, and it is, in this instance, much more skilfully applied to the essential purposes of drama. I went to "The Earth" (let me confess) prejudiced against it. The author's former work had led me to look for nothing more than respectable mediocrity, and the accounts I had heard of this play had in no way heightened my expectations. All the greater was my pleasure in the strong, sincere, and truly ingenious satiric drama that awaited me. In calling it ingenious I am not thinking of the invention of the plot, which is commonplace enough, but of its solution. The method by which Lady Killone checkmates Janion is far from obvious, and yet, when once conceived, seems as obviously right as it is strikingly dramatic.

What I admire in Mr. Fagan's play is the way in which he goes direct to the very heart of his subject, and allows nothing to turn him aside from it. What is the true mischief and danger of the concentration of journalistic power in the hands of one man? Is it that he will lower the standards of taste and decency by always giving the public—the baser element of the public—"what it wants"? Not at all—there are always plenty of people willing to make money by this means, and, if pandering to the public were the real evil, it would matter very little whether it was done by scattered and unorganised or by concentrated and organised enterprise. What does matter, on the other hand, is that the power gained by organised enterprise on these lines enables the organiser to make the public want what he wants, think what he thinks, believe what he wants them to believe, do what he wants them to do. By dint of unscrupulous assertion, innuendo, and iteration in a hundred papers, he can create an apparent public opinion, or public emotion, which presently reacts irresistibly, and it may be with disastrous results, upon the real opinion and emotion of large sections of the public. To take an instance that lies close at hand, it would be foolishness to say that "the public wants" war with Germany; but if, or when, the magnates of the yellow press want it, they will not (one hopes) succeed in bringing it about, but they will be able to make it appear as though an immense number of the public shared their frenzy. This, I take it, is the serious aspect of journalistic autocracy; and it is this aspect which Mr. Fagan's play illustrates, merely glancing incidentally at the methods by which the autocracy is created.

Again, it is alleged that Mr. Fagan's politician, the Right Hon. Denzil Trevena, is a dummy politician, and that no insight is shown into the real workings of political life. The objection is in great measure just, but I submit that it is irrelevant. Certainly, when we compare Trevena with Trebell in "Waste," we feel that Mr. Barker's hero is incomparably better realised and vitalised than Mr. Fagan's. But what then? The character of Trebell was Mr. Barker's subject, and his whole effort was directed to (as it were) getting the scent of politics over the footlights. But Trevena is not Mr. Fagan's subject; he is only an accessory, a means of illustrating the policy and methods of Janion; any searching examination either of his heart or of his Bill would have been a mere digression. He is well enough drawn so far as he goes; there is real observation and insight in the very recklessness of his relation to Lady Killone; to have elaborated him further would, I think, have been an artistic mistake. "But," it may be said, "granting that Janion, and not Trevena, is the subject of the play, what do we really know of Janion? He is not a real character, but a mere incarnation of domineering unscrupulousness. Look at Mr. Bennett's Worgan—he is a real, a many-sided human being! We see him in love, we see him in the bosom of his family; we learn his views on the drama, on society, and on the split infinitive." Yes, that is true: Janion is little more than an incarnation of the Napoleonic mania in journalism: he is more a symbol than a character. But what if that is precisely "what the public wants," and is right in wanting? For Mr. Fagan's purpose, Janion in love, Janion in the bosom of his family, would have been the veriest irrelevance. He set forth to illustrate, in large, strong, simple lines, a danger to the community arising from a certain development of latter-day journalism; and, by keeping sedulously within the limits of his subject, he showed himself at once a logician and an artist—for logic is an indispensable element in this form of art. Mr. Bennett, again, set forth to—well, the trouble is that one does not quite know what Mr. Bennett set forth to do. Was it to write a satire on yellow journalism? or a portrait-group of an English provincial family? It would seem that he did not clearly make up his mind; and hence the artistic weakness of his play. The satire is developed out of all proportion to the portraiture, while the portraiture has no essential connection with the satire. The new journalism, as "H.W.M." pointed out, does not come from the Potteries. He might have added that it is not characteristically an outcome of any form of English provincial life. Sir Charles Worgan hails from Bursley merely because his creator happens to be familiar with the Five Towns—and that is no reason at all. It is less than no reason—it means an intrusion of accident or whim into a study in which nothing is in place that is not strictly characteristic.

One word more. Mr. Shaw has very rightly pointed out the gross inconsistency into which the Censor fell in licensing "The Earth," in which systematic immorality is not only condoned, but almost glorified, and vetoing "Waste," in which a comparatively trivial lapse in conduct is visited with ruthless retribution. The one play might have been called "The Victorious Adultery," the other "The Wages of Sin"; and it is the moral play (from his own point of view) that the Censor suppresses, the immoral play that he licenses without a murmur. The absurdity is patent; but it lies, not in the licensing of Mr. Fagan's play, but in the suppression of Mr. Barker's. As a matter of fact, Mr. Fagan cannot reasonably be taken as claiming our approval for the relation between Trevena and Lady Killone. His thesis is precisely the same as Mr. Barker's—namely, that private morality is one thing, public usefulness another, and that they should so far as possible be kept apart. In the present phase of public feeling, however, it is impossible to keep the two things apart—when once a breach of the moral code becomes notorious. Of this fact Janion seeks to take advantage in a wholly unscrupulous way. He does not for a moment believe that Trevena's relation to Lady Killone affects the value of his Bill or his general merits as a statesman; yet he is prepared to use knowledge gained by an infamous process of spying in order to hound him out of public life. The author assumes our disapproval of this course, but that is the only moral judgment he demands of us. To put it in more general terms, he assumes our assent to the proposition that certain forms of private misconduct in no way impair a man's public usefulness, and that it is a dastardly act, from merely party motives, to drag such misconduct to light. Janion, in fact, is guilty of an abominable hypocrisy—and that is all the author asks us to admit. To demand any further admission or assumption would be to travel beyond the limits of the subject, and that is just what Mr. Fagan scrupulously refrains from doing.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

THE PARTY AND THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think it can quite fairly be said that a new spirit has come into the party since the introduction of the Budget. In my last letter I was inclined to be despondent when I spoke of the signs of discontent which were evident to any observer, and it would, of course, be too much to assume that a body of men as large as the Liberals in the House of Commons were now contentedly joined in harmonious agreement and approval on all points. The very fact that they are Liberals prevents this. But the former décousu state of listless indifference has undoubtedly given place to eager expectancy and renewed vitality. Many are hopeful, a few are critical, all are interested. The Social Reformers, the Land Reformers, and the Temperance Reformers see a sure prospect of advance being made, a positive advance in the near future which by their active support they can assist in securing. It comes in a form which unlike a Licensing Bill or a Land Bill cannot suffer mutilation from hostile forces after the House of Commons have finally expressed their opinion. More than this, they see that lines are to be constructed on which the Liberal train can run in the future; a course is to be laid down in the right direction and a vista opened of cheering possibilities for time to come. It is the least Liberal of the party who are the most critical, and they can be carried along in spite of themselves in the general enthusiasm of the great body of advanced opinion. Moreover, they have to reckon with their constituents who are carefully scrutinising their votes and speeches.

The Finance Bill is a heavy load, but there is amply sufficient force and will power in the party to carry it through, however protracted the session may have to be. Here is an opportunity to make up for some of the time which the Liberal Government, against their will, have been made to waste in the last three years. There is no doubt as to the equity, though in some cases there may be dispute as to the practicability of some of the projects embodied in the Budget proposals. Such points of detail can be thrashed out as the discussion proceeds, and the Chancellor's happy method of combining firmness in matters of principle with a conciliatory disposition to listen to and even invite criticism on points of detail, promises well for the eventual safe passage of his whole scheme in all its complexity and with its vastly comprehensive scope. Had he neglected to include land and licences in his proposals for raising revenue, had he been tempted to lay the burden more heavily on the indirect taxpayer through sugar and tea, he would have had a broken party behind him and would have found considerable difficulty in steering his measure through the cross-fire of criticism. As it is, he has a united backing, from the Labor Party as well as from Liberals, which must have the effect of appreciably lightening his task.

The attitude of the Cabinet with regard to the Budget is, of course, not known, but it is generally suspected that Mr. Lloyd George had to exhibit some of his characteristic pertinacity in superintending the actual birth of his scheme. Anyhow, on the first public opportunity the Prime Minister has given his unqualified and wholehearted blessing to the measure, and the reception it has been accorded in the country is sufficient to reassure the more timid and cautious that fearless courage and a determination to advance is the style of policy that commends itself to Liberals at the present juncture. And from now on to the General Election there must be no slackening of the pace and no period of hesitancy and indecision must be allowed to intervene.

I repeat, time has been wasted in the last three years, and their absorption in the work of the Budget will not allow Liberals to forget why and how that time has been wasted. When they go to the constituencies to ask for a renewal of their mandate they must have a clear-cut proposal for the prevention of further waste of time by the action of the Lords in future Parliaments.

As to the Opposition, the howl of protest that has gone up from Unionist members at finding a fair share of the burden which they were only too eager to pile up placed on the broad shoulders of those who are best able to bear it, has not been an edifying exhibition. Tariff Reformers, too, are visibly sore at the success of Free Trade Finance. But, on the whole, the Opposition is not going to be very formidable. The small band of habitual obstructionists are devoid of talent, weighty criticism from the Opposition benches is infrequent, and the marked contrast between the ponderous indignation of the late Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer and the light, bantering, good-humored criticism of the Leader of the Opposition affords a good deal of amusement to those who are watching the progress of Tariff Reform in the Tory ranks.

With regard to other measures, it is a matter of congratulation that the Housing Bill is to be pushed forward, and those who heard Mr. Churchill's speech on Labor Exchanges realised with great satisfaction that much mining and sapping is being done to prepare for an attack from many quarters on the all-important problem of unemployment.

If I have to record one blot it is because I believe it to be a serious one. The attitude of the Secretary of State with regard to Indian deportations is causing grave apprehension. The small band of Radicals who are continually asking questions on the subject are not alone. Men with knowledge of India, who are not members of Parliament, are expressing deep regret that a policy should be persisted in which must aggravate hostile opinion in India and which is so hideously discordant with the most rudimentary principles of Liberalism.—Yours, &c.,

A Radical Member.

June 2nd, 1909.

CHARLES DICKENS AND LEIGH HUNT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Were it not for the letter which is reproduced by Mr. Nevinson, and which is new to me—the letter in which Skimpole is said to be astonishingly life-like and "awfully true"—I should have been prepared to contend that Dickens had not even a remote intention of leading his friends, to say nothing of the reading public, to identify the composite character of Harold Skimpole with Leigh Hunt. That, indeed, was what Dickens himself contended. But the letter, I admit, is a difficulty. It is much more "astonishing" than any likeness there can have been between a distinguished and delightful man of letters and one of the prominent figures in "Bleak House."

What Dickens has told us himself is this:—

> "Four or five years ago the writer of these lines was much pained by accidentally encountering a printed statement 'that Mr. Leigh Hunt was the original of Harold Skimpole in "Bleak House."' The writer of these lines is the author of that book. The statement came from America. . . . Since Mr. Leigh Hunt's death the statement has been revived in England. The delicacy and generosity evinced in its revival are for the rather late consideration of its revivers. The fact is this: Exactly those graces and charms of manner which are remembered in the words we have quoted (the allusion here is to what Thornton Hunt had written of his father), were remembered by the author of the work of fiction in question, when he drew the character in question. Above all other things, that 'sort of gay and ostentatious wilfulness' in the humoring of a subject, which had many a time delighted him, and impressed him as being unspeakably whimsical and attractive, was the very quality he wanted for the man he invented. . . . He had no more thought, God forgive him! that the admired original would ever be charged with the imaginary vices of the fictitious creature, than he has himself ever thought of charging the blood of Desdemona and Othello on the innocent Academy model who sat for Iago's leg in the picture. Even as to the mere occasional manner, he meant to be so cautious and conscientious, that he privately referred the proof sheets of the first number of that book to two intimate literary friends of Leigh Hunt, and altered the whole of that part of the text on their discovering too strong a resemblance to his 'way.'"

That is emphatic enough, and quite inconsistent with the letter which is reproduced by Mr. Nevinson from "Harper's Magazine." The letter is American, as, says Dickens, was the first identification of Leigh Hunt with Harold Skimpole. Is it beyond question genuine? I should make this inquiry with more confidence as to the reply if it were not for the undoubtedly genuine letter, also quoted by Mr. Nevinson, written by Dickens to Leigh Hunt on June 28th, 1855. Clearly, the identification had been made by Hunt himself, with pained surprise. "I thought," says Dickens, "of the little notice which has given you (I rejoice most heartily to find) so much pleasure—as the best means that could possibly present themselves of enabling me to express myself publicly about you as you would desire." What was this little notice? It was an article in that number of "Household Words" which is dated June 16th, 1855, the title being, "By Rail to Parnassus." The writer professes to be a poor clerk travelling to Southampton in search of employment. At Waterloo he purchases a volume of Leigh Hunt's "Stories in Verse," which may have been the small volume of collected poems published by Moxon in 1847. Later on, he says, as if speaking to a fellow passenger:—

> "These are just stories in verse, which may be enjoyed by the entire mass of the people. There is even as little as possible of simple meditation in them, though that would have been welcome from the mind of a pure-hearted man, beloved of poets in his youth and in his prime, now worthy to be loved of all mankind. Of him there are fewer to speak ill than even of Robin Hood, when not a soul in Locksley town would speak him an ill word. . . . I had made two journeys at one time, having paid a trifling sum for a perpetual ticket (which I shall take heed to keep by me), set out in company with a right genial and noble story-teller to Parnassus."

This article was the first portion of the reparation made to Leigh Hunt for what one would like to continue to think of as an innocent indiscretion. A few months after the poet's death—in December, 1859, to be precise—there appeared in "All the Year Round" an article entitled "Leigh Hunt: A Remonstrance," from which I have already quoted. "We cannot see the son lay this wreath on the father's tomb," says Dickens of the completed autobiography, "and leave him to the possibility of ever thinking that the present words might have righted the father's memory and were left unwritten."

Even the reparation was not felt to be quite complete. It is surely illustrative of the finer part of the character of Dickens that he wore this imputation about Leigh Hunt as if it were a shirt of Nessus. "All the Year Round" for April 12th, 1862, contains a long article occasioned by the publication of the "Correspondence."

> "Leigh Hunt's was an essentially human nature," it is there observed, "rich and inclusive; and it is reflected with great completeness in the letters here given to the public. We see the writer in their varied contents, as those who knew him familiarly knew him in his everyday life; sometimes overclouded with the shadow of affliction, but more often bright and hopeful, and at all times sympathetic: taking a keen delight in all beautiful things. . . . It has been said occasionally that Leigh Hunt was a weak man. . . But a man who had the courage to take his stand against power on behalf of right—who in the midst of the sorest temptations maintained his honesty unblemished by a single stain—who in all public and private transactions was the very soul of truth and honor—who never bartered his opinion or betrayed his friend—could not have been a weak man; for weakness is treacherous and false, because it has not the power to resist."

On Leigh Hunt's brightness and hopefulness Mr. Nevinson has thrown a new light. Under the actual circumstances these qualities were heroic. That first letter of Dr. Bird is a revelation. It would have been a revelation to Dickens, I fancy. It would have been a revelation to most, if not all, of the friends of Leigh Hunt. Such splendid concealment of the worst form of domestic trouble as is there made plain causes that fine nature to stand out with a new radiance. How great in character the man must have been!—Yours, &c.,

AARON WATSON.

June 2nd, 1909.

---

Letters to the Editor.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mrs. Rackham's interesting letter in THE NATION of May 29th raises the question of the part to be played by the Registrar of Public Assistance, after the break-up of the Poor Law proposed in the Minority Report.

The need for some such office as that of the Registrar will be apparent to those who realise the demoralisation caused by the present chaos. This chaos, characteristic alike of town and country, prevails not only in the overlapping activities of the various public authorities, but also in their practice of enforcing payment of the cost of their assistance. The Commissioners themselves came across cases in which various members of the same family were simultaneously being relieved or treated at the public expense by the Education Authority, the Health Authority, the Police Authority, the Lunacy Authority, and the Poor Law Authority or some of them—not to mention voluntary agencies of different kinds—without any one of these authorities being aware of the action of the others. The result is, at present, side by side, many families whose destitution is unrelieved, and others which are receiving, in the aggregate, more than the average laborer's income. Even more startling was the discovery, fully described in the Minority Report, that a similar chaos exists with regard to "charge and recovery," that is, the enforcement of repayment. At present, it depends entirely on the policy—more often the caprice—of particular meetings of particular committees, the decision depending on which members happen to be present, and in which mood these happen to be, whether any, and if so what, charge is made for the assistance granted or forced on the family, in respect of destitution, neglected childhood, lunacy, maternity, sickness, or accident. We found many families in quite good circumstances getting public assistance from one or another authority without repayment of its cost, whilst other families, absolutely indigent, were being charged for assistance which they had sometimes been actually forced to accept. In one case, the breadwinner of the family had been put in prison by the Education Authority for non-payment of its charge for an industrial school child, at the very time that he and his family were so destitute as to be in receipt of outdoor relief from the Board of Guardians.

We, of the Minority, regard it of vital importance to put an end to this unfair and demoralising inequality. The setting up of any new Poor Law Authority, adopting "curative and restorative treatment," will only aggravate it. The abolition of the Poor Law Authority and the transfer of its component services to existing authorities, will, in itself, not end it. We see no other remedy than a common register of all forms of public assistance, in charge of a local officer to be appointed and controlled by the County or County Borough Council, but to be independent of the various treating committees. To this officer, for the sake of securing a uniform administration of these "special assessments," we propose to entrust also the whole work of whatever "charge and recovery" Parliament thinks fit to enforce.

I now proceed to Mrs. Rackham's questions:—

1. Is there not a danger that the insistence by the Registrar of Public Assistance on charge and recovery may hang a burden of debt round the necks of those treated? The Minority have to meet two sets of critics. They have been accused of proposing a demoralising laxness leading to a wholesale extension of pauperism. Now it is suggested that their proposals guard against this danger only too adequately, and that their arrangements will involve the payment by some of the poor of even more than the whole of their scanty possessions! But this, surely, is a matter for Parliament to regulate. It is urged in the Minority Report that it ought to be definitely provided by law, not only what service (e.g., maintenance of children in lunatic asylums) should alone be charged for; but also what should be the standard of ability to repay. This done, the law ought to be consistently and invariably enforced. I may say that the Home Office charges for children in reformatory and industrial schools are demanded upon a definite (though unpromulgated) scale, in practice revisable at every change of family circumstances, nothing being exacted where the family income is not such as to leave a taxable surplus over bare maintenance. It is inconceivable that Parliament should ever authorise charge and recovery where no such surplus exists. Thus, there ought to be no danger of any burden of debt.

2. Why do the proposals of the Minority Report ignore the provision made by Friendly Societies, provident clubs, and private charity? This is entirely a misunderstanding. There is no such ignoring, any more than of personal savings or private charity. We may hope that the local register of Public Assistance will at once include all possible particulars (case-paper fashion) of every family in receipt of any form of public assistance. Only, the Minority did not venture to propose to make it legally compulsory on Friendly Societies, voluntary hospitals, and private donors to notify their benefactions under penalty of a fine for non-compliance. I wish that this were practicable! Notification will be legally compulsory at first only on the various public authorities. It is hoped that the voluntary hospitals and other organised charities will promptly see the advantage of voluntarily notifying all recipients of their benefactions to the Registrar. We may yet come to enforcing this by law!

3. Will not the Registrar be practically driven to sanction all the Home Aliment proposed by the "expert" authorities? It may certainly be anticipated that the Registrar and his staff will be quite unable to criticise the methods of treatment proposed for the particular cases by the specialised treating authority. But this will be quite outside his functions. All that he will have to consider is (a) whether the case is one that falls within the definite rules imposed by Parliament, by the Central Executive and by the local County or Borough Council, as being eligible for Home Aliment; (b) whether the concurrence of the other Local Authorities (e.g., Education or Health or Lunacy or Pension, as the case may be), responsible for the other members of the same family, has been secured for the domiciliary treatment of the case; and (c) whether the Home Aliment proposed by the treating authority is (i) adequate, and (ii) not excessive, according to the prescribed standard of maintenance and the ascertained economic resources, whencesoever derived. The Registrar will in no way impugn the judgment of the Education Committee, or the Health Committee or the Lunacy Committee that the child, the sick person, or the feeble-minded can be, from the professional standpoint, suitably treated in the home. His duty will be ministerial only. He will have no discretion as to policy. But, upon the policy formulated by the elected representatives, he may decide (as directed by them in such case to do) that the other circumstances of the case (e.g., the family earnings, the character of the home as reported by the other local authorities, the amount of other assistance being supplied to the same family as revealed by the register) not necessarily within the knowledge of the treating authority, make the case one for institutional treatment only. (The six Registrars suggested for the Metropolis would, sitting five days a week, be able to pass in review, and sanction, at least as many cases as thirty Boards of Guardians or Relief Committees sitting weekly; especially as a more uniformly organised subordinate staff than the present may be assumed. The exact number is, however, not relevant).

It is, of course, scarcely to be expected that proposals so elaborate and complicated as those contained in the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission should at once command assent in all their details. The elaborateness and complication were required by the breadth and complexity of the subject; and the very detail in which the proposals have been worked out, whilst it multiplies the points of difference, will probably be accounted of value, in contrast with the vague generalities of some other projects of reform. I venture to ask all those who agree with the underlying principle—that of superseding mere relief by a systematic campaign for preventing or arresting the causes of destitution; and with the essential feature of the machinery—that of breaking-up the present Poor Law, in order to assign each section of paupers to the organ of administration already charged with dealing in a preventive or curative manner with that section of the population at large—to send in their adhesion to the National Committee to Promote the Break-up of the Poor Law. That adhesion commits them to no one detail of the Minority Report.

Let me say, in conclusion, that no one, not even a Minority, can presume to foresee, in all details, how the difficulties inherent in all administration will in practice be overcome. To those who, on this ground, hesitate to join the National Committee, I venture to suggest that Solvitur ambulando is no bad maxim.—Yours, &c.,

BEATRICE WEBB.
(Mrs. Sidney Webb.)

The National Committee to Promote the Break-up of the Poor Law,
5 and 6, Clements Inn, London, W.C.
June 2nd, 1909.

---

THE IMPERIAL CABLE SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an Australian Imperialist to whom recent events mark an obviously critical turning in our difficult path, I cherish the hope that in spite of the absorptions of party here in London and in the British Capitals Overseas there are a few who earnestly study the problem of linking together in common knowledge and ideals the drifting units of the Empire. The recent storm of agitation cannot but arouse in such minds grave misgivings as to the adequacy of existing means of communication. Even here in the heart of the Empire, one has been afflicted with a baffling sense of the difficulty of facing impartially the immediate problem of naval defence. So many masters have called us to their schools, so many feverish orators have shouted the truth about the Navy. But the headlines above the cable columns in the Australian papers of the last ten days of March, tell of a sensational distortion of news beyond the wildest ravings of London. Six, eight, and ten inches of block head-lines are the rule; the man who could open his breakfast paper without feeling that the world was upside down, would, under such circumstances, be indeed a stolid Anglo-Saxon.

An examination of the cables beneath shows the basis of the exaggeration. The most striking sentences of that week of over-wrought rhetoric make formidable reading when concentrated in Fleet Street in the hurried early morning hours, and expanded in Sydney or Melbourne under the influence of the mixed motives of sensationalism and journalism.

Take, for example, the "Melbourne Age" on Sir Edward Grey's reply to the censure motion. The headlines run:—"Germany's Huge Programme, Thirty-three 'Dreadnoughts.' A Sensational Statement: 'British Fleet must be Rebuilt.'"

Under which we are informed that the Foreign Secretary "commended the absence of party feeling in Mr. Lee's remarks, but declared that the Opposition ought to have deferred its motion of censure until July, when the ship-building vote would come up for consideration, and there would be more information available on which to form a right judgment. The House and the country were perfectly right to view the new situation created by the German Programme as grave. When that Programme was complete Germany would have thirty-three 'Dreadnoughts'—the most powerful Fleet in the world. That imposed upon Great Britain the necessity of re-building her whole Fleet."

In New Zealand, again, Sir Joseph Ward was evidently under the impression that parties in England were in cordial agreement as to the imminence of the danger to national security. His message to the local press says as much in plain terms.

The danger in all this is not deliberate falsification of news, but rather an hysterical over-statement resulting from too scanty a cable service. When, as is the case in Australia and New Zealand, public opinion is informed (sic) by a few dailies which alone can bear the exorbitant charges levied by a cable ring, who can wonder at an excitable attitude on Imperial questions? The case is made the more serious by the absence of any real check in the shape of rival cables. All the Australian and New Zealand dailies are in a cable syndicate, and make use of a single set of messages, prepared by a single individual. This is not sufficiently realised in Australia. The man in the street is convinced by the fictitious unanimity of papers he knows as constant rivals. The consequence is that Australia and New Zealand are converted into subjects ideally isolated for psychological experiment on the "crowd mind." By exhibiting to the subjects sheets on which are printed in large type "The Race with Germany." "Hastening Construction." "Dreadnoughts Wanted." "New Zealand's Example", some instructive instances of instinctive combativeness are to be obtained.

But this is not a time for experimenting. There is menace to healthy Imperial relations in this control of the news of Australia and New Zealand by an irresponsible private censor, however well-intentioned he may be.

Obviously the component parts of the Empire must know one another better if their kindly feelings and aspiration for a higher degree of organised co-operation are to take shape and form. Speaking from personal experience and from wide-spread testimony of Colonial visitors, nothing strikes us more when we come "home" than the keen interest everyone shows in conditions "down under." It is just the same when one returns. There is an envious longing in the eye of the Australian or New Zealander who buttonholes a friend just returned from the old country and demands to be told "all about it." But the prospects of satisfying, or even preserving, this craving for a common life, are infinitesimal while this attenuated cable service misleads overseas opinion by its scraps and headlines. The writer knows how hopeless it is in Australia to estimate the party objects that often give a simple explanation of rhetorical over-statements. Under the existing conditions there is something more than a chance that party manipulators may use a pathetically well-meaning loyalty to the Empire for purely party ends. Judging by a statement from the Australian correspondent of the "Times," the recent events there bear such an interpretation. He tells us that "the story of this 'Dreadnought' agitation in New South Wales and Victoria cannot be fully told until the emergency is well past and men can consider it coolly without being called disloyalists or jingos. When the 'Dreadnought' movement struggled through to some sort of orderly organisation, it became clear that the control of it was largely in the hands of men who were using it to defeat either the local squadron scheme or the proposed land tax." In a parallel column of the same issue is to be found a report of Lord Grey's speech at Ottawa to the Australasian delegates to the Press Conference. In it he shows how strongly he feels the dangers of a policy of drift in regard to communications.

"He felt sure," the report tells us, "that the forthcoming Press Conference would lead to closer intimacy between the component parts of the Empire. He trusted that it would facilitate the establishment of an accelerated steamship service and the attainment of the cheapest and most effective cable service between the Motherland and the self-governing Colonies, due regard being paid to the interests of the taxpayer and to the claim on their consideration of the Companies to whose enterprise the present intercommunication was due. These were Imperial wants, and he sincerely wished them Godspeed in any efforts which would meet effectually these needs of Empire.'"

One would like to share his pious confidence in the disinterested labours of the Conference. It is not altogether easy. The recent agitation leaves on the mind a deep impression of the solidarity throughout the Empire of those who put their trust in armaments as a defence against social reforms. Surely the Imperial ownership and operation of the cables (for service rather than for profit) has become a topic of more than academic interest. Letters from the outlying Dominions show increasing realisation of how opinion was misled if not duped in March. The reaction after such a disillusionment is always rather blind, and can have nothing but a deadening effect on the desire for co-operation. The prevention of such dislocation of hearty relations between the "solid units of the Empire" should be, I submit, the final object of the forthcoming Conference on Imperial Defence.

The delegates, probably a little sore because of the false position into which they have been led by inadequate information, will in all probability be anxious to take into consideration means to that end. No work could be of more lasting benefit than such a reduction in the cost of sending news by cable as would render a vital contact between opinion in London and in Australasia for the first time possible. If the opportunity is not taken recurring misunderstandings may rapidly produce that disgruntled friction which is the beginning of mutual recriminations and hostility. There is still time, but it slips away.—Yours &c.,

June 3rd, 1909. EDWARD SHANN.

"THE INCORRIGIBLE CENSOR."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one of those who detest and deplore anything (and there is much) that tends to lower and vitiate the tone and influence of the Stage, may I be allowed to express my share in the public indebtedness due for the service rendered by such a vigorous and "unmasking" article as that which appeared, regarding the above subject, in THE NATION of last week?—Yours, &c.,

A.

June 2nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read the article in your issue of May 29th under the title, "The Incorrigible Censor." While agreeing with the writer's general views as to the manner in which the Censor wields his powers, having regard to the garbage that he permits to pass for repetition on the stage, I cannot but think that he (the writer) has chosen a most unfortunate instance upon which to base his arguments.

While not, I believe, belonging to either of the two classes of persons whom Mr. Shaw's play "could only offend," I confess that the excerpt given in the article makes me certain that for once the Censor has justified his office. After giving the quotation, the writer of the article asks, "Is this blasphemy?" Frankly, it is; but blasphemy was not the word that occurred to me as I read it. Rather, I was simply filled with disgust.

The comparison with passages from the Book of Job is surely very imperfect. There is a vast difference between the Old Testament conception of Jahveh and the New Testament conception of God as a Heavenly Father. Such an argument may well be left to the preacher who is driven to the Old Testament for a justification of war as sanctioned by God.

The comparison with Mr. Jerome's play is also quite away from the point. In that play the treatment was perfectly reverent and contained none of the objectionable dialogue evidently to be found in the play under discussion.

The moral of Mr. Shaw's play may be all that can be desired; the dialogue among such characters may be absolutely true to life—I know nothing as to that—but such facts would not justify the inclusion of such terms as Mr. Shaw employs. There are many things true to life which would not be suitable for public reproduction. S.

Harrogate, June 2nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am so heartily with you in desiring the abolition of the censorship, that I am sorry that you have weakened your case by choosing for your point of attack an instance in which the Censor has a stronger ground for his action than can be found for his ordinary prohibitions. It seems to me that you, like a number of other literary men, completely ignore the difference between the effect of what is seen and heard on the stage, and what is read in the study. I presume that in his celebrated "Nec coram populo," &c., Horace did not mean to condemn Euripides for writing one of his most impressive dramas, but merely to show what part of its story was fit for presentation on the stage. So most of us prize King Lear and Othello; but I cannot believe that anyone would represent the tearing out of Gloucester's eyes upon the stage, and I am thankful to say that I have never seen the murder of Desdemona, or heard Iago's coarse suggestions in that place.

The fact is that when the careful student examines a scene in the light of what goes before and after in the play, the effect on his mind is absolutely different from the effect on the ordinary playgoers, of seeing a man represent before their eyes savage coarseness or profanity. In the case of the quotation from Mr. Shaw, I dare say that, if I read the whole play, I might find that the passage quoted illustrated a very true part of a man's character, in a possibly useful way (though I should not, even then, admit the parallel between so coarse an utterance and the stately complaints of Job). But the man who comes to the theatre to enjoy a play is either shocked or amused by such a speech as that quoted; that is, it either gives him pain or does him moral injury. And it is not as easy to leave a theatre in protest as to throw aside a book.

I have no doubt the mistake to which I have referred is exactly the one to which a dramatist is prone. His object is to get inside a number of different people and see what their thoughts are, and how they would act on each other; and, in so doing, he must unavoidably lose, sometimes, the sense of the different attitude of the purely outside spectator.

But should not a critic take note of this difference?—Yours, &c., C. E. MAURICE.

June 2nd, 1909.

[Is pain to be avoided in Life, and must it be avoided on the Stage?—ED., NATION.]

THE JOHNSON BICENTENARY CELEBRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In connection with the Bicentenary of the birth of Dr. Samuel Johnson it is proposed to hold an exhibition of Johnsonian manuscripts, books, portraits, pictures, relics, &c., at Lichfield, in September next.

As Mayor of the city I have been asked to appeal to all those who possess mementoes of our great citizen to allow them to be placed on public view on that occasion. To make the exhibition as representative and reminiscent as possible it has been resolved to allow books, papers, and articles to be sent either on loan or sale. All goods will be adequately insured, and the utmost care exercised to prevent damage and to return them in safety to their owners.

I venture, therefore, to ask all lovers of Johnson to co-operate in this undertaking, and to assist in making the exhibition worthy of the name and fame of the great man of letters whose memory we desire to commemorate.

All communications should be addressed to the Town Clerk, Guildhall, Lichfield, by whom every information will be given.—Yours, &c.,

H. M. Morgan,
Mayor of Lichfield.

June 1st, 1909

"THE CONSOLATIONS OF SCIENCE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your profoundly interesting article on the above subject in last week's issue is, perhaps, scarcely a text for discursive correspondence. At the same time it touches the deepest and most real interests of humanity much closer than "Dreadnoughts" or "scare-ships." I will, therefore, respectfully offer a word or two of comment, not, I hope, of a controversial character. And first, I note a conspicuous absence of any references to Spinoza, who, since Sir Frederic Pollock's masterly exposition, has been "coming to his own" in these days. Spinoza had "laid hold on eternal life"; but he distinguished between this and immortality to which he was indifferent. But this indifference did not in the least lessen his interest in "the mighty hopes that make us men." I will not enlarge, because it would lead me too far. But still, considering the greatness and goodness of the man, it is a fact worth noting.

Now as to the dread which you allege of "the loss of continuous personality," I cannot think it is so general as you suppose. There are a good many of us close on the end of finite life, who do not feel that dread in the least degree. Probably the strongest justification of your words arises out of a natural revulsion from the change in family relations at death. Here, again, I refrain from speculation. But surely the ordinary ideas on this subject are to common sense obviously untenable. Any father, A. B., smiling on his family circle at the evening hour, naturally and properly thinks of this blessed union as one of an indefinite endurance. And if in the course of the Divine order a gap is made in the group by the loss of a beloved child he tries to look "not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen." And in the invisible world he pictures another identical family meeting, not, indeed, round a tea table, but in a beautiful garden. Yet if the father A. B. could vividly recall his childhood's days, he must remember that his own father had precisely the same vision, and could not possibly have thought of sparing the little A. B., then a child, from the family gathering in the heavenly garden; not even for the purpose of forming a new group there. Besides A. B.'s wife had a father who always looked forward to having his little daughter renew the family relationship in heaven. Not only so, but A. B.'s grandfather and his wife's grandfather had similar emotional visions, and—as Spinoza on another point says, "so on ad infinitum." It is quite clear, therefore, that on the ordinary—as I should say, carnal—view of immortality, the complete re-union of any one family group in a future world is impossible without robbing and breaking up another previous family group. Nor could this previous family group be made complete without robbing a yet earlier family group, and so "ad infinitum." I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am as firm a believer in eternal life as Spinoza was. But if I may quote your most welcome and unanswerable article on "The Incorrigible Censor" in the same number, "the pious man" is sometimes "so wrapt up in the emotional view of religion that its sterner and deeper moralities"—might I say realities?—"escape him." Emotion without any realities to justify it is one of the pressing dangers of the present age.—Yours, &c.,

J. Allanson Picton.

Caerlyr, Penmaenmawr,
May 31st, 1909.

FIRE BRIGADES AND INSURANCE COMPANIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A letter appeared in your issue of May 29th headed "Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies," and signed by "Insurance Manager." As it seems to be principally directed at the L.C.C. Fire Brigade Committee in general, and myself as the chairman in 1908 in particular, I ask your leave to correct the misapprehension under which it has apparently been written. I am not a sufficiently regular reader of The Nation to know if the letter is a hardy annual reproduced by its anonymous author at each yearly issue of the Fire Brigade Committee's report. If it is not, I cannot understand why the attention of your readers should be specially called to a statement that has appeared year after year in almost identical form. Possibly your correspondent is ignorant of the contents of former reports, and as others of your readers may share his ignorance, let me explain to them that every year the Fire Brigade Committee issues a statement of the previous year's work. The statement is nothing more than a catalogue of facts, illustrated by tables and diagrams. Questions of policy are neither introduced nor discussed. Amongst the facts recorded there are the details of the brigades' revenue and expenditure. One of these facts is that the fire insurance companies make a contribution at the rate of £35 per million of the gross amounts insured. In 1907-8 this contribution amounted to £35,007 19s. 6d. Does "Insurance Manager" wish to expurgate this particular piece of information?

Whether the contribution is just or unjust, too little or too much, is an arguable question. As the committee are simply recording facts and figures, their report is no place for its discussion. Your correspondent, therefore, is either ignorant of the nature of these reports, or his remarks are irrelevant. So far from thinking that I have "made a discovery or wish to snatch a patent or disturb the slumbers of an old horse"—to quote the exuberant metaphors that he applies to me—I am perfectly aware that the report of the committee of which I was chairman is neither marked by originality nor marred by controversial allusions.—Yours, &c.,

S. J. G. Hoare.

12, Park Lane, W
June 3rd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The contemptuous epistle of an "Insurance Manager" requires some comment.

He seems to think that "as things are, so they must remain" to the end of the chapter. I am sorry to disturb his complacence, but in spite of the Fire Insurance Companies' manifesto, there is a strong and growing belief that the companies not only ought, but must be made, to contribute in ratio to the premiums received, to the maintenance of fire brigades organised by local public authorities. The argument of the manifesto, if carried to its logical conclusion, must naturally be that if the duty of providing fire appliances for the preservation of property belongs to the local authorities—then it should also be their duty to indemnify ratepayers against loss or damage by fire. Municipal protection and fire insurance should, therefore, go hand in hand. This is a form of municipal trading which is bound to come, witness the success of the municipal corporation's alliance! I traverse "Insurance Manager's" assertion that fire insurance companies are "voluntary associations," and that "premiums are adjusted according to average losses." Fire insurance is practically compulsory, and if the last assertion was correct, what about the enormous profits and fire reserve funds of the tariff fire insurance companies?

Your correspondent is evidently one of the "Seven Sleepers," else he would be aware that many fire insurance companies are already making annual contributions to the upkeep of fire brigades in many towns, and also that they are refunding the out-of-pocket expenses of fire brigades when called to a fire on property insured under their policies. Moreover, the National Chamber of Trade is demanding, on behalf of the traders, reductions in premiums and revision of the antiquated policy conditions. "Insurance Manager's" ideas are mere survivals of a dead past.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. Brown.

June 2nd, 1909.

ABBEY—OR PANTHEON?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I claim to be as good a Liberal as you, both in politics and theology, and I warn you you are running the party ship on to the rocks if you try to secularise or even undenominationalise the cathedrals, or even Westminster

Abbey—the same rocks that have damaged the party so seriously over education. There are enough religious Liberals convinced that the soul of religion cannot live without a body—that of definite creed and historic organisation—and indeed that the Faith of the Incarnation discourages beforehand the desire for such a slight on the body—there are enough Liberals, so convinced, to reduce the party to impotence on such an issue, as already on that of the schools.

We believe we are strong enough to stop this policy. But if not, we could tolerate the secularising of the Abbey, like the Pantheon, better than any less logical step. Then the nation would feel at once, instead of only when too late, what it had lost. It would not have secured even a Valhalla. (Don't you see, by-the-bye, how offensive this nakedly pagan word is as applied to a Christian church? Well might Mr. Asquith say in the House of Commons that it was difficult when so applied to know its real significance!) The old Valhalla had at least an atmosphere of warrior heroism and pagan divinities. But after you had put the Abbey under H.M. Board of Works, you would have nothing left save an ancient covered-in cemetery or glorified monumental mason's yard.

It is, we all feel—even the "smartest" American visitor, and still more the average Englishmen—the fact that the Abbey is a Christian church which gives it its worth as a place for the burial of our greatest and best. It is the services of prayer and Eucharist, the still-felt Divine presence, that is the essential factor. Of course its very architecture is sacramental of this. Take away this religious character, and you at once measure the difference between our regard for the Abbey and that for the British Museum with its sculpture and its mummies! We may well take warning by what we have lost in the change from "God's Acre" round the parish church under ecclesiastical care to the municipal cemetery under a burial board.

Have you forgotten, by-the-bye, that there is room in the Abbey for not more than half-a-dozen actual burials, and—since Mr. Meredith was cremated—for very few even of monuments or tablets?—Yours, &c., T. Hill.

North Somercotes Vicarage, Lincolnshire.
June 1st, 1909.

[Nationalisation and secularisation of Westminster Abbey are two different things. We rejected the second solution and supported the first for the specific purpose which it seems to us the present authority does not very well serve.—Ed., Nation.]

THE ANGLICAN CHURCH AND NONCONFORMISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In reply to Mr. Mudie-Smith I "lift" one of Mr. Leyton Richards' arguments. "Surely," says he, "Rome may be supposed to know her own business in this matter." He accepts without question whatever Rome says, though he has no more reason for doing so than for accepting what the Anglican Church says. "Surely" (if I may paraphrase), "we in England may be supposed to know our own business in this matter." And, moreover, why are Mr. Mudie-Smith and Mr. Richards so anxious to prove Rome right and ourselves wrong? And now for one or two last words. "When," says Mr. Richards, "did the Apostles ordain a bishop?" I always understood that St. Timothy was a bishop, as also St. James, and that the third chapter of the Epistle to St. Timothy in which St. Paul gives many minute directions about bishops, would appear to prove that there must have been a bishop or bishops for these directions to apply to. May I also point out that it is not long, as history goes, since there were no Dissenters, and that presumably before this time the claims of this Church were admitted by those in it; and also that it was not on the point of the breach with Rome that such men as Wesley left the Church; and lastly, that one breach cannot be healed by making half-a-dozen more. If Mr. Mudie-Smith wishes, as I doubt not he does, to see Christianity triumphant, and the knowledge of the Lord spread as the waters cover the sea, he must surely see that it is our duty to pray and work for an United Christendom, and not be content to perpetuate three Churches or thirty-three.

As to Apostolic succession, it is too large a question to enter on; better men than myself have written often and much on the subject. Mr. Richards can buy their books and find his answer. As regards the Greek Church, my friendly opponents do not, perhaps, know that several times within the last few years Greek patriarchs and dignitaries have come to England, assisted in the services, including the Communion Service, and preached in our churches, and in a speech made by the last visitor of this kind, he mentioned an arrangement between himself and the nearest Anglican bishop, by which the congregations of either were ministered to by either bishop who visited them, and that, when either was on holiday, the remaining bishop took charge of everything concerning both Churches in the district. This hardly looks like aloofness and entire repudiation of our position.—Yours, &c.,

Charles Magrath.

June 1st, 1909.

[This correspondence must now cease.—Ed., Nation.]

INEQUALITIES OF THE INCOME TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The rather pathetic picture drawn by "Income Tax Reformer" in your issue of this week of the unfortunate position, so far as income tax is concerned, occupied by a gentleman earning £2,001 per annum as compared with that occupied by a gentleman earning £2,000 per annum, suffers from one defect. The argument is so well built up that, perhaps, it is a pity to mention the defect. It would, indeed, be very dreadful if a gentleman earning £2,001 had to pay £25 1s. in excess of the tax paid by a gentleman earning £2,000. In theory, no doubt, it is so, and that is just part of the cussedness of things; but in practice it is not so, for gentlemen do not earn sums like £2,001; therefore, the hard and tearful case of the gentleman earning £1 per annum more than his neighbor, and having to pay £25 1s. extra income tax for the privilege, is not nearly so hard and tearful as "Income Tax Reformer" makes out.—Yours, &c.,

St. John G. Ervine.

13, Champion Park, Denmark Hill, S.E.
June 1st, 1909.

Poetry.

I.

CALYCANTHUS FLOWER.

From the Chinese.

Robed in pale yellow gown, she leans apart,
Guarding her secret trust inviolate;
With mouth that, scarce unclosed, but faintly breathes.
Its fragrance, like a tender grief, remains
Half-told, half-treasured still. See how she droops
From delicate stem; while her close petals keep Their shy demeanor. Think not that the fear
Of great cold winds can hinder her from bloom,
Who hides the rarest wonders of the spring
To vie with all the flowers of Kiang Nan.

II.

PLUM BLOSSOM.

From the Chinese.

One flower hath in itself the charms of two;
Draw nearer! and she breaks to wonders new:
An you would call her beauty of the rose—
She, too, is folded in a fleece of snows;
An you might call her pale—she doth display
The blush of dawn beneath the eye of day,
The lips of her the wine cup hath caressed,
The form of her that from some vision blest
Starts with the rose of sleep still glowing bright
Through limbs that ranged the dreamlands of the night;
The pencil falters and the song is naught,
Her beauty, like the sun, dispels my thought.

L. Cranmer-Byng.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE understand that, owing to the earnest wishes of George Meredith, no official biography will be undertaken, though Mr. Edward Clodd will write a series of articles giving his recollections of the table-talk and characteristic sayings of his old friend. We hope, however, that some collection of Meredith's letters will be allowed to appear.

* * *

"THE Life and Letters of Robert Dodsley," a book which Mr. Ralph Strauss is preparing for the press, can hardly fail to throw many interesting side-lights upon eighteenth century literature and men of letters. Dodsley began life as a stocking-weaver, but being ill-treated when an apprentice he ran away and became a footman. While thus engaged he found time to write a poem called "Servitude," designed "to excite Bad Servants to their Duty," for which Defoe wrote a preface. In 1735, with the assistance of Pope, who lent him £100, he opened the "Tully's Head" in Pall Mall, and began business as a bookseller and publisher. Here he issued works by Pope, Johnson, Lord Chesterfield, Goldsmith, Young, Akenside, Horace Walpole, and Gray. Some of the small calf-bound volumes of the "Collection of Old Plays," or the "Collection of Poems by Several Hands," are to be found in most second-hand bookshops. Dodsley's great ambition was to win literary fame. Besides "Servitude" he wrote "A Muse in Livery" and several plays, among them "The King and the Miller of Mansfield," in which Colley Cibber and Mrs. Pritchard acted at Drury Lane, and "The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green." For a "bookish" biography it would be hard to find a better subject than Dodsley and his circle. Mr. Austin Dobson has already treated of him in one of his delightful "Eighteenth Century Vignettes."

* * *

WE understand that a monthly literary review will be issued in October next, under the direction of Mr. T. P. O'Connor. The aim of the new venture is, we believe, to deal in popular style with the literature of the month. It will contain critical sketches of notable authors, book reviews, and gossip about all that relates to the world of letters.

* * *

THE Rationalist Press Association is marking the hundredth anniversary of the death of Thomas Paine, which falls on Tuesday next, by the issue of cheap editions of some of Paine's writings and of Dr. Moncure Conway's "Life of Thomas Paine." In this year of centenaries that of Paine is not the least worthy of commemoration, and the method adopted by the Rationalist Press seems to us the most fitting memorial of a man who, among other worthy causes, strongly advocated that of cheap literature.

* * *

MR. ALEXANDER J. PHILIP, the Borough Librarian of Gravesend and compiler of "The Dickens Dictionary," proposes to issue by subscription a "Library Encyclopædia," should sufficient support be given to the undertaking. The work is intended to deal with Library Administration, Book Purchasing, Cataloguing, Library History, Library Plans and Buildings, and the many subjects either directly or indirectly connected with work in libraries both public and private. Mr. C. J. Jacobi, Mr. A. W. Pollard, Mr. R. A. Peddie, Mr. J. Herbert Slater, and Mr. H. B. Wheatley are amongst those who have promised to contribute articles.

* * *

THERE are signs that authors are about to make a vigorous effort to secure an equitable revision of the Copyright Laws. Both Mr. Whibley and Mr. Morris Colles have articles on the subject in the current monthlies, in which they are agreed that the whole course of reform has been injuriously affected by the temper of Parliament. At present the position is that at the recent Conference at Berlin all countries, with the exception of Great Britain and Germany, were willing to adopt as their period of copyright the life of the author and fifty years. Germany has promised to consider the introduction of a Bill giving this extension to the period of copyright, and will almost certainly pass it if Great Britain does the same. To do so would be but bare justice for, as Mr. Whibley puts it, under the present system books of real value too often become the unrestricted property of the publishers at the very moment that their merits are recognised. Mr. Whibley also recommends the adoption of Mallarmé's proposal for a small royalty on all copies of books the copyright of which had expired. By this means a Literary Fund might be established without any need to appeal to charity.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Longmans' early publications will be "A History of Malta during the Period of the French and British Occupation, 1798-1802," by the late Mr. William Hardman, of Valetta. Most of the important documents bearing on the Maltese history during the period treated will be included in the volume, and there is also a summary of the main events affecting the island throughout the nineteenth century. Dr. Holland Rose contributes notes and an introduction. The same publishers have nearly ready a work called "The Gilds of China, with an Account of the Gild Merchant, or Co-Hong of Canton," by Mr. H. B. Morse, who has been Statistical Secretary at the Inspectorate of Chinese Customs.

* * *

FOLLOWING up his book on "No. 10, Downing Street," Mr. Charles Eyre Pascoe has just finished a volume on similar lines dealing with "Admiralty House, Whitehall," the official residence for over two hundred years of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Its history may be traced back to the Duke of Buckingham of Charles I.'s reign, and it contains a large number of portraits and other relics of historic interest.

* * *

A WORK of great value to students of French literature has been undertaken by M. Gustave Lanson, in the shape of a "Manuel Bibliographique de la Littérature Française, 1500-1900." The aim is to provide a series of volumes which will supply information concerning the best editions of all the great French writers and the best of the critical works that have been written about them. The first volume is devoted to the sixteenth century and has just been published by Messrs. Hachette.

* * *

"THE Decay of the Cacoethes Scribendi" is bewailed by Mr. James Leatham in the June "Socialist Review." Mr. Leatham compares the literary activity of the eighteenth century with that of our own day, holds that the ideals of the earlier age kept alive a taste and an enthusiasm for noble speech and diction, and declares that the bulk of modern writers work not for love of writing, but for money. We feel inclined to join issue with Mr. Leatham on all of these statements. We are convinced that the cacoethes scribendi, so far from having decayed, is more acute than it has ever been. More people are anxious to see themselves "in print," and in the greater proportion of cases the impelling motive is reputation rather than money. It almost seems, indeed, as if in the near future not to have written a book will be a mark of distinction. Moreover, the eighteenth century was the age of clear and measured prose, but it was also the age when artificiality and flat insipidity ran riot. With regard to the last point, Sydney Smith's statement that an unpaid contributor is ex vi termini an ass, has always seemed to us unanswerable.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"English Costume from Prehistoric Times to the End of the Eighteenth Century." By George Clinch. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Life of Major-General Sir Charles Wilson." By Colonel Sir Charles M. Watson. (Murray. 15s. net.)

"The Century of the Child." By Ellen Key. (Putnams. 6s. net.)

"The Russian Bastille, or The Schlusselburg Fortress." By I. P. Youvatshev. Translated by Dr. A. S. Rappoport. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Japanese Education: Lectures Delivered in the University of London." By Baron Dairoku Kikuchi. (Murray. 5s. net.)

"Modern Homes." Described and Illustrated by T. Raffles Davison. (Bell. 15s. net.)

"Egoists: A Book of Supermen." By J. Huneker. (Laurie. 6s. net.)

"Studies in Wives." By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"La Littérature Allemande d'Aujoud'hui." Par Maurice Muret. (Paris: Perrin. 3fr. 50.)

"Reflets d'Histoire." Par Paul Gaultier. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

"Jean Christophe à Paris: Dans la Maison." Par Romain Rolland. (Paris: Ollendorff. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

A CRITIC OF OUR TIMES.*

Mr. Masterman apologises in his preface for the imperfections of a volume produced under the difficulties of official life, but his readers will find in "The Condition of England" a good taste of the qualities he has led them to expect. His brilliant style has not faded or lost its sparkle in the damp caverns of the Local Government Board, and these pages display very happily his appreciation of the shades and colors of life and literature, his sincere and eloquent sympathy, his gift for painting large and significant social landscape. The general effect of the book is melancholy and anxious, but that, of course, is not a novelty either in Mr. Masterman's work or in the work of those modern reformers and writers with whom it is natural to compare him. All reformers spend part of their life in the darkness of despair; what is peculiar to the modern reformer is that the dawn which he greets in his sanguine hour is so very grey and ambiguous a twilight. This is the chief difference between him and his ancestors, the change from confidence to misgiving, from hope to a brooding doubt. All the certainties of politics seem to have melted in the interval. Now the earlier reformers would have been the better for something of Mr. Masterman's insight into the tangles and webs of habit and circumstance that envelop political conduct and embarrass political judgments. The kind of work he does in this book—in painting the actual lives and interests of men and classes, in catching, so to speak, the hues and shades of a society and not merely its line and form—would have saved many early speculators on politics from the error of a too simple analysis of their problem. Modern observers, to whom every political question presents a thousand sad and baffling riddles, are amazed at the secure and easy psychology which dictated, for example, such a document as the Report of the Great Poor Law Commission of 1834, or the political anticipations of a William Godwin.

Our modern preachers will not allow us to relapse into such illusions. But every method has its dangers, and the danger of the modern school is that it may carry introspection and self-consciousness and the study of the play and dance of motive and character in this perverse and various world to a point at which we are threatened with paralysis. The universe is so difficult and complex and varied that it seems to be hardly worth while to attempt to reform it. To understand all is to despair of everything.

This is not a mobilising philosophy, and few of the modern rebels are likely to lead a revolution. Nobody can imagine the Marseillaise shattering our silence in response to Mr. Galsworthy's still and exquisite irony. The supreme example is, of course, Mr. Bernard Shaw, whose popularity among the upper classes is not unconnected with the grateful discovery that his preaching is no menace to their interests. Mr. Wells, with whom, we fancy, Mr. Masterman is in closer sympathy, is a more active rebel. There is a note of combat in his message; an atmosphere sometimes nobly vindictive; a belief in the ultimate victory of democracy. His consciousness of the wrong and misery and disorder of life is keen and bitter, but it does not overpower his spirits and resolution; rather, like the spectacle of dirt acting on the imagination of the old lady in "The Revolution in Tanner's Lane," it puts him on his mettle; he is fiercely and joyfully human. In what category should we place Mr. Masterman? It is not easy to answer. Sometimes it seems as if his pensive and brooding fancy might fondle and soothe to sleep his natural impatience of injustice, and teach him to exchange "the tears of pity" for "the tears of sorrow." Sometimes his subjective and almost sensationalist standards play him strange tricks. In one curious passage (p. 279) he seems to argue that as an interesting and striking case can be made out both for order and for change, all that really matters is that you should be loyal to the side you choose. In his powerful chapter on the "Illusion of Security," he may be thought by some to put more reality into the walls of Jericho than he puts into the trumpet blast of destruction. The truth is that the book, with all its insight, is a picturesque rather than a philosophical analysis; it flashes its light on aspects rather than on causes. This is what distinguishes it from such a book as "Democracy and Reaction," and makes it, though in no sense enervating, so much less fortifying to courage and hope.

The man who paints his own age with a graphic and sweeping brush is bound to give the impression that things are worse than they are, leaving his readers to readjust the proportions. In Mr. Masterman's case a good deal of readjustment is necessary. The sensationalism, which he rightly describes as one of the chief curses of society, is not a novel characteristic. No modern degenerate comes nearer to the type which we associate with the "Daily Mail" than the fifteenth century Gabriele Fondolo, who spent his last years bitterly regretting that he had lost the opportunity of throwing a Pope and an Emperor from the tower of the Duomo of Cremona. The two heads of Christendom were his guests; he had no quarrel with either of them; he had no interest in their death; it was simply that he felt that the deed would have made his name more renowned than that of Empedocles. Mr. Masterman says very justly that posterity, anxious to penetrate into the mind of our generation, will observe that murders and divorces fill the popular newspapers. But if we turn to the newspapers of a century ago we do not escape from the atmosphere of crime and scandal to the calm and peace of contemplation and rational discussion. After all, no modern murder has occupied the public mind more completely than did the murders which De Quincey has immortalised, and the modern Williams would not supply the imagination after death with the morbid pleasure which London took in the barbarous spectacle of a corpse carried through the streets to visit the houses of the victims. The truth, of course, is, and here we are heartily in agreement with Mr. Masterman, not that the habits that revolt us are new, but that it is profoundly disappointing to see how little education and all the sovereign remedies of our fathers have refined or enriched our tastes and interests. And to understand the causes of this disappointment it is important to look closely into the actual conditions of the lives of our various classes, and to see how elaborate is our entanglement in the arrangements and machinery of our existence. This is what Mr. Masterman does in these sketches, and his admirable literary talent enables him to give a peculiarly vivid and intimate picture of the kind of society that the remorseless shuttle of the great system which we think we have under control is weaving so furiously before our eyes and in our despite.

The great characteristic of that society, we agree, is its want of character. It does not, for example, stamp its own genius on its art, but lives on the art of other ages, as though confessing that it has no message of its own to bequeath to posterity. Now Mr. Masterman seems to hint in one passage at an explanation of its weakness in the decadence of the aristocracy. "No nation," he says, "need be ashamed of empire on a large scale or apologise for the overlordship of a continent. To-day's criticism deplores the weakening or vanishing of the qualities by which such conquest was attained; in an aristocratic caste which is merging itself in a wealthy class, and undergoing weakening in the process. It is not from the conquerors but from a rather harassed and limited middle class that the empire builders are now drawn; a Lord MacDonnell from the home of a peasant farmer in Ireland, a Cecil Rhodes from an English country parsonage." In point of fact, the empire builders in the sense in which Mr. Masterman uses the word—Clive, Hastings, Wolfe, Nelson—never came exclusively or mainly from the conquerors. The aristocracy has two achievements to its credit; it developed Parliamentary government, under forms and conditions, of course, that maintained and guaranteed its own interests, and in an age of good taste it made those great collections of pictures which its modern representatives are scattering so lavishly across the Atlantic. The old qualities may be disappearing, but our complaint of the conquerors is not so much on account of what they have made of themselves, as on account of what they have made of everyone else. What is really serious is not that the aristocracy is losing its virtues, but that the poor are not gaining their independence; not that the aristocracy and the rich should take to violent and reckless motor driving, but that the poor should stand it; not that the rich should match the disgusting extravagance of Juvenal's Rome, but that the poor, instead of hating, should admire them for it. We are struggling with the consequences of a policy which spread the canopy of a class over the life and imagination of a nation. "We have on large patches of these islands," says Mr. Meredith, "a Saxon population much wanting assistance if they are not to feel themselves broken, driven, caught by the neck, yoked and heavy headed. Blest then is he who gives them a sense of the pride of standing on legs." If we did not know that our Saxon population in the villages had formerly shown itself capable of rebellion we might think it was nature and not history that had bent its back. If we did not know that the enclosures had destroyed its freedom, we might suppose that the climate had created the squire-fearing countryside. If we did not know that we had left their imaginations little else to cherish or admire, we might wonder that the poor should find their romance in the dazzling wealth of the rich. After all, Mr. Masterman's picture of the lives to which most men are still condemned should convince us there is very much to be done before we need despair of creating a society which shall have the pride of standing on legs.

* "The Condition of England." By C. F. G. Masterman. Methuen. 6s.

---

AN INACCURATE BOOK.*

It is a curious thing that at last after a long period, during which no consecutive history of the early centuries of Christianity appeared in English, two come at once, or practically so. The books are the work of the Professors of Church History in Cambridge and Oxford. The Clarendon Press publishes the late Professor Bigg's book on "Christian Origins," and Messrs. Macmillan announce two volumes on the same subject and the same centuries by Professor Gwatkin. The Oxford book has the start; whether it will keep it, is very questionable.

In July last year Professor Bigg sent his manuscript to the Oxford Press, and two days later he was dead. The book, he told the secretary of the Press, though he might polish it up to some extent in proof, was yet what he meant it to be. The Dean of Christ Church, therefore, has felt his work as editor limited. He has altered nothing except in the very few passages where the reference given seemed to him to be manifestly wrong. His friend, he suggests, neither intended his book to be popular, nor designed it for a small group of professional students. It is, therefore, to a wider circle of reflective general readers that it is addressed—to men and women in tune with "the general sense of the Church," conservative, but "not instantaneously hostile to all modifications of traditional views."

Dr. Strong justly claims for his friend that he read widely, and the book bears witness to this. It is full of learning and bears the marks of a mind with broad interests and kindly instincts. But sensible and informing as the book is, it lacks vigor and imagination. The learning is wide, but it is not well focussed. All over the Mediterranean Professor Bigg turns his eyes and he sees much, yet he hardly makes one picture, and he misses things of significance. This is pardonable. But praise with such qualifications is never very welcome.

Professor Bigg starts his story substantially where the New Testament by orthodox accounts leaves off. Thus Jesus has no place in his index and little in his text. Nor is the reader given any very clear idea of what early Christianity was in itself. The episcopal question is discussed open-mindedly—the Didache, by the way, being relegated to the background for reasons hardly evident. But the Christian impulse, the new life, and, above all, the experience associated with the name of the Holy Spirit—these, if mentioned, do not impress the reader. Somehow the centre is lost in the circumference, and that in fact is here a series of arcs.

But the really astonishing thing in the book is the persistent inaccuracy in detail. Omissions are one thing, though they may militate heavily against the value of a man's work. Thus here the failure to realise the significance of the universal belief in daemons makes any attempt to reproduce the atmosphere of the day quite hopeless. Sheer inaccuracy is a worse charge to make, and if it is not pedantry to make it, it must be made. Thus Dr. Bigg says that "religion was in the ancient world one of the chief causes of division." His evidence for this can hardly be conjectured. Juvenal says Egyptian villages quarrelled over their religions; and the Jews were irreconcilables; but who else? Two pages later he talks of "Undenominational Paganism." The adjective is ill-chosen—he was thinking of another century than the second—but the fact so disguised is exactly antithetic to the former statement, and quite fatal to it. In Homeric religion Dr. Bigg sees idealised Greeks—did Homer? Professor Murray hardly gives us that impression Homer knew the difference between the Farewell of Hector and the Deceiving of Zeus as well as we do. The Poseidon of the Triumph again is more than any Greek, however idealised. Aristotle does not "advise people to get rid of pity or fear by a hearty cry"—he advises the purgation of pity and fear, not the expulsion. How the Isis legend can reflect the Gospel, the earlier reflect the later, we cannot see. The Emperor's assumption of the Tribunician title was perhaps never before called "a solemn declaration of the rights of man," nor was the Commune of a Province quite what the readers whom Dr. Bigg addresses would suppose from its description as "a sort of local Parliament," though the statement, of course, has "a sort of" accuracy. The conception of an attendant Genius was not purely Latin; the name is Latin, the thing is universal, Greek, Persian, and Syrian. None of these blunders, it might be urged, is of much moment in itself. What startles the reader is that they all come from the first sixteen pages—a full crop for one quire.

This is not all. It goes on as it begins. Tacitus, we hear on one page, hated Nero and the Christians, and "could not decide which he hated most." "He had never taken the trouble to ask what a Christian really was," we read on the next page, and we remember that he took a good deal of trouble over Nero. Certain people, we read, according to Irenaeus translated the passage in Isaiah, "Behold, a young woman shall conceive." So we are told by Justin and others, but Dr. Bigg does not hint that it is the true translation. The story that Jesus was the son of Panthera is construed into a Jewish recognition that He was not the son of Joseph. Plutarch is discovered to have been drawn even more by Mithra than by Isis—and yet he gave a considerable treatise to Isis and hardly mentioned Mithra half a dozen times. The plain fact is that Mithra's name is thrown about too freely altogether nowadays. The only miracle-mongers, it seems, that Marcus Aurelius could have had in mind must have been the Christians; but contemporary evidence is full of all sorts of them. How a dean came into the society of Ignatius, it is hard to say—unless by a careless anachronism. Extraordinary belief is given by Dr. Bigg to the legends of the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul, and to the story of the adventures of their dead bodies. He holds, too, that Epictetus may have been "not un acquainted with Christian teaching, and regarded it with tolerance." The discovery of Aristides in Greek is rightly attributed to Dean Robinson, but surely a word might have been spared for Dr. Rendel Harris, but for whose discovery of the Syriac text the Greek must have remained unrecognised to this day, as Dean Robinson's own account of it shows.

But enough of this. It is quite surprising, and rather painful, to find the work of an Oxford Professor, edited by the Head of a House, and published by the Oxford Press, so full of careless mistakes. Any man may make a blunder, and most men do; but at last the mind of a reader loses all confidence in an author who can make so many and can be capable of the graver inattention to authorities which such blunders imply. How can such inaccuracy go with any real apprehension of the mind of the early Church or of the society in which it grew? Much of Dr. Bigg's work must, of course, be sound enough, but after a time the reader will only believe him where he himself knows. When it comes to this between reader and author, one can only read for the sake of new outlook or new insight, and these are not here in a sufficiently remunerative degree.

* "The Origin of Christianity." By the late Charles Bigg. Edited by T B. Strong. Clarendon Press. 12s. 6d. net.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW BOOK by C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P.

THE CONDITION OF ENGLAND is the title of Mr. MASTERMAN'S new book, which is one of enthralling interest and indispensable to the student of the new social and industrial conditions. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE TURKISH PEOPLE, by LUCY GARNETT, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net., is a description of the life and customs of the modern Turks.

The two following books will be published on June 3—

THE PYRENEES, by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., contains many Maps and Plans by the author, and is published at 7s. 6d. net. It is historical, descriptive, reminiscent, anecdotal, practical, geographical, political and literary.

ENGLISH COSTUME, by GEORGE CLINCH, is the latest volume of "The Antiquary's Books." It is full of illustrations and is published at 7s. 6d. net. The author traces the subject from prehistoric times to the end of the eighteenth century.

On June 10 will be published IN UNKNOWN TUSCANY, by EDWARD HUTTON, with Illustrations in Colour. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. An account of a summer spent among the peasants in Southern Tuscany. It is full of delightful descriptions of the Italian country side.

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published a new novel by M. E. FRANCIS, entitled GALATEA OF THE WHEATFIELD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. A new novel of the Sahara, where cultivation merges into the vast desolation which fascinates the European. Here the woman meets the desert man who would lead her farther. How far she goes is the theme of the story. The demand for this book, by the author of "The Garden of Allah," is very great. A Second Edition is printing.

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. With 4 illustrations in Colour and others from Photographs. Crown 8vo, 6s. This is a most entrancing story of motoring in England, in which topography and love are delightfully blended. A Second Edition is ready.

GENERAL LITERATURE

NAPOLEON'S MARSHALS. By R. P. DUNN-PATTISON. With twenty Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
"Written with admirable balance of narrative and appreciation. The whole band stands dramatically defined—a marvellous galaxy of military talent."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE BLUE BIRD: a Fairy Play in Five Acts. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by ALEXANDER TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. F'cap. 8vo, deckle edges, 3s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.
"We remain spellbound by the charm of the play. It will haunt its readers for many a day."—Times.

ENCHANTERS OF MEN. By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE. 10s. 6d. net. Contains vivid studies of twenty-three beautiful, witty, and fascinating women. It is finely illustrated.

THE BRETONS AT HOME. By FRANCES M. GOSLING. 10s. 6d. net. A charming book, descriptive of Breton peasant life, with its rich harvest of legend and history. It is profusely illustrated in colour and from photographs.

A SUMMER IN TOURAINE. By FREDERIC LEES. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, and 87 from Photographs. Also a Map. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
This magnificently illustrated book is a complete and absorbing description of France's most delightful province.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. In 6 vols. crown 8vo, 6s. each.
Volume VI. This volume completes the translation of this great book.

WALKS IN PARIS. By GEORGES CAIN. Translated by A. R. ALLINSON. With 118 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This is a delightful medley of description, gossip, and antiquarian lore.

DRUGS AND THE DRUG HABIT. By H. SAINSBURY, M.D., F.R.C.P. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
The object of this book is to define the postition of the drug, to show its use and its abuse, and to discuss the broad lines upon which prevention and cure of disease should proceed.

DANTE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE. By PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 21s. net.
An account of the connection of Dante with English literature, quoting all the references to the great poet from Chaucer to the death of Cary in 1844.

CRIMINAL TYPES IN SHAKESPEARE. By AUGUST GOLL. Translated by Mrs. CHARLES WEEKES. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
This book reviews the great criminals of the plays, and shows how Shakespeare, by his genius, was fully up to the modern standard of criminal psychology.

A HOLIDAY IN CONNEMARA. By STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"A sunny human book, full of pretty word pictures, and studded with natural stories. Everywhere the book is touched with sympathy and insight."—Daily Telegraph.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ROYAL NAVY. By DAVID HANNAY. Vol. II. 1689-1815. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
This is the second and completing volume of Mr. Hannay's well-known history of the Royal Navy. It commences with the year 1689, and carries the history down to the year 1815.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF IGNEOUS ROCKS. By ALFRED HARKER, M.A., F.R.S., Fellow of St. John's College, and Lecturer in Petrology in the University of Cambridge. With 112 Diagrams and 2 Plates. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

RAMBLES IN SUSSEX. By F. G. BRABANT. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.
The rambles are real walks and rides, arranged so as to include the whole of the county, their main objects being (1) to observe and describe the characteristic features of the scenery, adding simple explanations of their causes, not expressed in technical language; (2) to give a short account of every old building, and an adequate description of all important ones; (3) to relate clearly and accurately the very interesting historical and literary associations of the county. The illustrations will include reproductions of six of Turner's Sussex views, recently sold at Christie's.

MONMOUTHSHIRE. By G. W. WADE, D.D., and J. H. WADE, M.A., Authors of "Somerset." With 32 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Small pott 8vo, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Little Guides.

FICTION

SET IN SILVER. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON, Authors of "The Lightning Conductor." With a Frontispiece in Colour by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND, and other illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BARBARY SHEEP. By ROBERT HICHENS, Author of "The Garden of Allah." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE LIGHTING CONDUCTOR. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, 1s. net. [Second Edition.

THE OXFORD YEAR. By OONA H. BALL, Author of "Barbara Goes to Oxford." With 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GALATEA OF THE WHEATFIELD. By M. E. FRANCIS (Mrs. Blundell), Author of "Hardy-on-the-Hill." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE LOVE-STORY OF ST. BEL. By BERNARD CAPES. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.
"A fine piece of craftsmanship, full of colour and thrilling." —Sketch.
"A romance of romances. Not for one moment does the interest flag; the story is told with the most fascinating skill."—Bystander.
"An original work, romantic and moving. Mystery, passion, romance, the book is full of them all."—Times.
"Mr. Capes is at his best in this rich and powerful book." —Morning Leader.

KATHERINE THE ARROGANT. By B. M. CROKER, Author of "Peggy of the Bartons." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.
"Mrs. Croker is always amusing; her theme is made fresh and vivid, and Katherine herself is delightful."—Standard.
"The charm is the tenderness of the human touch throughout." —Liverpool Post.

MY LADY OF SHADOWS. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "The Gate of the Desert." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.
"Wholesome and invigorating from first to last."—Scotsman.

TO BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY

AN HONEST MAN. By R. H. BRETHERTON, Author of "The Mill." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 3.

THE BISHOP AND THE LADY By MARTIN LUTRELL SWAYNE. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 10.

DEEP SEA WARRIORS. By BASIL LUBBOCK. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 10.

WATCHERS BY THE SHORE. By J. E. PATTERSON. Author of "Fishers of the Sea." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready June 24.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

RICHELIEU AS HERO.*

It is Richelieu's misfortune that a great part of what we know about him comes from his enemies. His age is well described by Mr. McCabe as an age of unscrupulous writers when piquancy was preferred to truth, and, as many of those writers had felt the weight of the Cardinal's hand, they had little scruple about describing him in the darkest colors in their memoirs. The Richelieu legend being thus started, novelists and dramatists have completed what the memoir writers began. Richelieu lives in the popular mind as the type of ambitious and self-seeking ecclesiastic who, by treachery and intrigue, foisted himself into the position of virtual ruler of France, and then, surrounded by an army of spies, used his position to gratify an inordinate ostentation and an unbridled lust for power. Mr. McCabe's object has been to show how little truth there is in this estimate and to demonstrate the wide gulf between the Richelieu of biography and the Richelieu of fiction. He tells us, indeed, in his preface, that he has aimed at describing Richelieu under a single aspect, "the Richelieu of a thousand spies, the Richelieu of romance and intrigue." But in the sober and unembroidered narrative that follows, we find little romance, though the spies and the intrigue are there in plenty. Mr. McCabe's book does not belong to the prevalent type of "romantic" biography intended to beguile the circulating-library reader. It appeals to those who take a serious interest in French history and its value lies in Mr. McCabe's reading of the great Cardinal's character and the evidence he brings forward in its support.

Lord Acton, we are told, demanded a code of moral judgment independent of place and time, and not merely relevant to a particular civilisation. In estimating Richelieu's character, Mr. McCabe adopts the opposite canon and is often ready to attribute the Cardinal's faults to his age, though, on the other hand, his qualities are usually credited to himself. We cannot read Mr. McCabe's book without feeling that for him Richelieu is something of a hero. The glamor of his career has blinded his biographer to much in him that deserves reprobation. To take a single instance. When shortly after his accession to power he drove the papal troops from the Valtelline, opposed Spain, and broke with Marie de Medici, he may have followed the policy which was best for France, but it is not easy to acquit him of something like treachery towards the party that had served him and to which he was bound by the closest ties. Briefly put, Mr. McCabe's view of Richelieu is that he was a man of iron will, whose main passion was to restore order and authority to France, who allowed no scruple to interfere with this endeavor, and who, in striving for it, showed himself a great administrator, a great statesman, and a great patriot.

There is certainly a great deal to be said for this contention, but we are inclined to believe that the truth lies somewhere between Mr. McCabe's and the popular verdict. When full weight is allowed to all that can be said in Richelieu's favor, he remains something of an enigma. How far was his patriotic zeal colored by personal ambition? What were the motives that led the bishop who first distinguished himself by writing against the Huguenots to turn aside from the Catholic alliances and come to terms with them? Why did the man who wrote that "so long as the Huguenots exist in France, the King will never be master within his own dominions" allow, but three years later, when La Rochelle was within his grasp, full freedom for the Protestants to practise their religion? These are difficult questions to answer. It was not mere policy that led him to surround himself by ecclesiastics such as Father Joseph, Cardinal La Valette, Father Béruelle, and Archbishop Sourdis. Moreover, he showed an extraordinary regard for relics and the cultus of the saints. On one occasion he sent to Meaux for the bones of Saint Fiacre, whose touch was believed to possess healing properties. On another he founded a perpetual mass at Richelieu because in a week he had been cured of a very severe headache. M. Maréjol, perhaps, hits the truth when he says that Richelieu should not be regarded as a statesman who happened to be also a churchman, but as the representative type of an epoch when the clergy, supported by public opinion, aspired to play a great part both in society and in politics. This view gains force if we compare Richelieu with his contemporary Laud. Both aimed at centralising power in the hands of the King. Both were jealous of the great nobles, and both wished to establish a standing army which would secure the King's power and be under his immediate control. But here the resemblance ends. Laud was a highly-placed ecclesiastic who used his power in the State solely in the interests of the Church. Richelieu frequently directed his power against the Church and never went out of his way to strengthen its pretensions. Laud had all the ecclesiastical hardness and narrowness; the mere idea of toleration was repugnant to his temper. Richelieu approved of toleration at a time when the Queen Mother, the Queen Consort, and the Heir Apparent were all hostile, and he could only count upon a vacillating support from the King. Laud tended to smallness of mind and incapability of conceiving a broad and generous policy. Richelieu, whatever else we deny him, was essentially a man in the grand style.

* "The Iron Cardinal." By Joseph McCabe. Eveleigh Nash. 15s. net.

A PSYCHOLOGICAL NOVEL.*

Readers of "Keddy" will not need to be reminded that in that clever study of Oxford undergraduate life Mr. Dickinson showed no little mental subtlety and independence of judgment. A study of "Sir Guy and Lady Rannard" deepens our appreciation of his powers, for the novel reveals that he has psychological insight of an uncommon order. The stream of mental ability in England flows so inevitably to turn professional, political, and business wheels that it is a pleasure to find a clever head setting itself deliberately to comment on the spectacle of our social and political life, and to fix the national portrait by scenes and settings which recall the aim, if they do not suggest the influence, of Disraeli's novels. Mr. Dickinson has, hightly, hitherto restricted himself to a moderate canvas, but there are indications in the novel before us of his ability to handle broad masses and create a picture with a wide and sweeping horizon.

Politics as a career for ambitious young Englishmen of the "governing class"—this subject, we fancy, has not been handled by novelists or dramatists in our generation with the sincerity that is born of intimate knowledge. Mr. Dickinson has no doubt many mysteries still to learn, but his sketch of the mental attitude of his Tory politicians, especially of the inner ring, the Hamiltons, "an aristocratic group of friends and relatives, very small and quite inaccessible, who never paid lip service to the people, and accepted with considerable indifference the charge of governing England, while nothing could afterwards dislodge them," has vraisemblance in its cool tone, even if the family's traits are portrayed by a brilliant imagination. It is a tribute to our author's cleverness that we are ready to place to the credit of his artistic audacity scenes such as the Hamilton family gathering at Kyleakin, in Chapter XII., which may indeed spring from part initiation. But in any case he has the rare power of catching the fine shades of the governing class's social manner towards the underworld of the democracy, and the mid-world of its political dependents, henchmen, and immediate servitors. In the ordinary novel of political life we are placed, so to say, at the mouth of the social funnel with our gaze directed to the narrow end, where sits the ruling caste, but in "Sir Guy and Lady Rannard" it is the democracy and the middle classes that are the background existing ostensibly for the purpose of being captured by an adroit programme, the show of public virtue, and political finesse.

Cleverly suggested, however, as is the political atmosphere of the inner ring which it is the ambition of the wealthy, unscrupulous young politician, Sir Guy Rannard, to join, the originality of the novel lies in the strange psychological situation. Slowly and carefully it develops before our eyes. Marian Deane, the level-headed and imperturbable daughter of the Vicar of St. Gabriel's, West Kensington, has a genius for organising, and, on a visit to Tormichael House, the seat of the Rannards, her second cousins, she becomes

* "Sir Guy and Lady Rannard." By H. N. Dickinson. Heinemann. 6s.

ENGLISH REVIEW

No. VII.

JUNE NUMBER NOW READY.

CONTENTS.

Modern Poetry—

"GEORGE MEREDITH, O.M."

JOHN GALSWORTHY. GERALD GOULD.

EDEN PHILPOTTS. EZRA POUND.

| | |
|---|---|
| CAMILLE PELLETAN | La Paix et la Guerre en Europe |
| ELLA D'ARCY - - | "Agatha Blount" |
| P. WYNDHAM LEWIS | Some Innkeepers and Bestre |
| ST. JOHN HANKIN - | A Man of Impulse |
| JOSEPH CONRAD - | Some Reminiscences (part ii—iii) |
| H. M. TOMLINSON - | The Fog |
| OLIVE GARNETT - | A Certainty |
| STEPHEN REYNOLDS | The Holy Mountain |
| THE MONTH: EDITORIAL | The Critical Attitude |
| BRITANNICUS - | The Dominance of the Irish Question |
| H. BELLOC - | On Licensing |
| F. NORREYS CONNELL | John Millington Synge |
| CAMILLE MAUCLAIR | Le Roman Français Contemporain |
| EDWARD THOMAS - | Two Poets |

Price 2/6.

Half-Yearly Volume, July to December, 15/-, should now be ordered in advance.

DUCKWORTH & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.

ENGLISH REVIEW

Books of Note

DEDICATED BY GRACIOUS PERMISSION TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

THE STORY OF THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY, 1661-1902.

By Capt. Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations including 6 Coloured Plates. 2 vols. super-royal 8vo. Edition de Luxe, limited to 40 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary Edition, £3 13s. 6d. net.

"Sir George Arthur has earned the gratitude of all his companions in arms for the manly and spirited fashion in which he has told his stirring story."—Daily Telegraph.

SOME ACROSTIC SIGNATURES OF FRANCIS BACON

Baron Verulam of Verulam, Viscount St. Alban; together with some others, all of which are now for the first time deciphered and published by WILLIAM STONE BOOTH. Illustrated with facsimiles and acrostic figures. Large 4to. 25s. net.

CHAPTERS ON SPANISH LITERATURE.

By J. FITZMAURICE KELLY. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A delightful volume, full of sympathy, learning, and judgment."—Observer.

"We have no hesitation in saying that this volume forms the most valuable English contribution to Spanish letters since the same author gave us his history of Spanish literature."—Athenæum.

"I have never met with such an illuminating work on Spanish literature."—Mr. R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM in the Nation.

ENGLISH HERALDIC BOOK STAMPS.

Figured and Described by CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. About 300 Illustrations. Super-royal 8vo, 25s. net.

This is the first English book on the subject. A detailed Prospectus can be had from the Publishers.

THE DOMINION OF DREAMS.

By FIONA MACLEOD. New Edition, Pocket size. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net

A welcome reprint of this author's best work.

UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATION.

By CHARLES W. ELIOT, President of the Harvard University. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

1.—The Trustees. 2.—An Inspecting and Concurring Body—Alumni—Influence. 3.—The University Faculty. 4.—The Elective-System—Academic Distinctions. 5.—The Methods of Instruction. 6.—Social Organisation—The Administration—The University President.

"Of special interest and value in Oxford at the present time."—Oxford Magazine.

AMERICA AT COLLEGE.

By R. K. RISK, M.A. With Preface by Sir DONALD MACALISTER, K.C.B. 214 pp. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"A bright and intelligent account and appraisement of American university methods.—The Times.

"A welcome addition to the educational library."—Glasgow Herald.

"We know of no other book where the strong and weak points of American university life are so succinctly and pleasantly passed in review."—Daily Telegraph.

THE NOVELS AND POEMS OF

GEORGE MEREDITH.

Library Edition, crown 8vo, 6s. Pocket Edition, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THE ORDEAL OF RICHARD FEVEREL.
BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER.
SANDRA BELLONI
VITTORIA.
THE EGOIST.
EVAN HARRINGTON.
ONE OF OUR CONQUERORS.
LORD ORMONT AND HIS AMINTA.
THE AMAZING MARRIAGE.
DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS.
THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY RICHMOND.
RHODA FLEMING.
THE SHAVING OF SHAGPAT.
THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS.
SHORT STORIES.
POEMS. 2 volumes.
AN ESSAY ON COMEDY.

Full List on application.

THE NEWEST NOVELS

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."

"This most entertaining social comedy."—Times.

"For good, festive, but not facetious novels, it would be hard to beat him."—Observer.

THE STORY OF THYRZA.

By ALICE BROWN, Author of "Rose Macleod."

"A strengthening tale builded of charity, human kindness, and the humour which has tears behind it."—Daily Chronicle.

THE PERJURER.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

"There is not a dull page in a book which will worthily uphold a tried reputation."—Country Life.

THE ACTRESS.

By L. C. HALE. [Shortly.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.
10 Orange Street London W.C.

engaged to the virile young plutocrat, Sir Guy, who recognises her "serviceable qualities," and offers her the prestige of a position in "the great world," and a final escape from West Kensington. Chapter II., which describes a tea-fight at St. Gabriel's Vicarage, in aid of the mission of the Bishop of Alexandraland, pleasingly illustrates the author's audacity and apt satirical touch. But after Marian's marriage, and her solemn instalment at Tormichael, we are thrown deliberately by the author into a state of sceptical irritation. There is an estrangement between the newly-married pair, why neither we nor Marian herself really know. Guy, beneath his incessant political activities as the Conservative candidate for Redhaven, she perceives, is keeping secret from his army of political friends and workers "some other activity which he appeared to practise in Redhaven by day and in his study by night." There is a mystery, and Marian, unenlightened by Guy, drifts quickly into an attitude of morbid isolation, wounded pride, and contemptuous indifference to her husband's actions. The chronicle runs on without offering us the key to the situation, and when the imbroglio thickens, and Durrant, the sinister-looking "kennel man," is found one night guarding Sir Guy's study from intrusion by Marian and his younger brothers, Jock and Wilfred Rannard, we feel that the situation is growing melodramatic and that Mr. Dickinson is on the verge of the romantic precipice. In a few more pages, however, the author restores our confidence. He has deliberately adopted the dangerous expedient of keeping his readers in the dark so that they may sympathise with Marian's aloofness and judge her husband through her eyes. Guy is elected member for Redhaven by a thumping majority and then the truth comes out. He confides to Marian that he has a secret, infallible method, he has introduced "business methods" into politics; he has used his wealth to buy outright, by a system of "secret subscriptions to unimpeachable objects," the support of the leading working-men in the town; he has, for example, bought the building society of the Dockers' Union; his idea has been not to organise the corrupt, but to corrupt the influential. And Marian discovers that behind his extreme cleverness and amazing grip of affairs Guy is "essentially an undeveloped boy. His immorality is ignorance, his blind self-confidence is the throbbing of a youthful pulse; his successes are the miraculous successes that young vitality achieves by concentration." And now in love with him, glorying in his physical pluck and readiness to face all risks, she prepares to take part in her husband's schemes, hoping to control and curb them at the proper moment, and wean him from his immoral methods.

In Part II. the field is clear for Mr. Dickinson's exposition of his psychological situation, which he handles with masterly insight. Through the medium of Marian's dawning fears, puzzled doubts, and sleepless anxiety over Guy's relations with his political chiefs we are made to pass, by subtle stages, from the recognition of his eccentricities to acute apprehension of their outcome. We get deeper and deeper into the heart of the mystery, but we are drawn into it, step by step with Marian, just as we may form part of a family tragedy in life, and see it as participators, with only glimpses here and there of how it appears to the outside world. And, identified thus with Marian's alarm, with her efforts to keep a natural smiling face, while every fresh incident, every new phase, threatens to precipitate the shattering crisis, we do not know precisely at what stage it is that the truth overwhelms us—that Guy Rannard is mad, that all his cleverness, his intense inner concentration, his dexterity in blinding and baffling people, nay, his very boyishness, are so many symptoms of his insanity. Why did not we or Marian discover it before? This is proof of Mr. Dickinson's cleverness. Life is like this. He has reproduced with uncanny insight the slow drifting and accumulation of perceptions in our consciousness, and not till the cup of our intuitions is brimming full and that "something" falls, which we call the last drop, can we look back and recognise that all the drops in fact were as significant as this last. The analysis, in the last chapter, of the madman's own sensations and states of blurred consciousness is psychologically of great interest, and, though a shot in the dark, is probably near the truth. Mr. Dickinson is still youthfully over-fond of picturesque scenes of assault and battery, and the style of the body of his narrative, though happy in the main, is not finely chiselled. Nevertheless, "Sir Guy and Lady Rannard" is one of the novels of the year.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In "The Fortnightly Review" Mr. Edmund Gosse gives his personal recollections of Mr. Swinburne, whose conversation he describes as "rapid and yet not voluble; it was measured, ornate, and picturesque, and yet it was in a sense homely. It was much less stilted and involved than his prose writing. . . The ease with which finished and polished sentences flowed from him was a constant amazement to me." Mr. Gosse also tells us—what we can readily believe—that "his feeling about literature was serious to the verge of fanaticism. It absorbed him like a religion, and it was this unflagging sense of the superhuman power and value of poetry which made his conversation so stimulating." "The Future of the Balkans" forms the theme of M. R. Ivanovitch, who is confident that a Balkan Confederation "will be realised because it is an absolute necessity and indispensable to all Europe." This Confederation will, in M. Ivanovitch's view, include Turkey and will receive the support of the Western and liberal Powers. Two articles deal with naval questions. "The Admiralty Board and Army Council," by Sir George T. Lambert, advocates that control of the Navy should be taken out of the hands of the First Lord and placed with a number of experts. This policy is, of course, impossible in a democratic country where direct responsibility to Parliament is essential. "Do 'Dreadnoughts' Only Count?" is answered by "Navalis" in the negative. He states the obvious truth that "King Edwards," "Lord Nelsons," and even the "Royal Sovereigns" are still formidable ships and could render an excellent account of themselves, while it will be many years before an enemy's fleet will be wholly composed of "Dreadnoughts," and therefore our older ships will be able to find opponents with whom they are evenly matched. Among the other contents are "A Novelist's Allegory," by Mr. John Galsworthy; "Pre-Animistic Stages in Religion," by Mr. Edward Clodd; "French Culture and Tudor England," by Mr. Sidney Lee; and "British Finances and the Budget," by Mr. J. Ellis Barker, who is as vehement as ever in dictating a fiscal policy to the country of his adoption.

* * *

The opening article in the "Nineteenth Century and After" is an uncompromisingly hostile criticism of the Budget by Mr. Harold Cox. Mr. Cox writes, as he speaks, in a thoroughly conservative vein. He is, it is true, an economist, but the only direction in which he would save is, as far as we can gather, in the War Office. His essay is followed by a thoroughly alarmist article written by Major-General Sir W. G. Knox, urging the necessity for a drastic control of the Press in war as "the first step towards the cultivation of national discipline," and advocating the adoption of a system of universal service whatever injury it may do our social machinery, as the only alternative to the risk of still greater injury being done it by a foreign nation. Sir W. G. Knox has little that is new to say. Sir Horace Plunkett criticises Mr. Birrell's Irish Land Bill, Mr. Ernest Rhys has written "A Tribute to Swinburne," and Mr. George Greenwood contributes an able and spirited reply to the articles by Sir Edward Sullivan in the March and April numbers. But the article in the current issue which is likely to excite most attention is Professor Vambéry's "Personal Recollections of Abdul Hamid II. and his Court." Professor Vambéry knew the deposed Sultan since he was sixteen, and as the only European who had free access to him without an interpreter, his opinion on Abdul Hamid's character carries great weight. It bears out the current view of Abdul Hamid as utterly distrustful of everybody about him, fickle and undecided, almost entirely deprived of the power of steady will, and living a life of constant fear and suspicion. "He saw everywhere enemies; he suspected everywhere treason, and neither day nor night did he enjoy a moment of rest or security." He believed in creating an atmosphere of mutual distrust among his servants and officials, and "no sooner did he see some intimacy between any of his Ministers than he at once decided to estrange them and make them enemies."

* * *

The views on the Budget put forward by Lord Welby in "The Contemporary Review" are on the whole favorable, but a Gladstonian financier can find nothing but blame for the scheme of a development fund. The second

Books of the Season

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE AND JANE WELSH Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE

Uniform with "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. 2 vols. 25s. net.

DAILY NEWS.—"The literature of letters will be searched in vain for a parallel to these volumes. Even the love-letters of the Brownings suffer by comparison."

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF NAPOLEON

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

OBSERVER.—"Full of sparkling interest. . . . M. Turquan's volume is a very amusing and interesting companion."

WHEEL MAGIC

By J. W. ALLEN. With a Dedication to Thomas Seccombe. Being Revolutions of an Impressionist. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

.*. The charm of the bicycle is so elusive that no great writer has hitherto attempted to describe it. In this book an attempt is made to catch the spirit of the wheel in a lyrical fashion, as Izaak Walton caught the spirit of angling.

Six-Shilling Novels

JOAN OF THE HILLS T. B. CLEGG
Author of "The Love Child."

The present story opens in London, but Mr. Clegg is soon back in Australia, describing the life on a remote Australian station, with its refreshing bush atmosphere.

THAIS ANATOLE FRANCE

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A very triumph in its imaginativeness."

SOMEONE PAYS NOEL BARWELL

TRUTH.—"A novel of extraordinary promise, written in the form of letters, all so characteristic that their writers are clearly realised. Certainly a first novel of unusual promise."

THE MEASURE OF OUR YOUTH ALICE HERBERT

EVENING STANDARD.—"A fine and real Novel, executed with finish and distinction. Quick, unforced humour. Passionate sincerity and feeling. Exceedingly clever. A notable novel. It will stand."

MRS. GRAMERCY-PARK. [Just out
A. GORING-THOMAS

SIXPENNY PIECES A. NEIL LYONS
Author of "Arthur's."

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD.

FICTION FOR WHITSUNTIDE

A Story of Adventure—with humour.

MOON OF VALLEYS.

By DAVID WHITELAW, Author of "The Gang."

A Capital Yarn and a Charming Heroine.

THE SPITFIRE.

By EDWARD PEPLE.

By CYRUS TOWNSEND B ADY.

A Clever Story of New Zealand.

THE TRAGEDY OF A FLIRTATION.

By H. B. VOGEL,

Author of "A Maori Maid."

The Success of the Season

THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER.

By BARONESS ORCZY,

Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."
Illustrated by H. M. BROCK.
Third Edition Now Ready.

An Idyll of a Cornish Fishing Village.

PENELOPE ANN.

By J. HENRY HARRIS,

Author of "The Fishers."

The Story of William Devereux's successful play, now being performed at the New Theatre by Miss Julia Neilson and Mr. Fred Terry.

HENRY OF NAVARRE.

By MAY WYNNE,

Illustrated by H. M. BROCK.
Sixth Edition.

ALL AT SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

NOW READY. By the author of "We Three and Troddles."

THE RUNAWAYS. By R. ANDOM. 3/6.

NOW READY.

FROM LAND'S END TO THE LIZARD.

By A. G. FOLLIOTT STOKES.

A companion volume to "From St. Ives to Land's End," with many Illustrations and Map. One shilling net, cloth.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

1909 Issue. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Statesman's Year Book. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the year 1909. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Litt.D., formerly Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. 8vo, 10s. net.

First and Second Series. Complete in 1 vol.

The Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language. Selected and arranged by F. T. PALGRAVE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Artemis to Actæon, and other Verse. By EDITH WHARTON, Author of "The House of Mirth," &c. Extra crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Greek Architecture. By ALLAN MARQUAND, Ph.D., L.H.D., Professor of Art and Archæology in Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. net. [Handbooks of Archaeology and Antiquities.

New Work by the Writer of "Confessio Medici."

Faith & Works of Christian Science. Extra Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

New 6/- Novels.

THE WHITE SISTER. A Story of Rome. By the late F. MARION CRAWFORD.

GERVASE. By MABEL DEARMER.

Author of "The Alien Sisters," &c. 6s.

The Psychology of Thinking. By IRVING E. MILLER, Ph.D. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

THE MOTOR THAT WENT TO COURT. A Story. By FREDERIC COURTLAND PENFIELD, Author of "Present-day Egypt," &c.

WITH THE COIN OF HER LIFE: A Story of Thirteen at Table. The first of three stories with the same motive, by one of the following writers: MARGARET DELAND, S. WEIR MITCHELL, OWEN WISTER.

THE TWO LARGEST DIAMONDS. By GEORGE F. KUNZ, Joint author of "The Book of the Pearl."

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

NOW READY. Vol. LXXVII. Price 10s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

In commemoration of the 100th Anniversary of Paine's Death (June 8th).

A 25s. Book for 1s. 6d.

Now Ready, unabridged. 368 pp., in paper cover. 1s. 6d. (by post 1s. 9d.) and in handsome cloth binding, gilt tops, 2s. 6d. net (by post 2s. 10d.),

DR. M. D. CONWAY'S GREAT WORK,

THE LIFE OF

THOMAS PAINE

(originally published at 25s. net).

Also now ready, uniform with above, but in cloth only, 440 pp., 2s. 6d. net, by post 2s. 10d.

THE WORKS OF THOMAS PAINE,

comprising "The Age of Reason," "The Rights of Man," and a selection from his miscellaneous political writings.

The two volumes, in cloth, gilt tops, will be forwarded, carriage paid, for 5s.

Catalogue and copy of "Literary Guide" (16 large pp.) free on receipt of post-card.

LONDON: WATTS & CO., JOHNSON'S CT., FLEET ST., E.C.

TRUE RELIGION v. FALSE THEOLOGY.

REASONABLE RELIGION without SUPERSTITION.

THEISTIC SERMONS by the

Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, B.A.

Gratis and post free to any part of the world on application to article in the June number of the "Contemporary" is on "French Labor Unions v. The State," and is written by Mr. Alexander Ular. It takes the view that "the recent troubles are to be considered as one out of a great number of preludes to events which perhaps will never happen, but which eventually can be provoked under favorable conditions by the Confédération Générale du Travail in joint action with the State employés. . . Ever since the Radical Party has been in office, but with increasing recklessness, State authority has taken on in all departments, but in the postal administration still more than elsewhere, forms of arbitrary tyranny which could reasonably induce the people to believe that the aspect of despotism only had changed, but that the despotic system continued to prevail as under the most archaic régime." Dr. Alfred Garvie, in "The Personal Equation in Theology," discusses the problems raised by the psychological relations of the critic towards the articles of belief with which he deals. Mr. March Phillips treats of "The Ethics of Greek Art," and Mr. Edwin Pears continues his careful and illuminating series of articles on the Turkish situation.

MR. F. AUMONIER, 32, Warrington Road, Harrow.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, May 28. | Price Friday morning, June 4. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 85 1/16 | ... 84 1/8 |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... | 85½ | ... 85 |
| Steel Common ... ... ... ... | 62¼ | ... 70 |
| Southern Pacific ... ... ... ... | 126 | ... 132 |
| Rand Mines ... ... ... ... | 9 3/32 | ... 10 13/32 |

There has been a good deal of interest this week in the future of money. Bankers in New York expect that the present ease will disappear in the autumn, and are preparing accordingly. This view is supported by the rising prices of various articles and by the expectation that in two or three months' time a large increase will take place in our Indian trade. The Indian wheat crop is now known to be good, and of course it will be sold at a big price, so that a great accession of purchasing power may be experienced for Lancashire goods. Railway managers say that they see symptoms of increasing traffic, though they believe that the high price of food has reduced temporarily the travelling capacity of the working classes. The main thing is that the threatened coal strikes in Wales and Scotland should be averted. Such an event in either coalfield would be disastrous. The future of trade is decidedly hopeful if only governments, employers, and employed will allow the natural recuperative forces and cheap money, enterprise, and speculation to work their usual cure.

Home Railways.

The Home Railway market has been left terribly in the cold during the recent activity, and in spite of the very low point to which prices have fallen investors constantly pass it by. The market, it must be admitted, is remarkably unlucky, and as soon as one trouble is escaped usually manages to fall into another. First it was the threatened railway strike; then the decline in trade and traffics; then the unwise speculation over the Great Central-Great Northern amalgamation, and the disastrous slump that followed; then the expensive, but unsuccessful, proceedings in Parliament, and last, but not least, the strikes in the North of England, and the danger of trouble in the coal trade. These events have combined to knock the life out of the market, and it seems almost doubtful whether anything could galvanise it into activity. If we are to see prices go up, the time will probably be next month after the dividends have been announced, for a satisfactory set of dividends and reports, especially if they are combined with a general recovery of trade, ought to tempt buyers back into the market. What the dividends are likely to be I do not pretend to say. The anticipation of dividends is a singularly dangerous branch of prophecy, and, personally, I prefer to keep away from it; but it may be pointed out that the latest traffics, particularly the "heavies," have been quite satisfactory and that the aggregate returns of seventeen English and Irish railways show so far a decrease of only ·5 per cent. On the other hand, great economies have been made; the price of coal has fallen, and much has undoubtedly been done to save running expenses during the recent depression. To show the extent of these economies I may recall the fact that in the second half of last year, notwithstanding a gross decline of £800,000, the proportion of expenses to earnings on fifteen important lines was unchanged at 61 per cent. That is of good omen for the current half-year. Meanwhile the following comparison of prices may be interesting:—

| | Highest Price 1908. | Price end of May, 1909. |
|---|---|---|
| Great Central '89 ... ... ... | 93¼ | ... 71⅛ |
| Great Eastern ... ... ... ... | 78¼ | ... 63¼ |
| Great Northern "A" ... ... ... | 50 | ... 41 |
| Great Western ... ... ... ... | 126 | ... 120 |
| Lancashire and Yorkshire ... ... | 98⅜ | ... 89½ |
| L. & N.-W. ... ... ... ... | 150½ | ... 135½ |
| L. & S.-W. ... ... ... ... | 149 | ... 134 |
| Midland pref. conv. ... ... ... | 66¼ | ... 63¼ |

It will be interesting to see what happens to the market during July and August.

The Stock Exchange.

On the Stock Exchange speculation has probably pushed up prices as far as they have much right to go in some directions, and on Tuesday a reaction was felt as regards both South African Mines and American securities. A slight shock had been administered to steel shares by the prospect of labor troubles; but they have recovered and again bounded upwards, and to my surprise I have met a well-informed operator, not usually over-sanguine, who quite thinks that Steel Common, though they may now be in for a decline, will before very long rise much higher on their merits. He thinks the water has been squeezed out, and that the coal and ore owned by the Corporation, as well as the plant and the organisation, will enable the directors ultimately to pay much higher dividends. This I record, though I remain a sceptic. Argentine railways, or rather investors in them, are nervous about the threatened drought, which sounded serious in Wednesday's telegram. Argentina has had such a long run of luck that a sharp break in it need not cause surprise. But one hopes both for the sake of our wheat supply and of Brazil that the fears will prove premature and fallacious. If Argentina were badly hit Brazil might topple over.

England as a Free Port.

The wealth which comes to this country merely because almost everything is cheaper here than anywhere else, and because banking and shipping centre here, can hardly be exaggerated. Let me give two instances. The other day a New Yorker who wanted to go to Buenos Ayres came viâ England, not because he wanted to see England, but because that route was so much more convenient and comfortable. I believe that it is quite common for Americans who want to go to South America to take this course. My second example is from personal observation. The other day I was in a large timber yard at Gloucester. One of the directors pointed out a stack of timber which had come from California and was on its way to a waggon-making company at Birmingham. Thence he told me it would proceed in the manufactured form of railway carriages and railway trucks to Buenos Ayres for one of the Argentine lines. If the cost of production were not extraordinarily low here in consequence of free trade, such a transaction as this would be almost impossible; for the United States manufacturers have been exceptionally successful with railroad equipment.

Lucellum.

JUNE ISSUE. NOW READY.

FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS

Special Articles—

LABOUR EXCHANGES AND COMPULSORY INSURANCE.
I.—By the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES McLAREN, Bart., P.C., K.C., M.P.
II.—By HAROLD COX, M.P.

THE INSIDE OF A BALANCE SHEET.
By A. R. FOSTER and P. TOVEY.

THE TAXATION OF LAND VALUES.
By JOSEPH FELS.

THE INTERNATIONAL INCREASE IN RATES OF INTEREST.
By Dr. A. SARTORIUS VON WALTERSHAUSEN.

Topics of the Month. The Month's New Issues. Analysis of Two Hundred Balance Sheets. Complete Statistical Record of Five Thousand Securities.

Publisher, 2, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS at HALF-PRICE.
ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.
LISTS SENT POST FREE. TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£17 17s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary.
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. | 84, Piccadilly, W.
82, Strand, W.C. | 25, Cannon Street, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free. Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.
41st EXHIBITION of MODERN PICTURES at the Galleries of the R.B.A., Suffolk Street, Pall Mall, S.W.
OPEN DAILY, from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Admission, 1s.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK
ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.
2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.
2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

A SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

(Open to Men and Women)

Will be held in Oxford 13th-24th September, 1909.

Among the Lecturers will be Professors S. R. Driver, Percy Gardner, E. von Dobschutz, J. H. Moulton, Drs. R. H. Charles, H. Rashdall, J. E. Carpenter, G. B. Gray, Rev. George Tyrrell, Count Goblet d'Alviella, Mr. R. R. Marett and others.

The fee for the course of about 50 lectures is £1. Applications for details and tickets to be made to

Rev. A. J. CARLYLE, Univ. Coll., Oxford, or
Rev. G. W. THATCHER, Mansfield Coll., Oxford, } Secs.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON,
Goldsmiths College (Training Department).

LECTURER IN ENGLISH.

A LECTURER (MAN) in English Language and Literature will be needed in the above Department in September, 1909. Initial salary between £180 and £250 according to attainments and experience.

Applications should be received by June 9th. Full particulars can be obtained from The Warden, Goldsmiths College, New Cross, S.E.

---

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

---

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

---

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

---

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

---

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

---

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

---

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

---

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

---

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Splendid situation. Health Record one of the best in the Kingdom.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

---

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13 Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

---

ST. HELENS, CLIFTON, GLOS.

SCHOOL for a limited number of Girls of good social position. Thorough education on modern lines. Healthy outdoor life, with due attention to Games and Physical Exercise. Principals: MISS WINGATE, M.A. Dublin (Math. Trip. Cambs.), and MISS POTTER.

---

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854

---

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central.

---

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

---

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

---

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

---

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line,
52 , ... ... 6d. ,,

From CHATTO AND WINDUS'S LIST.

THE WORKS OF ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE

SELECTIONS. 6s.
THE QUEEN-MOTHER; and ROSAMOND. 7s. 6d. net.
ATALANTA IN CALYDON. 6s.
CHASTELARD: a Tragedy. 7s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. First Series. 9s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. Second Series. 9s.
POEMS AND BALLADS. Third Series. 7s.
SONGS BEFORE SUNRISE. 10s. 6d.
BOTHWELL: a Tragedy. 12s. 6d.
SONGS OF TWO NATIONS. 6s.
GEORGE CHAPMAN. (In Vol. II. of G. Chapman's Works.) 3s. 6d.
ESSAYS AND STUDIES. 12s.
ERECTHEUS: a Tragedy. 6s.
A NOTE ON CHARLOTTE BRONTE. 6s.
A STUDY OF SHAKESPEARE. 8s.
SONGS OF THE SPRINGTIMES. 6s.
STUDIES IN SONG. 7s.
MARY STUART: a Tragedy. 8s.
TRISTRAM OF LYONESSE. 9s.
A CENTURY OF ROUNDELS. 8s.
A MIDSUMMER HOLIDAY. 7s.
MARINO FALIERO: a Tragedy. 6s.
A STUDY OF VICTOR HUGO. 6s.
MISCELLANIES. 12s.
LOCRINE: a Tragedy. 6s.
A STUDY OF BEN JONSON. 7s.
THE SISTERS: a Tragedy. 6s.
ASTROPHEL, &c. 7s.
STUDIES IN PROSE AND POETRY. 9s.
THE TALE OF BALEN. 7s.
ROSAMUND, QUEEN OF THE LOMBARDS: a Tragedy. 6s.
A CHANNEL PASSAGE. 7s.
LOVE'S CROSS-CURRENTS. 6s. net.
WILLIAM BLAKE. 6s. net.
THE DUKE OF GANDIA. 5s.
THE AGE OF SHAKESPEARE. 6s. net.

COLLECTED POEMS, in 6 vols., 36s. net the set.
TRAGEDIES, in 5 vols., 30s. net the set.

The ART and LETTERS LIBRARY

Large crown 8vo, cloth, 8 Coloured Plates and 24 Half-tones, 7s. 6d. net per vol. Edition de Luxe, small 4to, printed on pure rag paper, 5 additional Coloured Plates, parchment, 15s. net per vol.

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS FROM VASARI. Collected and arranged by E. L. SEELEY.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE: their Stories as set forth by Vasari, Ridolfi, Lanzi, and the Chroniclers. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY.

STORIES OF THE FLEMISH AND DUTCH ARTISTS, from the Time of the Van Eycks to the End of the Seventeenth Century, drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by VICTOR REYNOLDS.

STORIES OF THE ENGLISH ARTISTS, from Van Dyck to Turner (1600-1851). Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by RANDALL DAVIES and CECIL HUNT.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. Translated by Prof. T. W. ARNOLD.

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: a Study of their Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento. By Prof. ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. Translated by MARY G. STEEGMANN. With an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. 2 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-tone, large crown 8vo, cloth 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

R. L. STEVENSON'S AN INLAND VOYAGE. Illustrated in Colour and Black-and-White by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE-MAKING. By C. J. HOLMES, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

COLOUR BOOKS.

Large foolscap 4to, cloth, 20s. net each.

THE RHINE. By H. J. MACKINDER. With Illustrations in Three Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, and Maps.

SWITZERLAND: the Country and its People. By CLARENCE ROOK. With 56 Illustrations in Three Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, and 24 in Two Tints.

THE COLOUR OF LONDON. By Rev. W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A. With Introduction by M. H. SPIELMANN, F.S.A., and Illustrations in Three Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO.

THE COLOUR OF PARIS. By MM. LES ACADEMICIENS GONCOURT. Translated by M. D. FROST. Edited by LUCIEN DESCAVES. With Introduction by M. L. BENEDITE. Illustrated in Three Colours and Sepia by YOSHIO MARKINO.

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, Litt.D. With Illustrations in Three Colours by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S.

ASSISI OF ST. FRANCIS. By Mrs. ROBERT GOFF. With Introduction by J. KERR LAWSON. Illustrations in Three Colours by Colonel R. GOFF, and Reproductions of the chief Franciscan Paintings.

DEVON: ITS MOORLANDS, STREAMS, AND COASTS. By LADY ROSALIND NORTHCOTE. With 60 Illustrations in Three Colours by F. J. WIDGERY.

THE GREATER ABBEYS OF ENGLAND. By the Right Rev. ABBOT GASQUET. With 60 Illustrations in Three Colours by WARWICK GOBLE.

THE SULTAN AND HIS SUBJECTS. By RICHARD DAVEY. With Photogravure Portrait, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE RUSSIAN BASTILLE

(THE FORTRESS OF SCHLUESSELBURG.)

By I. P. YOUVATSHEV. Translated by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT, Author of 'The Curse of the Romanovs.' Demy 8vo, cloth, with 16 Plates, 7s. 6d. net.

The author, a Russian naval officer of considerable talent and erudition, was suspected by the Government as one of the 'thinking officers,' and suffered two years' solitary confinement in Schluesselburg. He gives a graphic description of the inmates of the prison, whose tragic fate invariably concluded in the madness or suicide which only a strong will enabled the author to escape.

THE PARADISE OR GARDEN OF THE HOLY FATHERS. Being Histories of the Anchorities, Recluses, Cœnobites, Monks, and Ascetic Fathers of the Deserts of Egypt between A.D. CCL. and CCCC. circiter. Compiled by ATHANASIUS, Archbishop of Alexandria; PALLADIUS, Bishop of Helenopolis; SAINT JEROME, and others. Translated out of the Syriac, with Notes and Introduction, by E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, M.A., Keeper of Assyrian and Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum. Two vols. large crown 8vo, with Frontispiece Reproductions from the Syriac MS., 15s. net.

OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS, as Translated out of the Latin by RICHARD WHYTFORD (A.D. 1556). Re-edited into modern English with an Historical Introduction by WILFRID RAYNAL, O.S.B. With Reproductions in Four Colours, and Decorations in Line, after Water-Colours by W. RUSSELL FLINT. The binding after a fine Sixteenth Century example. Large crown 8vo, with 8 Plates in 4-Colour, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, crown 4to, pure rag paper, with four additional Plates in 4-Colour, bound in Parchment, 15s. net; also in whole pigskin with clasps, copying the Sixteenth Century binding, 25s. net.

ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY (New Vols.). 2s. net, cloth; 3s. net, leather.
STEVENSON'S ESSAYS OF TRAVEL.
W. S. GILBERT'S ORIGINAL PLAYS. 3 vols.

THE ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE PARIS SALON FOR 1909. With over 300 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 3s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE JUNE PRINCESS. By Constance Smedley.
THE PAINTED MOUNTAIN. By Peter Lauristoun.
IDOLATRY. By Alice Perrin.
A CASTLE OF DREAMS. By Netta Syrett.
THE ROAD OF NO RETURN. By A. C. Inchbold.
THE MERRY HEART. By Frank Swinnerton.
JULIAN REVELSTONE. By Justin McCarthy.
A QUESTION OF MEANS. By M. B. Cross.
A ROGUE OF RYE. By Willmott Dixon.

London: CHATTO and WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

NEW MEDICI PRINTS

NOW READY OR DURING JUNE.

| | | | | Gallery. | Colour Surface. | Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| ITALIAN SERIES. | | | | | | |
| No. XIV. | MANTEGNA. | M'na, Child and Cherubim ... ... | | Milan ... | 20½ × 16¾ ... | 17s. 6d. net. |
| ,, XV. | TITIAN. | Bacchus and Ariadne ... ... | | London ... | 25 × 23 ... | *25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XVI. | CARPACCIO. | Vision of S. Ursula ... ... ... | | Venice ... | 27 × 26¼ ... | *25s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, XIX. | RAPHAEL. | M'na della Colonna ... ... ... | | Berlin ... | 22 × 16¼ ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ENGLISH SERIES. | | | | | | |
| Eng. III. | HOPPNER. | Countess of Oxford ... ... ... | | London ... | 19¼ × 15½ ... | 15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, IV. | ROMNEY. | Lady Hamilton with a Goat ... ... ... ... | | | 25 × 20 ... | †*21s. 0d. ,, |
| NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES. | | | | | | |
| N.P.S. II. | Unknown. | William Shakespeare ... ... | | Stratford ... | 18 × 13¼ ... | †12s. 6d. ,, |
| FLEMISH SERIES. | | | | | | |
| Fl. VI. | VERMEER. | The Pearl Necklace ... ... ... | | Berlin ... | 21⅞ × 18 ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, VII. | TERBORCH. | The Concert ... ... ... ... | | ,, ... | 21¾ × 17¼ ... | †*15s. 0d. ,, |
| ,, VIII. | Q. MATSYS. | The Magdalen ... ... ... ... | | Antwerp .. | 17⅝ × 11¾ ... | 17s. 6d. ,, |
| ,, III. | FRANZ HALS. | A Family Group ... ... ... | | London ... | 24¾ × 14¾ ... | *21s. 0d. ,, |

* Postage of Prints STARRED, 9d.; of all others, 6d. (three or less in parcel). † Signifies that prices will be raised on publication.

List post-free. The COMPLETELY ILLUSTRATED Catalogue, with particulars of Annual Subscription, Frames, &c., Three Stamps.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, London, W.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 11.] SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Diary of the Week ... ... 369
Politics and Affairs:—
The Colonies and Imperial Defence ... ... ... ... 372
The Tsar's Visit to England ... 373
The Principles of the Budget ... 374
A Free Press for the Empire ... 375
Life and Letters:—
The Persian Quakers ... ... 377
Spent Forces ... ... ... 378
A Trout Pool in Hampshire. By H. ... ... ... ... 379
Short Studies:—
The Prisoner. By John Galsworthy ... ... ... ... 380
Contemporaries:—
Lord Rosebery ... ... ... 381
Science:—
The Wonders of Radio-Activity. By Professor G. M. Minchin 382
The Drama:—
Plays Old-fashioned and New-fangled. By William Archer 384
Letters from Abroad:—
The Cretan Problem. By Our Cretan Correspondent ... 385
Communications:—
The Responsibility for the Licensing of Plays. By Bram Stoker and G. Bernard Shaw ... ... 387
Letters to the Editor:—
South Africa and the Color Question. By the Rev. R. Balmforth ... ... ... 388

PAGE

The Incorrigible Censor. By D. R. and Isobel Hecht ... 388
Pain and The Theatre. By C. E. Maurice ... ... ... ... 389
The Vista of Science. By T. ... 389
Fire Brigades and Insurance Companies. By Insurance Manager ... ... ... ... 390
Re Inequalities of the Income-Tax. By B. H. C. Currie ... 391
The Imperial Cable Service. By Keith A. Murdoch ... 391
Feminist Argument. By E. Belfort Bax ... ... ... ... 392
"I Agree with Every Word." By A Liberal Elector ... ... 392
The Break-up of the Poor Law. By C. H. Norman ... ... 392
Poetry:—
In the Dutch Garden, Hampton Court. By C. Kennett Burrow 392
The World of Books ... ... 393
Books to be read ... ... ... 393
Reviews:—
Mr. Nevinson's Prose Writings. By E. ... ... ... ... 394
Oxford Lectures on Poetry ... 395
The Eumenides of Æschylus ... 396
Stories and Sketches of Warfare 396
Books in Brief:—
Chats on English Earthenware 398
Ideas of a Plain Country-Woman ... ... ... ... 398
Problems of the Middle East ... 400
Principal Story: A Memoir ... 400
New Things and Old in Saint Thomas Aquinas ... ... 400
The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... 400

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The rejection of the Budget Bill on the second reading was moved on Monday by Mr. Austen Chamberlain in a speech of diffused hostility. Mr. Balfour appears to have imposed on him an embargo of silence on Protection, a point keenly noted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a brilliant rejoinder. Mr. George replied to Mr. Bonar Law, who declared that there were no death duties or income tax in France, that the death duties ran up from 1 to 2½ per cent., and from 30 to 40 millions were collected in France from the equivalent of our own income tax. If the character of the Budget was vindictive, then the Government was penalising its friends in Scotland and Ireland, and all Liberals who drank, smoked, paid income tax, or died. As to the land taxes, he hinted at some relief to agricultural land, and showed that a tax on capital values was supported by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Royal Commission on Housing, and Lord St. Aldwyn, and that Mr. Pretyman, the chief champion of the landlords in the House, had paid over the Rosyth transaction £15,000 for ungotten minerals—still, by the way, ungotten by the State—on this property. Sir Charles Dilke, in supporting the Budget, made the pertinent suggestion that the time was coming for a redistribution of the new land taxes between the State and the municipalities, who must be more freely financed.

* * *

Mr. Austen Chamberlain's rejecting amendment was beaten on Thursday night by 366 to 209, a majority of 157 for the second reading of the Bill. Mr. Balfour's speech in support of a motion which he probably welcomes less for its attack on the Budget than for its evasion of Protection, was not a formidable weapon. It consisted of such serious matter as a suggestion that the Government, after the precedent of the super-tax, must put a special tax on men with red hair and £10,000 a year, and a hint of mysterious movements of stocks and shares from London to Brussels or New York not for investment, but for "security." This would seem to be an argument for a new safe rather than for a new Budget. We advise our readers to peruse the Prime Minister's reply with care, for it was an admirably terse and well-knit statement of the main issues. On two points we have some anxiety. We earnestly hope that the Government will not change the Licence duties to a beer tax, and that the Chancellor will not bribe the rural landlords into an acceptance of the Budget by letting them off their income tax. There is no danger that the Lords will throw out the Budget. The peril is that their friends' "bluff" to that effect will unduly weaken it.

* * *

The Conference of Colonial journalists has been turned into a kind of amateur "war council," largely organised by the directors of the "Daily Mail" and the "Daily Express," partly through its discussion of subjects more suited to the coming Imperial Conference, and partly through the mischievous character of Lord Rosebery's opening speech at the "White City" banquet on Saturday last. This speech, witty and brilliant, gave an exaggerated view of the national and European position. It is severely criticised in Germany, where Sir Edward Grey's phrase that he endorsed every word of it is reported with much surprise. Lord Rosebery, after suggesting that the chief objects of the English landscape were its ancient cathedrals and colleges and its old manor houses, and proposing a mixed tour to the Colonies of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, "the House which voted the taxes and the House which paid them" (laughter), drew a melodramatic picture of the state of Europe. There, he said, all "forebode" peace, the nations living in the midst of a "silent warfare," in which, while no blood was shed, the lancets of statesmen extracted "the last drop" from the bodies of the peoples. Europe was going back to barbarism, or to a catastrophe in which the working-men would say, "We will have no more of this madness, this foolery which is grinding us to powder."

* * *

Having thus diagnosed the state of European madness, Lord Rosebery proceeded to encourage the colonists to add to it. "We can and we will build 'Dreadnoughts,' or whatever the newest type may be, as long as we have a shilling to spend on them, and a man to put in them." After hinting at Conscription, he asked the Colonial journalists to tell their peoples that "Europe was lapsing into militarism" and putting pressure upon "this little island to defend its liberties and yours." In this crisis the old country must look to herself for salvation, and "failing her she must look to you."

This language, which gives point to Mr. Stead's criticism that the Conference is being conducted as if the forces of religion and humanity did not exist in this country, found a subdued echo in the ensuing meetings on defence. Mr. McKenna hinted wisely that if the British navy maintained its supremacy in one sea, that is to say in home waters, it would maintain it in all, while modifying the old idea of the Admiralty against the development of local colonial schemes of naval defence. Mr. Balfour declared that the occasion was one for anxiety, but not for panic, and said plainly that if Armageddon were fought at all it would be fought in the neighborhood of this island. It seems to us foolish and light-minded to use such a word as Armageddon at all, but Mr. Balfour's strategical idea is clearly sound. Mr. Haldane, who agreed with every word Mr. Balfour said, as Sir Edward Grey agreed with every word of Lord Rosebery's, again commended his idea of an Imperial military staff, which might lead to the conception of an Imperial naval staff. But this idea is quite at variance with Mr. Balfour's, and is both unsound and chimerical. The land forces of the Colonies must, as Mr. Balfour agreed, be under local control. But unity of command in the home naval forces is essential. The attempt of the conscriptionists to pass a resolution in favor of universal military training for Great Britain and the Colonies was defeated, as the result of a very powerful and brilliant speech by Mr. Macdonald of Toronto.

* * *

Sir Edward Grey's speech on Tuesday, while it curiously endorsed Lord Rosebery's and suggested that expenditure on armaments made the European weather "sultry," gave a moderate and reassuring definition of our foreign policy. The German Press ignores this side of his speech and quotes only the general cover he gives to Lord Rosebery's disturbing rhetoric. For the rest, Sir Edward Grey assigned three functions to the Press, the criticism of politicians, the moulding and forming of public opinion, and the publication of accurate news. He thought criticism should not be so sharp as "to raise a blister," a line which limits the critical power of journalists at a time when, as Mr. Birrell truly said, they are not independent enough. Colonial journalists should recognise that the Empire was governed by compromise, and that the Colonies were allies in its management with the privilege of the free speech which belonged to friends.

* * *

The fourth day's Conference, quitting the subjects of communication and defence, passed to literature under Lord Morley's presidency, the three earlier Conferences having Lord Crewe, Mr. McKenna, and Mr. Balfour as their chairmen. Lord Morley and Mr. Churchill, who followed, preached doctrine directly counter to Lord Rosebery's. Lord Morley asked his hearers to consider whether the Press, which he called "a great centre and fountain of public-hearted duty and moral force," and "the guide to an intellectual grasp of the facts of the world," was used on behalf of international peace. Mr. Churchill added eloquently that the best way in which to serve the large and general interests of the British Empire was to use "wise, good, and true words—words proclaiming the solidarity of Christendom and the interdependence of nations." He denied that the Powers should be considered as if they were cut-throats and assassins. They should rather be considered as brothers, pursuing a common road of moral advance.

Lord Morley spoke in a vein of irony and sympathy, quoting two sayings of Carlyle on journalism, one, that it was ditchwater, and the other, that it ruled the world through persuading it. He said finally that what the journalists often took for real was not half so real as the ideal—witness the fact that half-a-dozen lines of Burns had had more influence on public opinion than millions of leading articles. He deprecated editorial infallibility, smiled at Mr. Stead's choice of the word "Vatican" as a telegraphic address, and urged what he called the "two moderate virtues of simplicity and directness." Lord Morley asked the pertinent question whether the newspaper was the enemy or the friend of the book, and whether it weakened the habit of continuous thought. Finally, Lord Milner, rejecting Lord Rosebery's view as to the "rebarbarisation of Europe," declared that the organisation of national armies made for peace.

* * *

Meanwhile, newspaper sensationalism has found a swift Nemesis during the week. The cables from Australia and New Zealand make it clear that Mr. Deakin's volte face on the question of "Dreadnoughts" had failed. The "Times" correspondent says that his offer is generally regarded as a sop to his old opponent in the coalition, and quotes the "Adelaide Register," that if his policy were made an election test he would be in a "hopeless minority." He also thinks that a "Dreadnought" election would give the late Labor Ministry a majority, and clearly suggests that the whole movement was an error and a failure. The "Daily Mail's" Christchurch correspondent suggests a similar conclusion to the New Zealand offer. The general impression now seems to be that New Zealand's gift will take the form of an increased annual subsidy to the British Navy. Speaking of the voluntary movement in New South Wales, the "Times" correspondent says that although Australia is as keen as ever to help the Mother Country, "if ever there was a fiasco this is one." Meanwhile the Government have properly referred Mr. Deakin's offer of "an Australian 'Dreadnought'" to the Imperial Conference.

* * *

On Thursday the Kaiser and the Tsar are to meet on Finnish waters. The usual and unedifying dispute has been in progress as to which party took the initiative in arranging the meeting, and there is a good deal of dispute as to its significance. M. Isvolsky will be with the Tsar, and the German Foreign Secretary and the Ambassador to St. Petersburg with the Kaiser; Prince Bülow will be too busy in the Reichstag. The semi-official German papers deny that anything is on foot against the Triple entente. "No change in the broad lines of European policy" is contemplated, but only the securing of good relations between Russia and Germany. On the other hand, the "Times" correspondent in St. Petersburg is very nervous. The Russian reactionaries, he reports, are rejoicing in the prospect of a complete reconciliation with Germany at the expense of the Anglo-Russian understanding. He notes that the "Novoe Vremya" has begun to attack the Convention so far as it affects Persia, and that the policy of permanent occupation of Persia is gaining heavily. There is no doubt that the reactionary party which is now uppermost in Russia, and has M. Stolypin in the hollow of its hand, is opposed to the Anglo-Russian agreement, or at least to an anti-German policy, and it would be curious irony if Sir Edward Grey, after making such heavy sacrifices, were to discover that they had brought him nothing.

* * *

The South African Parliaments have approved the revised draft of the Constitution, and appointed delegates to carry it to London. The Cape delegates include Mr. Hofmeyr, the Bond leader. They are authorised to accept amendments not affecting the principles of the draft, and apparently the Imperial Government has given assurances that no serious amendment will be made in the Imperial Parliament. The natives, however, are dispatching representatives to England, and hope to get Mr. Schreiner to plead their cause. In Natal a referendum on the Constitution was taken on Thursday, but the result is not yet out. It is believed that the Unionists will win by a handsome majority. The Closer Union Societies and the attitude of the other colonies are believed to have weightily affected Natal opinion. The opponents of Union consist of the anti-Dutch section, and the old politicians, who, having for years had absolute control over the resources of a colony and the lives of more than a million natives, hate the idea of losing such a heritage.

* * *

The American Senate is making such progress with the task of screwing up the tariff that it hopes to vote the whole Bill by the 26th. On Monday it finished with the Cotton Schedule. This professes to maintain the Dingley rates, substituting specific for ad valorem duties. Senator La Follete, however, showed that the proposed rates are actually from 2 to 40 per cent. higher than the Dingley rates, and the only reply that Mr. Aldrich could offer was the amazing explanation that the rates he meant were the rates the framers of the Dingley tariff intended, not those actually levied as the tariff was interpreted by the Courts. Since, according to excellent authority, Americans are clothed from head to foot in cotton, this means a notable addition to their cost of living. The wool schedule is now under discussion, and the extreme standpatters are making great play with the Japanese peril: Japan apparently has four woollen factories. The German report on wages, which Mr. Aldrich called an "impertinence," has been published, and has helped still further to knock the bottom out of the Aldrich facts. So strong is public feeling in America at this grotesque revision of the tariff that Mr. Taft is credited with the intention of vetoing the Bill unless it is drastically amended.

* * *

Mr. Mackarness has introduced a most moderate Bill assimilating the Indian procedure on deportations to the Irish Coercion Act of 1881. His measure proposes that British subjects arrested and deported must be charged with definite offences punishable by law, that the character of the charge should be stated on the warrant and a copy of it given to the person charged, and that a list of deported persons and a statement of the offences against them and the place where they are detained should be laid before Parliament. We cannot imagine what opposition or criticism a Liberal Government can offer to a proposal so fair and reasonable as this, especially after the suspicions of perjury and even of conspiracy which lie against the Indian police.

* * *

The Cretan question does not advance to a solution. There appears to be some division amongst the Powers as to whether the international forces are really to be withdrawn by July 27th, and if they are withdrawn what is to take their place. There is a prospect that the Powers may decide to fix a stationnaire to guard the Turkish flag which flies in Suda Bay, the only remaining relic of Turkish sovereignty. But would such a situation be free from peril? It would no doubt prevent both the Turks and the Greeks from coming into Crete, but it could not prevent the Cretans from sending delegates to the Grèek Parliament. We cannot too often repeat that it is in Crete and not in Greece that the difficulty arises. The Greeks will not act, lacking, indeed, the power to do so. None the less the Cretans will keep on pressing their almost realised ideal of union with the Motherland, and it is unfair to the Young Turkish party to encourage them in the belief that they can stop such a movement.

* * *

China has withdrawn her request for the submission to the Hague Tribunal of her dispute with Japan, and has undertaken to try once more the possibility of a direct agreement with Japan. China appears to have settled her differences with Russia, but so far there has been no progress towards a settlement with Japan, though in this case the issues are still more important, including the building of the Fakumenn railway and the title to a huge tract of territory. It is curious that the announcement of China's decision followed hot upon a long telegram to the "Times" from Tokio, giving a very unconvincing exposition of the Japanese case, and a leader making a strong attack upon China. The "Times" has sent its foreign editor, Mr. Chirol, on a special mission to the Far East, and it looks as though our Foreign Office was making a vigorous effort to tighten up the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

* * *

The Board of Education has just issued a model syllabus of lessons on "Temperance" for the use of public elementary schools. At present instruction in this subject is given either by the school teachers or, when there are none on the staff who have the special knowledge for teaching of the kind, by agents of various societies and organisations whose services have been accepted by the local education authority. It is important in these circumstances that the lessons given should be of the same type throughout the country, and that they should set a high standard of accuracy in stating facts, and caution in drawing inferences. The syllabus now issued will do much to attain both these objects, and we are glad to see that England is coming into line with French and Belgian opinion as to the importance of early, insistent teaching upon this subject.

* * *

Our Paris correspondent writes:—"The late M. Chauchard, whose funeral arrangements and testamentary dispositions have filled the newspapers for the last few days, was a magnificent snob of a type much less interesting and attractive than "the great Mel," who died in debt, whereas M. Chauchard left behind him several millions sterling. Like many other men who have risen to great fortunes from humble beginnings, M. Chauchard had an immense admiration for himself. His ambition was to become a "grand croix" of the Legion of Honor, and he attained to that distinction two years ago, in consideration of a promise to bequeath his collection of pictures to the Louvre—a promise which has been kept. But it is the ostentation of the funeral arrangements that have excited Parisian resentment. M. Chauchard himself had apparently arranged for a Louis XV. funeral, with all the attendants in the costume of the period, and carriages to match. His executors have found it possible somewhat to modify the too exuberant plans of the deceased, but, even as it is, we read of a coffin costing £1,200, of a cloth-of-gold shroud and similar accessories, and the funeral will cost from first to last several thousand pounds. Such ostentation is uncommon in France, and Parisian feeling on the subject is very strong."

Politics and Affairs.

THE COLONIES AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

We shall not be accused of indifference to the charms of Lord Rosebery's oratory if we say that, in our view, he was not well chosen as the first and foremost spokesman of this country to the Imperial Press. A far more fitting selection would have been the Prime Minister, or some man who exercises, or is likely to exercise, responsibility for Imperial policy. Lord Rosebery belongs to neither category of public men. If, indeed, it be the object of the Conference to send our guests away from these shores flattered, feasted—and forgotten, no better instrument could be chosen for the purpose than a Grand Toastmaster of the Empire, whose delicately mixed compliments may serve as an agreeable digestive for the more substantial pleasures of the banquet. But if we mean to tell the Imperial journalists where our true lines of policy reside, and what are the special features of our civilisation which we think worthy their note and comment, the proper means for such a communication are the people who work for the Empire, and not those who merely talk about it. It is doubtful whether, even in the region of after-dinner speech, the representatives of Colonial democracy are likely to be attracted to the Motherland by Lord Rosebery's vision of her Church and her squirearchy lingering out their days together in picturesque decay. But we, who know Lord Rosebery better than our visitors, recognise these familiar incarnations of the patriotic spirit, and take our accustomed discount from his jibes at a Budget which is mostly ancient history for Australian politicians, and his pathetic side-sketch of the sufferings of the House of Lords at the hands of a Liberal Government and House of Commons. We are more concerned to suggest that the picture of the European situation, so far as it concerns our foreign policy, which he has drawn for our kinsfolk, is a perversion of the truth. It is no fault of a Liberal critic that Lord Rosebery's speeches so continually present the alternative of treating them as having no meaning or a bad meaning, but on this matter there can be no question that his words misrepresent the facts and encourage a serious error in Anglo-Colonial relationships.

Lord Rosebery's precise object cannot be ascertained, for, as we have said, he has no practical relationship with any party in the land. But the effect of his speech is to declare that this country is in a state of imminent peril, and that it is the business of the Colonies to come to its rescue. There is a measure of truth in Lord Rosebery's criticism of world-politics, as in all highly colored pictures of life. There is a kind of "silent war" among the civilised nations, or, as we preferred to call it last week, a "war of steel and gold," in place of an actual conflict of blood and iron, a confrontation in which we are bound to add that the two protagonists are Prince Bülow and Sir Edward Grey. But it is a very different matter for Lord Rosebery to proceed to ask the Colonial journalists to remember the "deplorable way" in which "pressure is being put upon this little island to defend its liberties —and yours." There is hardly a note in this utterance which is not false. No serious pressure is being put upon this "little island." The strength of its Navy to-day is from three to four times the strength of any rival Power, and if a new measurement of naval force has been set up, and a fresh era of ship-building on the most costly scale inaugurated, these movements are entirely due to our initiative, and to the high estimate which our Admiralty placed on the fighting value of "Dreadnoughts." Germany does not stand alone in this action; the latest Power to associate herself with it is our own friend, the French Republic, and at this moment we alone possess a sea-going fleet of these formidable vessels. Three years hence, in the year which is usually cited as the year of peril between us and Germany, we can possess, on a moderate computation, a strength approaching two to one in "Dreadnoughts" alone, and a strength of much more than two to one in the entire force of the fleet. We cannot describe such a situation, even in Mr. Balfour's more moderate language, as matter for "anxiety." Still less does it furnish a reason for "panic." If New Zealand and Australia offered us "Dreadnoughts" in the belief of imminent danger to the Mother Country, they were grossly deceived, and it is only fair to the people of these communities to assure them that no such danger exists. If they desire their offer to be in relief of the excessive burdens of our poorer taxpayers, let us accept it with gratitude. But it would be simple dishonesty to affect the existence of any such actual or proximate national menace from any Power or combination of Powers as Lord Rosebery pretends to discern. There resides an absolute capacity in these islands to meet any rivalry which Germany can offer to the supremacy of the British Fleet. No British statesman will dare to make a counter proposition; and so far as the actual facts known to our statesmen and the Admiralty are concerned, the language used at the White City is a rhetorical deception.

This, we take it, is the bad meaning of Lord Rosebery's speech; but what is to be said of its no meaning? It seems to us that Sir Edward Grey exceeds the usual courtesies of friendship, and forgets the responsibilities of his high position, when he expresses his entire agreement with such an utterance. With what does he agree? With the summons to the young, peaceful democracies of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans—their escutcheons still unstained with war—to rush into the "vortex of militarism," from which all their wiser heads would withdraw them? With Lord Rosebery's insistence on the superficially discouraging features of European civilisation, and his neglect of the beneficent processes which, as the fruit of a long peace, make life a good deal better worth living for the average peasant and workman of Central and Western Europe than it was thirty, fifty, or a hundred years ago? With the eccentric and unmeaning proposition that while Europe is in a state in which the workmen may reasonably say, "We will have no more of this madness, this foolery which is grinding us to powder," "we"—i.e., the directing classes of this country—are to encourage and aggravate this state of madness "as long as we have a shilling to spend on" "Dreadnoughts" "or a man to put into them"? One would have thought that Lord Rosebery's first impulse would be to warn the Colonies against any material or moral contribution to this European insanity. No world-crisis exists calling for such a contribution, and, if it came, it could only rank as a proof of impulsive daughterly affection. Already it is clear that the deliberate misrepresentation last March of the truth about the naval situation is bearing its inevitable fruit. The "Times" correspondent in Australia, in a series of most impressive messages, insists that no Australian politician of the first or second rank is "willingly a Dreadnoughtist"; that State Premiers have been "dragged" into the movement; that the collection of private contributions has proved "a fiasco"; that the "Dreadnought" will be given grudgingly, if given at all; and that an electoral appeal for a national endorsement of the gift will be a failure. Equally significant is the news from New Zealand, where even the "Daily Mail" is forced to report that the offer of a "Dreadnought" will probably give place to "some more businesslike proposal."

For what does the whole matter of Imperial defence amount to? Mr. Balfour spoke the serious truth about it, though he wrapped his meaning up in phrases the exact purport of which may escape the ears of our visitors. Should a naval war arise in which this country and a rival European Power were concerned, we should fight it as if the Colonies had no geographical existence. Our forces would act in one mass. The business of this undivided fleet would be to seek out and either destroy or contain the opposing fleet. When that object was fully attained, the war would be at an end, and the Colonies would be safe from molestation. Should it fail, no diversion of any portion of our fleet from its main objective could be of value. If the Colonies, aware of this simple strategic truth, and of the fact that the supremacy of the British fleet in European waters is their sufficient safeguard from serious attack, choose also to maintain independent flotillas of their own, we shall do well to respect their wishes. Such forces, we hope, will never attain serious rivalry with the American or the Japanese fleets, the two armaments which Canada and Australia may be supposed to have faintly in view. If they did, they would add, not to our statesmen's repose, but to their perturbations. In the long run, the key of Imperial defence is here, in Europe, and the Colonies will be well advised to remember that so long as Australian or Canadian vessels carry, as one of their representatives well said, "not guns, but only a flag," and so long as the present disposition of naval force in Europe remains, neither they nor we have anything to fear.

THE TSAR'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

For the first time since the struggle between monarch and people assumed tragic and national proportions, the Tsar of Russia is about to visit the British Court. It will be a fleeting appearance. Sir Edward Grey has declined to say in precise terms whether it is to be regarded as "public" or "private." Privacy, where two monarchs are concerned, is an ideal that is achieved with difficulty. Some use there will certainly be of the conventional salutes and ceremonials which seek to express a national welcome. The Press will not keep silence, either here or on the Continent, and, however much the mass of the public may wish to regard the coming of Nicholas II. as an event which concerns the Court alone, the fact remains that our flag, our guns, our sailors, and our ships will have played their part in honoring King Edward's visitor. Kings can no more drop their public character at will than Hans Andersen's Emperor could with impunity discard his clothes. In what precise degree the Government as well as the King will be the Tsar's host we do not yet know.

The character of Nicholas II. was for some years an enigma to Europe. The world with difficulty ceased to think of him as the apostle of peace who had created the institutions of the Hague. It knew him to be vacillating, of mediocre talents, and without physical courage or the gift of leadership. Yet somewhere in the man there must lurk a certain unbalanced idealism. There is an idealism of the Right, as well as of the Left, and Nicholas II., so far as he has a mind of his own, reflects the teachings of Pobiedonostseff. He is not merely conservative and authoritarian. He stands for the passionate "true-Russian" mystical reaction. He clings to a Church which has never abandoned the legal right to persecute. He venerates as his ideal of Christianity Father John of Cronstadt, the miracle-worker, half-prophet, half-charlatan, and wholly fanatic, who used to pray in public for the death of Tolstoy. He collects around him the exponents of every phase of superstition, from the weather-prophets to the spirit-rappers. He believes that he is in person the viceroy of God, and, through his hesitations and his broken promises, that assurance of divine irresponsibility inflates and sustains him. Among the oldest and the wisest of his people he walks the anointed of God, and those are his favored advisers who flatter his conviction that he is the Providence of Russia. Whether he is himself personally indifferent to human suffering we do not know. That has commonly been the character of men imbued with this Idealism of the Right. To Pobiedonostseff as to Loyola the miseries of the heretic and the rebel were a trivial incident in the realisation of the sublime purposes of faith. But inevitably a man standing, as the Tsar stands, many centuries behind the race he rules, in culture and ideals, has been forced to surround himself with creatures below the average level of his age. He fell under the ascendancy of the astute financial speculators who induced the royal family to embark in the golden adventure of the Yalu timber concession, and there resulted the Japanese war. Seeking for support in the internal crisis, he found the unflinching medieval loyalty which he desired only in the leaders of the Black Hundreds, in whom it would be difficult to say whether it is the fanatic or the criminal that predominates. Developing, as the crisis proceeded, a passionate anxiety for his own safety, he came to confide the liberties of his subjects to a succession of police officials, trained in a school which uses torture and the agent provocateur. Whoever may be for the moment the Minister of the day, it is the manipulators of this police terrorism, who are, thanks to the permanence of martial law, the real rulers of Russia, and the absolute masters of the liberties of its citizens. Russia has become, so far as its educated class is concerned, the most progressive, the most advanced, and the most humane of European lands. It retains none the less a governing machine which the modern imagination can with difficulty conceive. Peter the Great used on occasion to behead political prisoners with his own hands in the great square of Moscow. A few weeks ago the Senate decided by a large majority, that under the state of martial law which in one form or another is nearly everywhere prevalent, a provincial governor-general has the right to order the execution of Russian citizens untried.

A survey of the present condition of Russia seems indeed to carry us beyond all the canons of probability and sanity. One frames the picture of a society, singularly sensitive and thoughtful, whose governors would have it race backwards, under a régime of coercion, into barbarism. But the official figures and avowals are on record. Tolstoy's unforgettable protest against the wholesale executions by court-martial has gone unheeded, and the number of the men and women, the lads and the girls, executed after a form of military trial in time of peace exceeds in three years a total of two thousand. The prisons of the Empire, built to hold as a maximum some 90,000 persons, now house over 180,000. Overcrowding has brought with it disease, and month by month epidemics of scurvy, cholera, typhoid, and typhus march from one gaol to another. Figures laid before the Duma show that in some of these prisons one-fourth of the prisoners are sometimes at one time stricken with fever. The sick and the whole, the criminals and the politicals, lie in these filthy buildings together, without medical care or nursing. Even from the limbs of men suffering from scurvy or typhus the fetters are not removed, until death comes to their release. There is evidence, too, that in most, if not all, of these prisons the police and the warders habitually beat the prisoners, and do not spare even the sick. These are not random assertions. They are based on documents laid before the Duma, and adopted by the Duma as a whole in the form of an accepted interpellation. It was for long doubtful what were the exact numbers of the persons sent to Siberia and to the sub-arctic zone of Northern Russia by that arbitrary police process known as "administrative exile." It is now officially stated that the total is at present 74,000. So much is generally conceded, and to deepen the colors of the sombre picture we need not explore the evidently authentic and truthful evidence which Prince Kropotkin has collected to show that, in addition to all these official methods of terrorism, torture is also practised, or has quite recently been practised, in certain prisons. When we ask what is the justification for all this cruelty, the answer is even harder to frame. There are now no concerted revolutionary movement, no military mutinies, no general strikes, no organised terrorism. The crimes of violence, the occasional murders of policemen, the agrarian outrages and the acts of brigandage are the natural but spasmodic protests of individuals, ground down by this lawless despotism, ruined by continual famines and the ruthless collection of taxes, and taught by the Government itself to despair of order and to despise the sanctity of human life.

We should be sorry to minimise unduly the responsibility of M. Stolypin and the nominal Government of Russia for these excesses. Of him and of the Octobrist majority in the Duma it must be recorded that they are weak enough and callous enough to allow them to continue. The Russian landowners and the official caste are fighting for their agrarian privileges and their arbitrary power. There is a class struggle as well as a Constitutional struggle. But for the character which it has assumed the responsibility belongs to the Tsar. He has not sought to evade it. His public patronage of the League of True Russian Men, popularly known as the Black Hundreds, stamps him as the crowned leader of the reaction. He accepted its badge and received its leaders in audience, while it was urging him to destroy the Constitution root and branch. He encouraged it by public speeches while it was openly organising the massacre of Jews. A few weeks ago he once more made a public donation to its funds at a moment when its President stood accused (but immune from arrest) before the Finnish Courts, on the charge of compassing the murder of one Liberal deputy, M. Hertzenstein, and planning that of another, M. Miliukoff. For all the activities of the Black Hundreds, for their assassinations and their massacres, the moral responsibility of Nicholas II. is as clear as was that of Abdul Hamid for the slaughter of the Armenians and the persecution of the Young Turks. To regard this patron of the anti-constitutional movement as a constitutional sovereign is a make-believe. To affect to salute in the person of a Tsar at war with his own people, the head of the friendly Russian nation, is a pedantry. To treat a man who has consorted with the organisers of massacre as a civilised ruler is treason to civilisation. A welcome offered to him is a misprint in the history of Liberalism, and an infidelity to the cause of freedom.

---

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE BUDGET.

THERE are two principles of finance now before the public. The first is to lay the burden which the increase of public expenditure has entailed on the food, the necessaries, and the comforts of the masses—for of all such taxation the masses pay the greater share—and on the materials, appliances, and processes of industry and commerce. That proposal is the inspiriting cry with which the Opposition will go to the country, though it seems that they think it prudent to withhold it when they discuss the Budget in the House of Commons. The second principle is to draw the necessary revenue from the surplus wealth of certain classes—that is to say, from wealth which is not earned by proportional exertion on the part of those to whom it falls, and which exceeds in amount the limit desirable for human enjoyment and social salubrity. The difficulty in so complex a series of proposals as those of the present Budget is to drive home to the public mind the broad difference of principle. In this Mr. Lloyd George has been greatly helped by the debate on the second reading of the Finance Bill, by the wail of wealth, and not least by the dialectics of Mr. Harold Cox. Mr. Cox, continuously cheered by guileless squires and inarticulate capitalists, devotes his whole argument to deducing conclusions which those squires and capitalists may one day rue. It is not for us to reject his contention that the principle of taxing unearned income has a far wider scope than the finance of the present Budget. It is not for us to deny that the whole site value of land is in strictness "unearned." Indeed, we may have to remind Mr. Cox and those who innocently cheer him of some of these contentions when the question of the separate rating of site values for local purposes comes up for discussion. We admit that the principles of the Budget are far-reaching. What Mr. Cox proves to demonstration is that those principles have been applied with the utmost moderation and restraint. This, again, we are not concerned to deny. We agree that from one point of view all site value might fairly have been increased. But we have also to bear in mind that landed property is always freely changing hands, and that accordingly, though site value may in itself be "unearned," it may have been acquired by the expenditure of hard-earned cash by its present proprietor. It is therefore the desire of the Government and of the entire Liberal party to deal with this and every other form of property with an equitable consideration for the owners' expectations. They wish to vindicate public rights, but to reduce to a minimum the cases of hardship to individuals.

Similarly, when Mr. Cox points to an element of unearned increment in the swollen fees of a fashionable physician or of a popular writer he is only putting in a crude and popular form a truth which it has been generally left to Socialists to expound, but which has recently been subjected to a new and fruitful analysis by Mr. J. A. Hobson. It is perfectly true, and it is a most important point, that there are elements of "social value" in almost every form of wealth. What a man possesses and even what he earns is in truth the product not of his own brain or his own right arm alone, but rather of a kind of partnership between him and society. Hitherto, this dual character of wealth has generally escaped recognition, but, as Mr. Hobson has shown, it is destined to be the basis of democratic finance, and Mr. Cox is doing an unwitting service at once in popularising the conception and in showing how very modest are the tentative applications made of it by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The truth is, of course, that the problem of distinguishing "social value" from wealth really due to individual effort is in most cases one of extraordinary delicacy and difficulty, and it is not till these difficulties are surmounted that the principle can be practically applied in the way which Mr. Cox demands. To take, for instance, Mr. Cox's case of a physician's fees, we know of no analysis which can tell us accurately in each case what portion of them is to be regarded as the necessary reward of effort, and what is to be regarded as "surplus." But in the case of land we can by means of present valuations make this analysis, and that is why we propose to apply the principle to land to begin with. As to the physician, all we can say is that, where the income is very large, there it is exceedingly probable that the social factor plays a part, and that is precisely why we balance our land tax with a super-tax on all large incomes. We are, that is to say, applying the same principle with that degree of accuracy of which our present knowledge allows.

Incapable of defeating the Budget by argument in the House of Commons, the Protectionists who see their whole cause imperilled by the revelation of the resources of democratic finance, are beginning to threaten us with the power of the House of Lords. We trust that these threats will not dispose any Liberal members to listen to counsels of timidity. The paramount power of the House of Commons in finance has been asserted over and over again from 1678 onwards. The right of amendment has been definitely refused, and the controversy of 1860-61 substantially settled the right of rejection, though that controversy was in itself merely the last of a long chain of constitutional facts of irrefragible strength. In the former of those years the Lords rejected Mr. Gladstone's Bill for the Repeal of the Paper duty. The situation was dealt with in two stages. In the first place the House of Commons passed three resolutions affirming "that the right of granting aids and supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone," rehearsing the fact that the power of the Lords to reject financial Bills was "justly regarded with peculiar jealousy," and, thirdly, reminding the Lords that, to guard against undue interference in the future "this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit taxes, and to frame Bills of supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time may be maintained inviolate." The meaning of this resolution was that any specific proposal to which the Lords objected could be included in the general Budget of the year, which the Lords could not amend. This was, in fact, done in the following year, and it constituted the second and more effectual reply to the Lords. It was clearly understood, though defiant language was avoided, that in sending up the Finance Bill as an undivided whole the powers of the Lords were reduced in fact to a mere form. They could not throw out the Bill without bringing the government of the country to a standstill. All the new taxes are imposed by resolutions of the House of Commons without strict legal authority. They are already being collected in the faith of the legal authorisation presently to be given by the Finance Bill, a form of procedure involving considerable economies to the country, and dependent wholly on the unimpeachable security enjoyed by all revenue officers that the financial resolutions adopted by the House of Commons will eventually become law. The Lords submitted, in fact, because they could not veto the Finance Bill without throwing the machinery of government out of gear. Were they in these days to attempt another course, they would not only be the cause of great confusion and disorder in the immediate present, but would be setting in motion a revolution of which no man could foresee the end. To go no further than the first step, it would be the immediate duty of Ministers to advise the King in the use of his one constitutional prerogative whereby the resistance of the peers can in orderly fashion be overcome. These we take to be sufficiently obvious reflections, which have presumably escaped the notice of Conservative writers who imagine that they can frighten Liberal members by threats of an aristocratic revolution.

A FREE PRESS FOR THE EMPIRE.

It is a pity that so many of the politicians who spoke at the Imperial Press Conference sought to "improve the opportunity" by enlarging upon problems of defence when, as Mr. Birrell showed, issues far more vital and more relevant to the occasion claimed discussion. "It is not so easy," remarked Sir E. Grey, "for politicians to tell the truth about the Press, because the Press is the only medium through which the truth can be told." If this is so, how much more difficult it must be for the Press to tell the truth about the Press. Yet this is surely the prime object of such a conference, and, making due allowance for the rhetorical platitudes proper to the occasion it may be admitted that a fair number of really critical questions were raised. What may be termed the distinctively Imperialistic function of our Press as a bond of union in thought and feeling between the parts of our Empire, important though it is, was over-rated by some of the speakers. Though upon non-controversial matters of interest, such as sport and sensational events, the best Colonial papers keep their readers in touch with the news of the Mother Country, it cannot be claimed that the current of politics or of any other deeper movement of our national life is sure of faithful rendering in the Colonies. Nor is there any serious attempt in this country to state and interpret continuously and intelligibly the more important currents of Colonial life. How far this failure reflects upon the Press, how far upon the public—in other words, how far it is a defect of supply, how far of demand—is a question which dives into the deeper issue of the functions of the modern Press.

Here it is necessary to separate the function of news from that of criticism. It is probably becoming truer every year, with the spread of education, that the indirect influence of the Press in forming public opinion through the selection and presentation of news is more important than the direct influence through commentary and criticism. Reliable statements of fact must more and more constitute the virtue of a good newspaper. We look, therefore, with considerable distrust to the ideal which Lord Rosebery held out of a Press engaged in the conscious moulding of an Imperial sentiment by which "the whole opinion and the thought of the Empire, which should circulate like blood through the body politic, should, like blood, chiefly circulate from the heart." We hope, indeed, that Sir H. Graham is justified in thinking that "people are more apt to believe what they see in a great British paper than in any other," because "they know as a rule you are not publishing inspired nonsense to help your Government, they feel sure that you are not the paid megaphones of financial buccaneers." But when we recollect how our British Press was "operated" just ten years ago for the manufacture of Jingoism by South African financiers and their political confederates, and how our Colonial Office at that time and since has consciously set itself to organise public feeling in Australia and Canada through control of the cables, we cannot feel full confidence that we shall always escape the poison of a "kept" press.

For though deliberate manipulation of news may be comparatively rare, the selection, rejection, and doctoring of news by the prepossessions of the man at one end of the wire or at the other is, as Lord Crewe well recognised, a very serious interference with the truth-telling of the modern Press. How to combine the qualifications of news, that it be quick, interesting, and accurate, is, indeed, the rub. For though it may be the business of a Foreign Secretary, as we were told, "to deal with general subjects and generally to be rather vague in doing so," the business of a Press is to be concrete and perfectly explicit, and the cablegram, with its terse, bare, dogmatic statements, imposed simultaneously upon millions of minds, has become the central source of power in the modern newspaper. The unchecked and irresponsible origin of this species of news is a peril which brings up for serious consideration the question of the reality of the freedom of the Press. We are in the habit of speaking of this freedom as already won, much as we assume that "slavery" in substance as in name has been banished from our Empire. But Lord Cromer's ill-judged and provocative words upon "the vernacular Press," serve to remind us that even the primary right of free publication is withheld over a great portion of our Empire.

A Press, however, whose true freedom is expressed in telling truth and in helping, through public opinion, to "form character," must not merely have liberty to print what it chooses. That choice itself must be free from the pressure and direction of party, class, or business interest. Now the danger of our time is that of a falsification of news by the pressure of business interests or by the mere commercial allurements of "good copy." It requires more courage and more professional integrity than survives in many newspapers to resist the subtly moulding influences of the great advertising interests or to refuse that coloring and emphasis of sensational news which makes for a gigantic circulation. Where the naked play of business pressure can find concealment under the cloak of patriotism or philanthropy, many even among the more self-respecting organs of the Press may be misled into aiding and abetting falsehood. The whole Protectionist campaign in the Press of this and other countries is a notorious example of this abuse. Not less striking is the stimulation of expenditure on armaments or of public loans which officials and politicians connected with manufacturing and financial firms unite in urging upon Governments. How, in the face of such well-known operations, is it possible for us confidently to accede to Sir E. Grey's assertion that "The great facts are not misrepresented, and cannot be misrepresented"? Why, the very instance he chose to illustrate his point appears to us a most convincing refutation: "Take the question of the expenditure on arms. When we expressed our view on that subject the other day, there came a response which admitted of no mistake—a response from the other parts of the Empire which made us feel that the Empire beat with one heart." Although the Press cannot be saddled with the responsibility of first uttering the gravest of recent "misrepresentations," the facile instrumentality it affords for driving the falsehood through the veins of the whole Empire may be cited as a very serious defect in the nature of our modern Press. Until it can be made profitable for a newspaper to give sifted truth and unbiased opinion instead of "what our readers and our advertisers like," the liberty of the Press still remains a maimed and incomplete attainment.

Life and Letters.

THE PERSIAN QUAKERS.

To redress the balance of the New World the East calls in an Old, which is a spiritual. While the civilised Western nations are clutching at rocks and sands, while they slaughter each other for plots of minerals that are not tomb enough to hide the slain, while they parcel out the mortal habitations of Asia into spheres, concessions, and dominions, the East escapes to regions of the spirit where no frontiers can be drawn, where riches involve no poverty, and all the hosts of the conquerors would be welcomed with a smile, if only they would come.

Those thundering legions, those triumphal pomps leading their show of spoils and captives, those engines of destruction and rapid carriages, regulations of Empire and fussy laws, wealth of factories, and comfort of heaven-piercing hotels—to the East they have been but transitory visions and hardly tangible toys. As though by the ladder on which angels of God were seen ascending and descending, the East has from age to age attained to a height of contemplation and a purity of conduct that give the look of cockpits and pigsties to our records of Napoleonic campaigns and our luxurious inventions. The strangest thing of all is that from age to age the West goes on declaring that Orientals are perfectly right—that earth yields nothing to compare to the knowledge of eternal truths, and that it profits a man nothing if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul. And yet, accepting the thought of the East and jealously vindicating it as peculiarly her own, the West, with astonishing humility, continues her natural course of domination, aggrandisement, and material progress.

To be sure, there are signs of approaching change. The West itself is throwing off the spell of Oriental thought, returning, under the influence of Anglo-German ideals, to its own brute theories of self-assertion and corporeal happiness. And it seems that the East, which has so long led her rough conqueror captive, is herself to be conquered at last by a despairing acceptance of Western views of life. Possibly we may all live to regret the change as it comes, for that ladder by which the angels of God ascended and descended may be cut away to clear the ground, and, without his ladder, Jacob was not much of a man. But before the unsubstantial vision is lost for ever, nature has ordained for us a brief and final instance, as though at a glance to reveal the meaning of that difference on which the course of man's history has turned for at least three thousand years.

As once in Macedonian days, the old destiny of the East is again typified in Persia. Here are the legions, thundering as of old; or, at least, there is about one legion at Tabriz and on the road to Teheran, and the thunder of half a legion would now be quite enough to overcome the land of him whose name is saluted as "Monarch of Armies Countless as the Stars." The stars, though countless, are, unhappily, distant, and few can calculate their influence on human affairs. But here on the roads, ready to strike at the double heart of the race, stands that grim, brown-coated legion with bayonets fixed. Skirting a long frontier, runs a railway to Samarcand, ready to pour many other grim, brown-coated legions into the gardens of Khorassan, and far away, in the deserts and salt plains of the south, another master of legions claims a dominating influence and the gates of the sea. From one end of the land and from the other, the claws of civilisation are making ready to lay their grip upon the next great market of the world; and, helpless as mice on a bare floor, between the two stand some eight or ten millions of polite, gentle, and artistic people, well disposed to all mankind, and desirous neither to kill nor die.

Browning tells of an Imperious Tyrant who, of the million or two he ruled and possessed, hated one man most. He was a man whom, through his very weakness and insignificance, it was impossible to strike and overcome. Blows, tortures, and pleasures had no effect on his indifference to the Tyrant's power. So, says the Tyrant:—

> "So, I soberly laid my last plan
> To extinguish the man,
> Round his creep-hole, with never a break
> Ran my fires for his sake;
> Overhead, did my thunder combine
> With my under-ground mine;
> Till I looked from my labor content,
> To enjoy the event."

We know how it ended—how, from the midst of these entanglements, the man stood erect and "caught at God's skirts"; whereon the Tyrant was himself afraid. To catch at God's skirts has always been the Oriental manner of defence. It is thus that the East has escaped—has called in an Old World to redress the balance of the New—and so it is in Persia now.

It is only sixty years since the fresh appeal to the Spirit began. Through the writings of Prof. E. G. Browne and, no doubt, of other European scholars, a good deal has become gradually known of the Persian movement, sometimes called Babism and sometimes Bahaism, from the titles meaning "The Door," and "The Splendor of God," bestowed upon its first two originators. And now, under the latter name, Mr. Eric Hammond has published through Messrs. John Murray some extracts from the sacred writings of the Bahais, with an introduction of history and explanation. The founder, Mirza Ali Mohammed, called "The Bab," or Door, began to be known at Shiraz in mid-Persia, a short time before the year 1848 made European thrones so uneasy; and he met the fate of reformers two years later, being shot at Tabriz. But his doctrine was carried on by a youth of Teheran, who suffered exile to Bagdad, Adrianople, (whence, with holy simplicity, he appealed to the monarchs of Europe to declare peace on earth, and to the Pope to issue a Bull promulgating the essential unity of all religions) and finally to Acca (Acre) on the Syrian coast, at the foot of Carmel. This man, called the Baha 'u 'Ullah, or "Splendor of God," seems to have been the chief author of the movement's books, and when he died in 1892, his son, Abdul Baha, who is now a man of sixty-five, remained at Acca. So it comes about that Acca may be regarded as the centre of the belief, though its strength lies in its natural home of Persia, and among Persians it counts many adherents, some say a tenth, Mr. Eric Hammond says a third, of the population.

It is strange how the accounts of early religious movements or reformations read almost exactly the same. There is the same uncertainty of origin, the same vagueness about the early followers, the growth of their influence, and the meaning of their rites and teaching. We must apparently call Babism a reforming tendency in Islam, much as Roman historians regarded Christianity as a variation on Judaism. But perhaps it would be a nearer parallel if we could imagine the Quakers developing directly from Catholicism. There is the same absence of priesthood and churches, the same insistence upon peace and brotherhood, the same doctrine of equality between men and women, rich and poor, and the same simple and temperate, but not outwardly ascetic, mode of life. The rules of conduct forbid distrust of men or unkindness to animals; they forbid drink, opium, and gambling; but they permit marriage, encourage the arts and sciences, and generally inculcate that gracious and cheerful blitheness which is supposed to have characterised the Early Christian community in the midst of cruel or despairing Imperial philosophies. For the discipline of life the Babis suppose the soul to pass through seven valleys, or stages upon her journey, and for each valley she requires a separate horse. Thus in the Valley of Search she rides the horse of patience (compare, "If with all your hearts ye truly seek Him"); in the Valley of Love she rides the horse of pain—a familiar steed to lovers; and so on in the other Valleys of Knowledge, Unity, Contentment (where sings the nightingale of the heart), of Astonishment (in which there is something of ecstasy, or, perhaps, rather of Wordsworth's "Admiration") and the final Valley of Poverty or annihilation of self—the same Valley in which the Prophet himself cried "Poverty is my glory"—the same devotion of self as was the Babist martyr's of whom Prof. Browne tells that, when the executioner at the first blow only wounded his neck and knocked his turban off, he exclaimed:—

> "Oh, happy that intoxicated lover who, at the foot of his Beloved, knoweth not whether it be his head or his turban which he casteth."

Beyond these valleys of discipline and conduct there lies, it may well be, a region of divine contemplation; for, as the teacher says, "everything is mortal except the face of God." But into that region we cannot enter. "How," asks the Babist proverb, "how can a spider hunt the griffin of the Caucasus?" Perhaps for those who stand outside, the thing to notice most is the Babist teaching of the universal in religion. Whereas the sword of Islam purged the Infidel with destruction, the Babis accept the soul of divine truth in all religions, and to them "Intolerance is the one impossible word." The editor of this little book rightly compares a precept on one of the iron columns of Asoka, the early Buddhist Emperor in India:—"Remember that everywhere you will find some sort of faith and righteousness. See that you foster this, and do not destroy." That universality of acceptance, that ungrudging friendliness and charm in conduct, and the unambitious grace which can always pray, "Protect me from myself"—these principles appear to be the distinctions that mark the new revelation of the Spirit in the East, and they do not widely differ from previous forms which the Spirit has taken.

Europe and her Powers go thundering on their way—"rattling" on their way is perhaps the right word now—with their armaments, their inventions, their commerce, comforts, and Nietzsche philosophies of Supermen and the glory of clutching all one can. It seems most likely that Europe's next big grab will be to swallow Persia and call it virile. But in Persia what will be the fate of these new followers of the Spirit—those who seek peace and ensue it, who catch at the skirts of God, and account the present world nothing in comparison with the glory that is revealed?

---

SPENT FORCES.

Looking round the circle of human lives, so far as one's sight can compass it, one cannot but observe how many of these lives are without any spontaneous and native energy, and simply lie inert. And if one pauses to think, one is forced to reflect that here has been change, for it was not thus that the majority of them began. At the outset they were aggressive and restless, conscious of a "call," determined to work upon the outside world and upon circumstance rather than allow these things to work upon them, throbbing with positive and initiative force. They recognised themselves as energising factors in a progressive process—factors on which the process in a measure depended; and aggressive power welled up, as it were, spontaneously from within. They hardly had to call upon themselves: the tides of power rushed through them as if coming from a source beyond them, they being but the channels through which the tides were sent. Both in relation to themselves, to their own best interests, and in relation to the great causes of the world, they were forceful, daring, positive, direct, and purposeful in aim. Now all this is gone. They are only, so to say, like a hollow shell in which explosive energy used to reside—or, to change the figure, like those volcanoes, scattered here and there about the earth, whose fires are dead. They are the tombs of spent forces. Power issues spontaneously from them no more.

The tendency towards this extinction of positive energy besets us all. And what is meant—be it noted—is something distinct from a recognition of the limits of power, from an admission that for the great ideals after which we strove at first smaller aims must be substituted. That is inevitable, and may be really gain rather than loss. The enthusiasms of youth need to be rationalised, and, in order that they may better achieve the possible, they must learn where the region of the impossible begins. But what is alluded to is a more or less unreluctant acquiescence in things as they are—the loss of desire to act upon the existing condition—the feeling that initiative toward something better, either in ourselves or beyond ourselves, is not worth while. We fall into the condition of having not only little power in hand and brain, but little or no impulse in the heart. The eager, restless forces which used to clutch, as it were, from behind, at every faculty of our natures, as though, having swept into us from beyond, they were now striving to push their way out again through those faculties, and thus express themselves and realise their aims—forces which we felt to be in us, and yet not of us—these do not beat through us now. So far as we are concerned, they belong to a by-gone age. In us, at any rate, force is spent. We are content to let things go.

This dying of the first restlessness, of the first spontaneous energy, must at least be recognised as a loss. And it is necessary to say this, for some justify it, and even glory in it, as if it were the mark of wisdom and of a mature mind. All very well for the young and inexperienced man, it is said, to fling himself thus ardently against the barriers of the actual, to let an unrestrained idealism use him as its willing tool; but we know better! The mood of lassitude is taken as a proof that illusions have been outgrown, and that a true and sane outlook has been acquired; reason has taken its rightful place, and impulse has been dethroned; the spontaneous energies of the earlier period were but toys, to be put away with all the other childish things. Let it be understood that it is not the natural thing, in the strict sense, for this extinction of force to befall. Natural in one way, of course, it is—as starvation is natural if man will not take food, as the feeling of pain is natural if a man put his hand into the fire: it is natural in the sense that it comes about by itself if certain preventive conditions be not observed. But many things are natural in that sense which are not natural in the truer sense of being in harmony with the ordained order. A natural law produces them; but while the law is itself natural, it was never designed that these particular illustrations of its working should be given. And on any rational reading of the world and its purpose and its informing idea—on any interpretation of things which founds upon the conception of a world progressively realising an underlying plan (for the purposes of the argument, one need not even put it in a fashion whereby theism is more definitely implied)—it cannot be maintained that man, the last and highest product of the process which has gone before, is best fulfilling his call when he ceases to take any part in carrying the process through further changes, and when he bids the formative forces, instead of travelling through and utilising him, take a route which passes him by.

Indeed, whatever may sometimes be said in order to excuse the exhaustion of the earlier impulses, we show in more ways than one that we hold their continuance, rather than their passing, to be the rightful thing. We speak in praise of the nature which preserves its spontaneous ardor; even though it make mistakes, we prefer it to the nature which in decorous passiveness drones placidly through the hours; and they who, though the snows of age whiten their heads, prove that the summer fires are still unquenched within, are held for the finest specimens of what manhood ought to be. Moreover, the fact that some, finding the native forces spent within them, substitute for them a sort of artificial self-coercion, may be taken as evidence that the dying of the soul's aggressive and spontaneous restlessness is looked upon as really a symptom of ill. It would perhaps be not unjust to call this an age of fads; and a searching analysis of things might show that many men and women who, with fidgetiness and fuss, devote themselves to the cult and the advocacy of fads are really moved by a not unworthy consciousness that in some way or other life ought to make its mark upon the surrounding realities, and not merely acquiesce in that which is. This is, of course, a very different thing from the hopeful and almost automatic movement of power which forms our text: it is scarcely more than a fidgety protest, a petulant spurt of rebellious mood. But such as it is, it indicates that conscience will not look upon the condition of "spent forces" as approved.

Can any word be said as to how they are to be revived? The mere contemplation of ideals is only a partial remedy—a real one, however, so far as it goes, since to see great aims clearly will at least stir something of ardor for their concrete realisation, though it may hardly get beyond the creation of an ineffectual, if passionate, desire. But what is needed is to bring back the idea of a great progressive movement in which we ourselves are instruments—instruments rather than initiators or makers—of a great sweep of power which pours itself into us, as into vessels whence it is to be drawn again for our own uses and those of the world. The definitely religious man will, of course, translate this into other language, and speak of himself as the instrument of God's will; but for the moment we set the thing at its lowest terms. It was said at the outset, in referring to the earlier condition of forceful energy, that those who were in that condition hardly had to call upon themselves: the tides of power rushed through them as if coming from a source beyond them, they being but the channels through which the tides were sent. It is this conception of things we need to recover for the mind, in order that it may become a reality of experience once more. For it is, as a matter of fact, if we enquire closely into it, through looking upon ourselves as the source of energy that energy has died. We have so frequently, in the time of early ardor, taken the great enterprises as being done, or to be done, by us rather than through us—which is to say that we have, in the very act of taking them so, detached ourselves from the inexhaustible spring of strength, and flung ourselves upon our own limited supply. We need now to reverse the process through which force has been worn out. We need not a mere optimism—not a mere conviction that there is an upward and onward movement of the world's history—but we need the idea of a progressive movement in which we are instruments, which must fulfil itself through all the faculties we possess. We need to conceive ourselves as being but the eyes and hands and feet, if it may be so put, of a power not our own.

Is it objected that this is a mere idea of the mind, and cannot therefore bring a real revival of power? It is certainly as an idea of the mind that it must first of all come. But then the idea, once accepted, involves immediately an attitude and adjustment of nature—such an attitude and adjustment as will allow the tide of eternal force to sweep through. And so the conception of the mind becomes, as was said, a reality of experience; and so the conception justifies itself, proves itself valid and true. The paradox of the whole thing, indeed, is this—that life recovers positiveness, initiative, force, when it realises that, in itself, it has no positiveness or initiative or force, and is content to be only the halting-place at which these things call to make themselves visible as they pass from the eternal into time.

---

A TROUT POOL IN HAMPSHIRE.

At luncheon near Aldershot the other day a friend remarked to the writer that he and his wife had to hurry off for a few hours' fishing. Would I go with them? It was a very fine pool they were to try. His leave included her and himself only, and thus I should have to be merely an onlooker; but I should find the motor car journey to the stream agreeable. O yes; I would go; gladly. Gladly I went, too; but when we reached the pool, which is on the Wey, and a mill-dam rather than a work of Nature, gladness was smothered by suspicion. This, I felt, must be a practical joke. Along the shallower side of the water, which lies by the high road, a horse and cart were splashing. A pair of swans and many ducks were scuttling about on the other side and in the middle. A girl was throwing stones into the pool, and coaxing her dog, a retriever, to enter and wash himself.

Besides, even if the water were undisturbed, who could expect to find in such a place trout large enough to be worth taking? The area of the pool was considerable, about an acre; but the depth was small, apparently not more on the average than a foot and a half. From the place at which the car stopped one could see to the bottom of the water all the way to the other side.

It is much deeper, however, on the down side, which has a long embankment; and the depth there, gradually lessening, extends for a good many yards outwards. Here, by the side of the overflow, my friends were putting up their rods while I was still marvelling in unbelief.

Lo! each of them had a fish on at or about the first cast! From the vigor with which the fish were fighting, it was evident that they were trout of no mean weights. One of them turned out to be just over, and the other just under 1 lb. Both were carefully unhooked and put back into the water. When I expressed astonishment at this, my friends explained that they had been bidden to take no more than six trout; that the pool held very large fish, fish of 5 lbs., or even more; and that, of course, as they would catch many and were allowed to keep so few, they could not think of basketing any which were under 3 lbs!

My friends were not talking lightly. They were quite in earnest. I was greatly astonished. Had I chanced upon some remnant of the land of Lilliput? Then an account by Mr. Froude of a day's fishing in Hampshire wandered into memory. The stream to which the historian had been taken was so choked with weeds that, at first sight of it, he thought he was being fooled; but at the end of the day his basket had been extraordinarily heavy. It was clear, I began to perceive, that the waters of this picturesque county had very strange capacities. . . . Whirr! My friend had another on. It had risen whenever his tackle had been put in ply again. Being only about one pound it was returned.

To cut short a story which was long in incident, though brief in time, let it be stated that this extraordinarily brisk sport went on uninterruptedly until five o'clock, when, at the wish of the lady, we went to the village inn for tea. Fish had been landed at the rate of one to each three minutes; they included an American char. Only one, a trout of about 1⅓ lb., caught just before tea-time, had been kept. "If the large ones had been going to rise," my friend explained, "we should, I think, have seen something of them by this time. Of course we must take our six, you see—the six best we can catch."

He had been proceeding, it soon appeared, with too much assurance. When we were back from the inn the trout showed no eagerness to rise. Indeed, they were not rising at all. Quite unmistakably they were "off." For an hour the two anglers diligently whipped the pool in vain. Now and then I saw a trout shying at a fly; but never a trout touched. It was half-past six o'clock, and we had to leave at ten minutes past seven. What was to be done? An anti-climax had overtaken us. Distinctly humiliating was the prospect of having to leave the pool with only one trout instead of six.

Just then midges came out upon the water; and in a minute or so the trout came after them, making dimples on the still pool. Could we hope to take five sizeable trout by means of midges in half-an-hour? Midges, it had to be remembered, are mounted on very fine gut, gut too thin to stand much strain. Any trout that might take one of them could not be hustled ashore so quickly as those of the afternoon had been. Then, what if a five-pounder should rise? That, which had been the eager and assured hope of the afternoon, was now an event to be dreaded! He would consume our remaining time, and probably win free after all. Better five one-pound trout in the basket than one five-pounder lured and lost!

Well, it was a very narrow business; but we managed it. A trout came on just as the village clock was striking seven. The midges had won the trick. We had reduced our standard from 3 lb. to 1 lb., and this trout was the last of the lacking five. Our basket would have been considerably heavier had we been less ambitious before tea-time. It was just under 7 lbs.

Perhaps the most astonishing thing about these brisk proceedings was that the dry-fly had no share in them. Only a few days ago a London newspaper said: "In America, as in Scotland, the dry-fly may never be a necessity. South of the Thames it certainly is so. . . Week in, week out, it has been found to be the most killing method." Indeed, it is a rooted belief among anglers at large that in the country of the chalk-streams wet flies are useless. What are we to make of this in conjunction with the fact that in the heart of the dry-fly region, all our very abundant trout took flies which were the wettest of the wet? Apart from the midges, which were wingless hackles, the successful lures were Stone Flies, Greenwell's Glories, and Melhuish's Fancies, imported from the wild Highlands of Scotland. Why were they not dismal failures? My friend has a theory. "Perhaps you noticed," he says, "that until the midges came out there was not a fly of any kind to be seen on the water. That does not mean that there were no flies under the surface. There must have been many flies there—insects just hatched out. The trout were feeding on them as they were struggling towards the air. That is why our wet flies were successful. As a matter of fact, trout feed on insects which are rising through the water, from the weeds and stones and mud at the bottom, much more often than they feed on insects which have reached the surface." H.

Short Studies.

THE PRISONER.

On a fine day of early summer in a London garden, before the birds had lost their Spring song, or the pear-trees dropped their last blossom, our friend said suddenly:—

"Why! there's a goldfinch!" Blackbirds there were, thrushes, and tits in plenty, an owl at night, and a Christopher Columbus of a cuckoo, who solemnly, once a year, mistook this green island of trees for the main lands of Kent and Surrey, but a goldfinch—never! "I hear it—over there!" and, getting up, he walked towards the house.

When he came back, our friend sat down again, and said:—

"I didn't know that you kept a cage-bird!" We admitted that the cook had a canary.

"A mule!" he remarked, shortly.

There was silence. Some strong feeling had been aroused that neither of us could understand.

Suddenly he burst out:

"I can't bear things in cages; animals, birds, or men. I hate to see or think of them." And looking at us angrily, as though we had taken an advantage in drawing from him this confession, he went on quickly:—

"I was staying in a German town some years ago, with a friend who was making enquiries into social matters. He asked me one day to go over a prison with him. I had never seen one, then, and I agreed. It was just such a day as this—perfectly clear sky, and with that cool, dancing sparkle on everything that you only see in some parts of Germany. This prison, which stood in the middle of the town, was one of those, shaped like a star, that have been built over there on the plan of Pentonville. The system, they told us, was the same that you might have seen working here many years ago. The Germans were then, and still, no doubt, are, infatuated with the idea of muring their prisoners up in complete solitude. But it was a new toy to them then, and they were playing with it with that sort of fanatical thoroughness which the Germans give to everything they take up. I don't want to describe this prison, or what we saw in it; as far as an institution run on such dreadful lines can be, it was, I daresay, humane; the Governor, at all events, impressed me favorably. I'll simply tell you of the one thing which I shall never forget, because it symbolised to me for ever the caging of all creatures, animal or human, great or small."

Our friend paused; then, with an added irritation in his voice, as though aware of doing violence to his natural reserve, he went on:—

"We had been all over the grizzly place, when the Governor asked my friend whether he would like to see one or two of the 'life' prisoners.

"'I will show you one,' he said, 'who has been here twenty-seven years. He is, you will understand'—I remember his very words—'a little worn by his long confinement.' While we were going towards this prisoner's cell they told us his story. He had been a cabinet-maker's assistant, and, still quite a boy, became infatuated with the wife of his own employer. One night, being surprised at a stolen meeting with his inamorata, he blindly struck out and killed the husband on the spot. He was sentenced to death, but, on the intervention of some Royalty who had been upset by the sight of corpses, I believe at the battle of Sadowa, his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life.

"When we entered his cell he was standing perfectly still, gazing at his work. He looked quite sixty, though he couldn't have been more than forty-six—a bent, trembling ruin of a figure, covered by a drab-colored apron. His face had the mealy hue and texture, as it were, of all prisoners' faces. He seemed to have no features; his cheeks were hollow; his eyes large, but, looking back, I can't remember their color—if, indeed, they had any color at all. As we passed in, one by one, through the iron door, he took off his round cap, drab-colored too, like everything about him, showing his dusty, nearly-bald head, with a few short grey hairs on end, and stood in an attitude of 'attention,' humbly staring at us. He was like an owl surprised by daylight. Have you ever seen a little child ill for the first time—full of bewilderment at its own suffering? His face was like that, but so extraordinarily gentle! We had seen many of the prisoners, and he was the only one that had that awful gentleness. The sound of his voice, too: 'Ja, Herr Direktor—nein, Herr Direktor!' soft and despairing—I remember it now—there was not a breath of will-power left." Our friend paused, frowning in his effort to recreate the scene. "He held in his hand," he went on presently, "a sheet of stiff paper, on which he had been transcribing the New Testament in letters from a code of writing for the deaf and dumb. When he passed his thin fingers over the type to show us how easily the deaf and dumb could read it, you could see that his hands were dusty like a miller's. There was nothing in the cell to produce that dust, and in my belief it was not dust on his hands, but some excretion from that human plant running to seed; when he held the sheet of paper up it trembled like a moth's wing. One of us asked him who invented the system he was working at, mentioning some name or other. 'Nein, nein,' he said, and stood shivering with eagerness to recollect the right name. At last he drooped his head, and mumbled out: 'Ah, Herr Direktor, ich kann nicht!' But all of a sudden the name came bursting from his lips. At that moment, for the first time, he actually looked like a man. I never before then realised the value of freedom; the real meaning of our relations with other human beings; the necessity for the mind's being burnished from minute to minute by sights and sounds, by the need for remembering and using what we remember. This fellow had no use, you see, for memory in his life; he was like a plant placed where no dew can possibly fall on it. To watch that look pass over his face at the mere remembrance of a name was like catching sight of a tiny scrap of green leaf left in the heart of a withered shrub. Man is really very wonderful—the most enduring creature that has ever been produced!" Our friend rose, and began pacing up and down. "His world was not a large one; about fourteen feet by eight. He'd lived in it for twenty-seven years, without a mouse even for his friend. They do things thoroughly in prisons. Think of the tremendous vital force that must go to the making of the human organism, for a man to live through that. . . What do you imagine," he went on, turning to us suddenly, "kept even a remnant of his reason alive? You don't know? While we were still looking at his 'deaf and dumb' writing, he suddenly handed us a piece of wood about the size of a large photograph—the painting of a young girl, seated in the very centre of a garden, with bright-colored flowers in her hand; in the background was a narrow, twisting stream with some rushes, and a queer bird, rather like a raven, standing on the bank. And by the side of the girl a tree with large hanging fruits, strangely symmetrical, unlike any tree that ever grew, yet with something in it that is in all trees, a look as if they had spirits, and were the friends of man. The girl was staring straight at us with perfectly round, blue eyes, and the flowers she held in her hand seemed also to stare at us. The whole picture, it appeared to me, was full of—what shall I say?—a kind of wonder. It had all the crude color and drawing of an Early Italian painting, the same look of difficulty conquered by sheer devotion. One of us asked him if he had learnt to draw before his imprisonment; but the poor fellow misunderstood the question. "Nein, nein," he said, "the Herr Direktor knows I had no model. It is a fancy picture!" The smile he gave us would have made a devil weep! He had put into that picture all that his soul longed for—woman, flowers, birds, trees, blue sky, running water; and all the wonder of his spirit that he was cut off from them. He had been at work on it, they said, for eighteen years, destroying and repeating, until he had produced this hundredth version.

It was a masterpiece. There he had been, condemned for life to this living death—without scent, sight, hearing, or touch of any natural object, without even the memory of them, evolving from his starved soul this vision of a young girl with eyes full of wonder, and flowers in her hand. It's the greatest triumph of the human spirit, and the greatest testimony to the power of Art that I have ever seen." Our friend uttered a short, sharp laugh: "So thick-skinned, however, is a man's mind that I didn't even then grasp the agony of that man's life. But I did later. I happened to see his eyes as he was trying to answer some question of the Governor's about his health. To my dying day I shall never forget them. They were incarnate tragedy—all those eternities of solitude and silence he had lived through, all the eternities he had still to live through before they buried him in the graveyard outside, were staring out of them. They had more sheer pitiful misery in them than all the eyes put together of all the free men I've ever seen. I couldn't stand the sight of them, and hurried out of the cell. I felt then, and ever since, what they say the Russians feel—for all their lapses into savagery—the sacredness of suffering. I felt that we ought all of us to have bowed down before him; that I, though I was free and righteous, was a charlatan and sinner in the face of that living crucifixion. Whatever crime he had committed—I don't care what it was—that poor lost creature had been so sinned against that I was as dirt beneath his feet. When I think of him—there still, for all I know—I feel a sort of frenzy rising in me against my own kind. I feel the miserable aching of all the caged creatures in the world." Our friend turned his head away, and for quite a minute did not speak. "On our way back, I remember," he said at last, "we drove through the Stadt Park. There it was free and light enough; every kind of tree—limes, copper beeches, oaks, sycamores, poplars, birches, and apple trees in blossom, were giving out their scent; every branch and leaf was glistening with happiness. The place was full of birds, the symbols of freedom, fluttering about and singing their loudest in the sun—it was all enchanted ground. And I well remember thinking that in the whole range of Nature only men and spiders torture other creatures in that long-drawn-out kind of way; and only men do it in cold blood to their own species. That—as far as I know—is a fact of natural history; I can tell you that to see, once for all, as I did, in that man's eyes, its unutterable misery, is never to feel the same towards your own kind again. That night I sat in a café window, listening to the music, talk, and laughter, watching the people pass in the street—shop-folk, soldiers, merchants, officials, priests, beggars, aristocrats, women of pleasure, and the light streaming out from the windows, and the leaves just moving against the most wonderful dark blue sky—but I saw and heard nothing of it all—I only saw the gentle, mealy-colored face of that poor fellow, his eyes, and his dusty, trembling hands, and I saw the picture that he had painted there in hell. I've seen it ever since, whenever I see, or hear of any sort of solitary caged creature."

Our friend ceased speaking, and very soon after he rose, excused himself, and went away.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

---

Contemporaries.

LORD ROSEBERY.

"THE Duc de Nivernois," wrote Horace Walpole, "has parts, and writes at the top of the mediocre, but as Madame Geoffrin says, is manqué par tout; guerrier manqué, ambassadeur manqué, homme d'affaires manqué, and auteur manqué—no, he is not homme de naissance manqué." Lord Rosebery has, indeed, enjoyed no such extended opportunities for failure as the Duc de Nivernois, and we are inclined to think that if he had been specially engaged in the sphere of diplomacy he would have been a success. But it is a sign of the genial strain in British public life, and also of its uncritical habit, that a statesman whom neither party owns is accepted as the spokesman of both, and a man whose forte has never been in action should be treated as if he were an authorised and trusted interpreter of Imperial policy. It is still more remarkable, perhaps, that Lord Rosebery accepts with an apparent zest this function of Public Orator to the Empire. At our Universities, indeed, the profound and matured reflections of a like dignitary suffer a little from the extemporised irreverence of the undergraduates. But we still take Lord Rosebery more seriously than he may take himself; and the entertainment offered by an accomplished rhetorician, an adept in the arts of sparkling paradox, is conceived as akin to the utterance of (at least) a Minor Prophet. Lord Rosebery's adaptability, indeed, goes a little deeper than this. A listener to his oration at the White City declared that "different points were applauded at different tables." In this fashion Lord

Rosebery achieves a success which improves while it adapts the model of public speech held up for us by Mr. Pickwick. Mr. Pickwick, it will be remembered, advised his friend always to shout with a crowd, and when there were two crowds, to shout with the largest. Lord Rosebery adds to this advice of wisdom the subtlety of shouting with both, keeping open a wary eye to observe a change in their numerical proportions.

Lord Rosebery is thus, after Lord Northcliffe, the most accomplished practitioner of the business of "giving the public what they want." Does the great heart of the nation mourn? Lord Rosebery is there to mourn with it, and to whisper words of consolation. Is it rather given to the elevation of mood which a prolonged study of the works of Mr. Kipling and the Amalgamated Press is apt to produce? Lord Rosebery's silver lips are at the trumpet's mouthpiece, and the Empire rings with the ensuing blast. The performance on both stops is so skilful and entertaining that both the player and the audience accept it as reality. This habit of emotional exaggeration is so engrained in Lord Rosebery that his gestures as a speaker have almost ceased to correspond with the nature of the argument. Watching Lord Rosebery's upraised arms and solemn, abstracted look, and hearing the rich thrilling intonation of his beautiful voice, it is possible to separate all these appearances from the matter, of which, indeed, they appear to be a somewhat excessive embroidery, and to enjoy them for themselves. But all Englishmen are not art critics, and our Colonial friends necessarily know less of Lord Rosebery than his countrymen. There is a well-known and very witty member of the House of Commons who now and then surprises it by the needless length of his orations. To his friends he explains and apologises for this arbitrary prolixity by saying that he finds a sedentary life in the House of Commons unhealthy, and that he wants exercise. Lord Rosebery's addresses possess something of this half-conscious imitation of Sandow and the Swedish drill system. But our children and our neighbors take no such discount from his utterances, and the country suffers because one of its most brilliant sons is better able to amuse it and himself than to offer it the guidance of thoughtful, sincere, and unaffected speech.

It was a sport of Nature to give Lord Rosebery personality, imagination, and charm, and deny him the capacity to use these gifts in any kind of steady service. Thus, while he stands outside the whole method of British Government, and is a detached and fastidious critic of all Ministries, his impressionist sketches of Empire lack the truthfulness of the thinker and the practical force of the habitual worker. Not a great statesman, and not at all a great writer, Lord Rosebery does not make up in moral force what he lacks in intellectual weight and thoroughness. His conceptions of life are usually as non-moral as his quaint idea, expressed in an essay on Robert Burns, of the ethical usefulness of great men's vices. For human causes, except the cause of Empire, he has, indeed, small interest. It is the play of personality which attracts him. But it is as the artist rather than as the man of action, that he surveys politics, and his aversion from work in concert, his super-sensitive and dilettante spirit, unfit him for all those enterprises and adventures of the Imperial spirit to which he lightly summons his countrymen. Lord Rosebery did not fail as Prime Minister because he was a lord. He failed because he was Lord Rosebery. The British aristocracy, with all its weaknesses, can still produce workers, men of practical talent and achievement. But Life, with a malicious smile, held before this pleasing, but not strong personality, half-a-dozen crowns, gilt rather than gold, at all of which he snatched. He has them and he has nothing else.

For these reasons the personality of Lord Rosebery is singularly unfitted to give the representatives of new and distant democracies a broad and luminous view of our older, more subtly balanced, and variously colored civilisation, least of all of its moral force and direction. He can indeed look behind the play of party, and his graceful humor continually illumines his comment upon it. But his intellectual life is too shallow and too self-centred to reflect the deeper movements of politics, least of all when they invade the kindred sphere of morals. Alone among our public men he is doomed to a life of elegant loitering, from which he emerges, like a rarely seen diva, to flit across the stage and flit back again. Such a choice of life lends itself to sensationalism, and can in the end have no other purpose. Lord Rosebery watches the life of his times with a special eye on its more facile emotional output. This, indeed, he can describe with skill. Alternately pensive and gay, mock-severe and playfully prophetical, our Lucullus issues from one of his palaces to illustrate his own shifting moods and to interpret the emotional flux of the hour. Thus he plays the "game of efficiency" with the zest of an incorrigible amateur, and in golden-mouthed adjurations to other people to be up and doing he will vie with the editor of the "Spectator" himself. "Bless you, my children, be efficient," he waves to us on his rapid way to "The Durdans" or Posilippo. Timid of democracy, though a shrewd student of the "mob mind," he was no less fearful of the Budget which Sir William Harcourt produced during his own Premiership than of the instrument forged by Mr. Lloyd George. His Liberalism, the product of tradition, early association with Gladstone, and a sympathetic personality, is fast fading away, and he doubtless watches for a suitable throb of the national pulse to anathematise Mr. Asquith's administration as he cast off Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's. With the beat of that organ he must in any case be in tune. Mental solitude—the stern retirement from popular vagaries of original and exalted minds—is not for Lord Rosebery. The crowd is essential to him; he inspires it and it inspires him, and by his sweetness of temper, his wit, his love of "chaff," his rapid change of mental view and disconcerting inconsistency, he is at once its child and its master. It is only a misfortune of the shallow criticism of our time that the nature and significance of such gifts should be so mistaken, and a born entertainer of men hailed, even in face of a conclusive experience to the contrary, as a leader of them.

Science.

THE WONDERS OF RADIO-ACTIVITY.

The history of Science is very largely—and in its most striking and important developments—a history of pure accident. Of the many illustrations of the truth of this statement we shall take but a few. A very striking one relates to the discovery of the Leyden jar in 1745 by Cuneus, who, wishing to electrify water, connected a metal rod with an electrical machine, and allowed the rod to dip into the water contained in a vessel which he held in one hand. When he thought that the water was sufficiently charged, he essayed to remove the rod with the other hand, and in consequence received such a staggering shock that he had to drop vessel and all. Musschenbroeck, his colleague, repeated the experiment for himself, and swore that not for the crown of France would he do so again. Thus originated the Leyden jar, the parent and type of electrical condensers which play such a part in our modern science.

Probably the most wonderful story of all relates to the discovery of the developer without which photography would be entirely impossible. Some time before 1839 Daguerre had attempted to get pictures on plates coated with iodide of silver, which was known to be acted upon by light. Many of these plates he exposed for a short time; and, seeing no pictures produced on them, he put them as failures into a dark closet containing various substances in bottles and dishes. On taking out one of "the failures" after a considerable time, he was astonished to see a picture on it, and also pictures on all the others. The result must have been produced by something in the closet. He then formed more "failures" in the same way, and removed all the substances, one by one, out of the closet. Still the pictures came, even when everything (apparently) had been removed. The closet, he thought, must have been bewitched; but, on careful examination, he found a small dish of mercury, which had escaped notice, in a corner of the closet. This was removed—and then no more pictures came on his plates! The vapor of mercury, therefore, was the agent by which the pictures were produced, and hence resulted the notion of a developer—and a new science and art, without which we should now feel that civilised life would be impossible.

It was no accident that led Crookes to construct a glass tube from which almost all the air was removed, in order to study what would take place when he caused an electric stream to flow from one end of the tube to the other in its almost vacuous interior. We knew for many years after the making of the "Crookes tube" that wonderful things take place inside it; but we did not know that still more wonderful effects are produced outside. Probably the first person to get an inkling of one of its most wonderful external effects was Mr. Jervis-Smith of Oxford, who, we believe, made the entry in his note-book, "N.B.—Do not leave a photographic plate near a Crookes tube," while the tube is in action. The leaving of a photographic plate near the tube resulted, as we know, in that wonderful system of photography of the interiors of boxes and of the frames of animals—the seeing of the hidden—produced by the still mysterious Röntgen rays emitted by the tube, but all unsuspected by its illustrious constructor.

The study of phosphorescence has led to another accidental discovery which has rapidly developed into a branch of science the most astounding, and, apparently, the most revolutionary—the new science of Radio-activity.

In a delightful scientific classic, "La Lumière, ses Causes et ses Effets," M. Edmond Becquerel relates the means which he adopted to study the nature of phosphorescence, a property which is commonly believed to be confined to a few bodies, but which is really possessed, even though to a small extent, by almost all. If a body is exposed to light, and the light is suddenly removed, the body will give out light in the dark. Some bodies, like luminous paint, shine for a long time in the dark after exposure; others shine for only a small fraction of a second. Certain compounds of uranium were found to possess remarkable phosphorescent qualities; and one day in the year 1896 M. Becquerel, continuing the study of phosphorescence, placed over a photographic plate, which was wrapped in black paper, a preparation of uranium which, after exposure to light, would become phosphorescent, and might by its phosphorescence act upon the plate through the dark covering, just as Röntgen rays would. The phosphorescence was found to be—or rather thought to be—effective on the plate. On a subsequent day another exposure of the uranium to sunlight was to be made, and the phosphorescence produced in the uranium was again to be applied to a photographic plate; but on this day the sun did not appear, and the uranium was left on the plate in a dark drawer for some weeks. Fortunately, M. Becquerel determined to see if the uranium had acted upon the plate while both were enclosed in the drawer, and the surprising result was found that the plate was acted upon by the uranium without any phosphorescence at all! The uranium, then, must be shooting out something from itself which is able to penetrate obstacles and darken photographic plates; and it does this without any excitation from light, electricity, or any external agent; moreover, the discovery of this strange fact was due to the accidental non-appearance of the sun on a particular day.

The notion that a solid body can be perpetually shooting out something—particles, rays, vibrations or what not—from itself is the fundamental principle of Radio-activity. This principle, apparently so revolutionary, was discovered from the behavior of uranium, and by accident.. The whole story of the investigations and discoveries founded on this observation of M. Becquerel's is told systematically and with great clearness and simplicity by Mr. Soddy, who, in conjunction with Professor Rutherford, has done so much in the latest branch of science, in his recent book, "The Interpretation of Radium,"* which might well be called either "The Wonder of Uranium" or "The Fairy Tale of Matter."

This extraordinary characteristic at once concentrated attention on the metal uranium, and a vast amount of labor was bestowed upon it by M. and Mme. Curie, who derived various bodies from it by chemical processes. Uranium possesses an atom which is heavier than the atom of any other known body. Moreover, it is quite clear that the property of radio-activity—the property of shooting out something—must be possessed by the atom itself.

It is now essential to explain what we mean by an atom of any body. Let us imagine that we ask a logician, a chemist, and a radio-activist (to coin a new word) what he means by this term. They would all agree that an atom of a body is the smallest portion of that body that exists and possesses all the characteristics of the body. But the logician would say that the atom does not consist of parts which have vacant spaces between them—that the atom fills the whole of the space which it occupies; the chemist would say that the atom may consist of parts separated by vacant spaces, but that by no physical process can these parts be torn away from each other—an atom of gold, for example, always remains the same, and so does an atom of uranium and an atom of every body; the radio-activist would say that an atom consists of parts separated by vacant spaces, and that these parts actually fly asunder in the case of uranium, and may possibly do so in all bodies, so that what was once an atom of gold may become quite different in the lapse of ages, and that there are certain bodies whose atoms become different in a few days, or even minutes. Our chemist here is one of the older sort; for chemists like Sir William Ramsay are also radio-activists.

This disintegration of the atom is, at first sight, utterly subversive of the foundations of accepted chemistry, and even of the principles of dynamics; but, strange to say, it does not conflict with either.

Without entering into technical details, we may say that uranium has been proved to pass visibly before us through eleven or twelve successive stages or different substances, each giving out a portion of itself to form a new substance—one of the series being that astonishing substance called radium, which has so enormously increased our conception of the age of the earth, and rendered estimates of the age of the sun and his planets, founded on the previously known facts of science, wholly inadequate. But if we take a piece of uranium which thus produces these successive bodies from itself, we must not imagine that the whole of the uranium is quickly used up in the change. There will be about one-third of the uranium left as uranium even after 7,500 millions of years! Some of the bodies formed in this series are almost wholly used up in changing into new ones in the course of a few days; while that particular one called radium will still have about one-third of itself left as radium after 2,500 years.

Now, we may be asked, what evidence is there that such successive changes are taking place at all? We can not only give the visible evidence but also show that the "shooting out" process—of particles from the atom—consists of the emission, with enormous speeds, of at least two distinct kinds of particles. Among several means of detecting the existence of some kind of disturbance emitted by a body, it will suffice to mention two, with one of which most people are now familiar. One is the phosphorescent screen which is lighted up by the action, or impact, of the Röntgen rays, and exhibits the well-known radiographs; the other is a screen or surface coated on one side with sulphide of zinc. Some of the bodies produced by the successive changes of uranium have the power of causing both of these screens to glow by the disturbance which they emit, while some others of the bodies cause a glow in the second kind of screen, but not in the first. It is clear, therefore, that there must be at least two different kinds of emission from radio-active bodies; and it is proved that one kind consists of veritable particles of electricity, shot out with velocities comparable with that of light, and that the other consists of the emission of particles of the gas called helium, shot out with much smaller velocities—only about 12,000 miles per second! Compared with the first kind of particles, these latter are very massive, and it is to this fact, coupled with their great speed, that we owe the enormous amount of heat produced by the disintegration of the atoms of radium.

* "The Interpretation of Radium." By Frederick Soddy, M.A. Murray.

How inconceivably minute are the quantities of substance involved in this "shooting out" process, and how great the accompanying effects, can be seen by one simple experiment. If merely the point of a needle is inserted for about an hour into a vessel which contains a minute quantity of radium and some of the bodies into which it changes, this needle point will take up enough of radio-active substance to light up both of these screens when it is brought near them. The particles emitted are so excessively minute that even if they could all be collected, a mass capable of measurement by the most delicate chemical balance would not be accumulated for a long time; and hence it is that allowing them to light up a phosphorescent screen by their bombardment is so much more effective in revealing them than any other method; for their excessively small mass is compensated by their tremendous velocities.

What is the end of the process of change reached by our original lump of uranium? Is there any final body into which it is transformed?

Mr. Soddy rather favors the conjecture that the body changes ultimately into lead, which metal is almost invariably found to accompany uranium in the mineral from which it is extracted.

The how of this process of the breaking up of the atoms of uranium and other bodies has been answered by the experimenters: the why remains a mystery which they cannot at present, if at all, solve. The sum of the whole thing seems to be that not permanence but change is the real nature of matter, and that uranium lets out the secret much more effectually than any other kind of matter, because some of its changing states succeed each other so rapidly. But it is truly difficult to see why a universe should have been built up merely for the purpose of being pulled to pieces again.

The whole of this story of Radio-activity, of whose wonders we have not indicated the one-hundredth part, increases enormously our conceptions of the nature and mysteries of Matter, and also enlarges our estimate of the time during which this earth has existed as a solid body. The thirty or fifty millions of years allowed by physicists like Lord Kelvin are a mere negligible quantity compared with the life of uranium: the geologists and biologists have wanted much more time, and Radio-activity has given it to them.

G. M. Minchin.

The Drama.

PLAYS OLD-FASHIONED AND NEW-FANGLED.

It is reassuring to learn that "A Merry Devil" is not Mr. J. B. Fagan's latest work, but has been in existence for two or three years. Had it followed "The Earth," it would have marked a sad slip-back. I do not say that it may not be a success: many worse plays have pleased the public hugely. In humor, as in everything else, tastes differ; and some people may like the type of humor here exemplified. But I find it hard to imagine that it will make a very wide appeal. The merry jest of the "Merry Devil" might have been invented by that legendary Scottish editor who "jocked wi' deeficulty." There is a woeful lack of spontaneity about it.

We are to imagine that a Florentine beauty of the sixteenth century, Geralda by name, is possessed by a mania for practical joking, and a special fondness for exercising it upon her suitors. To one of them, an Italian glutton and bully, she administers certain beverages which produce violent internal qualms, and lead him to believe that he has been poisoned. Then this pleasant sport suggests a further development. One of her adorers is a solemn and chivalrous English knight, Sir Philip Lilley. Him she persuades that she has actually poisoned the bully, and induces, after a sore struggle of conscience, to aid and abet her in disposing of the body, represented for the nonce by the carcase of a wild boar. Not content with privately befooling him, she must needs call half Florence in to witness his discomfiture. At this his patience breaks down, and, tearing a switch from one of the bushes in her garden, he retires behind the scenes to chastise her. One would have imagined that this was the sort of incident she would have kept to herself; but no! she hastens to publish it to all her household. The resuscitated bully waylays Sir Philip, and, with the aid of half a dozen lackeys, binds him hand and foot. In this condition he is handed over to Madonna Geralda, who purposes to horsewhip him with her own fair hands. When it comes to the point, however, she prefers to cut his bonds and fall into his arms, conquered and tamed. Whence we may learn that woman is a froward child, from whom when a devil of naughtiness enters, it can best be exorcised with a cane or a cudgel or—if that be more convenient—with a hobnailed boot.

"Hold!" Mr. Fagan may object, "I said nothing about 'woman,' and had no intention of preaching any such doctrine. I merely depicted, in a quite irresponsible fashion, a humorous incident, illustrative of Anglo-Italian manners in the sixteenth century." To this plea there are several obvious rejoinders. First, you cannot become irresponsible by merely claiming to be so. A playwright must be held to have intended the logical and reasonable deduction from his fable; and when the sympathetic hero thrashes the headstrong heroine and thereby not only wins her heart but produces an evidently beneficial change in her character, we cannot possibly place a time-limit to the efficacy of such methods—we instinctively and inevitably apply to the twentieth century this lesson from the sixteenth. But, granting the plea of irresponsibilty—granting, in other words, that the whole thing is a figment of idle fancy, with no relevance to human life, actual or historical—we then inquire what pleasure we are expected to find in fancying the series of events above outlined? If a fable has no truth and no meaning, surely it must have some sort of beauty or attractiveness to excuse its existence. But where lies the beauty or the whimsicality in conceiving a woman so idiotically enslaved to a perverse habit of practical joking that she has to be cudgelled out of it? Or in imagining a brave, chivalrous, and humane gentleman reduced to the necessity of beating a woman in order to restore her to sanity? Frankly, I take no pleasure, and find no entertainment, in imagining these things, even on the hypothesis that "'tis not so, nor 'twas not so, and God forbid it ever should be so." In "The Taming of the Shrew" we have a veritable piece of sixteenth-century humor, which has a historical interest for us over and above its merit as a piece of gay and spirited buffoonery. We accept Petruchio as an amusing ruffian of a barbarous period, and the whole play as little more than a medieval droll, with some patches of poetry. It is one of the Shakespearean products that we could most easily dispense with: but since it is there, we find what pleasure we can in it. Is that a reason for re-writing it, minus its rollicking gaiety, and plus an infusion of serious sentiment? Sir Philip Lilley is not a Petruchio, but a Don Quixote; yet he does what even Petruchio did not do—he beats his Katharine. Take pleasure in this who can—I cannot.

Every author is liable to mistakes of this sort. He dwells upon an idea until he loses all sense of its true relations and proportions. Especially is this apt to occur when an author whose true bent is towards serious drama determines, at all costs, to be humorous. The mere writing of "A Merry Devil" is pleasant enough, and commendably free from fustian; but otherwise the piece reminded me much less of Shakespeare than of Sheridan Knowles. To my younger readers that name perhaps conveys no meaning. If so, let them rest contented in their ignorance.

Mr. James Hearn's performance of the blind ruffian, Pew, in "Admiral Guinea," at the Afternoon Theatre, was a brilliant and powerful piece of acting, which gives Mr. Hearn a new status in his profession. Always a sound and valuable actor, he now ranks among those to whom we may look for really great things. Otherwise, the revival did very scant justice to the play. Kit French (Mr. Godfrey Tearle) was reasonably good; but Arethusa was sadly uninteresting, and Captain Gaunt was smug, pompous, and conventional, with nothing of the rugged, conscience-stricken fanaticism that belongs to the character. The stage-management, too, did not grapple very successfully with the undoubted difficulties which the piece presents. Stevenson and Henley were not only lacking in practical stage experience, but deliberately adopted a bygone convention —that of the good old nautical melodrama of T. P. Cook and the Surrey Theatre. This play is an outcome of their delight in Skelt's "penny plain, twopence colored" character-sheets. They wrote it, in a word, only half-seriously—it is a pouring of the new wine of style into old bottles of theatrical tradition. Therefore it needs very careful handling to harmonise the strain of parody with the strain of poetry; and this it scarcely received at the Afternoon Theatre.

Mr. Clyde Fitch's drawing-room melodrama, "The Woman in the Case," at the Garrick, is an ordinary piece of none too conscientious theatrical purveying. It promises, at the outset, to be a fairly good detective story; but its solution lacks ingenuity, and even the most ordinary craftsmanship. It is really a little cynical for a man who knows his business, as Mr. Fitch does, to wind up a play with an act only five minutes long, and yet five minutes too long. Miss Violet Vanbrugh's performance of the termagant villainess has been highly praised, and no doubt justly; but, for my part, I admire Miss Vanbrugh so much in characters of natural and gracious womanliness, that it gives me a sort of discomfort to see her imitating, however ably, the manners of a creature like Mr. Fitch's Claire Forster.

"A Modern Aspasia" places Mr. Hamilton Fyfe at one stride among the dramatists who count. It is a singularly well-put-together and well-written play. The dialogue is remarkably supple, natural, and bright, without artificiality. At first it threatened to be too much of a mere discussion on morality—too like the ruthless psychological demonstrations of M. Paul Hervieu, that Euclid among dramatists. But with the second act Mr. Fyfe deserted the paths of pure logic, and the discussion developed into a genuine comedy. There is a slight flaw of construction, I think, in the way in which Muriel learns of her husband's relation to Margaret. When, towards the end of the second act, she goes off "to put her hat straight"—a delightfully natural incident—one does not doubt that she will see her husband's portrait, or some other trace of him, in Margaret's room, and will realise the situation. This is so probable as to be almost inevitable; yet nothing of the sort occurs. In order to bring about the revelation, Margaret has in the third act to make a most improbable visit to the Merediths' house—a visit which would have been natural enough had the truth come out at the end of the second act. This, however, is a slight flaw, if flaw it be. Mr. Fyfe probably felt that a violent scene at the end of the second act would have been too theatrical to harmonise with the general tone of his play. Perhaps so: but in that case I suggest that he ought not to have aroused false expectations by making Muriel do a thing that was almost certain to bring her face to face with the truth. It is possible that this raising and disappointing of an expectation was a conscious subtlety of Mr. Fyfe's technique. If so, I think it was a super-subtlety.

If anything could now amaze us in the conduct of Mr. G. A. Redford, it would be astonishing to find "A Modern Aspasia" licensed. Some people seem to have found the piece inconclusive: to me it seemed as conclusive as the author could make it in favour of the continuance of the arrangement by which Muriel was Edward's wife in name, and the comrade of his intellectual hours, while Margaret was his wife in fact, and the mother of his children. We are accustomed to pleas for greater freedom of divorce; they are no longer regarded as assaults upon morality. But here we have a Bishop who pleads for divorce—for the regularisation of the union which fulfils what he regards as the true end of marriage—only to be ridiculed as an antiquated sentimentalist who had much better let well alone, and leave his godson in undisturbed enjoyment of this dual domesticity! Does not Margaret herself point out that she is much better suited to be Edward's week-end wife than his consort in the eyes of the law and of society? And is this sentiment any the less immoral for being absolutely and undeniably true? Mr. Fyfe's logic can only be rebutted by pointing out that he has chosen very exceptional characters in his Muriel and his Margaret, and that the latter excellent lady, in deciding that she wishes to keep her children to herself, uncontrolled by a legal husband—apparently fails to ask herself the question which ought, after all, to be the determining one—how can she best serve the true and ultimate interests of the children? I must not launch, however, into a discussion of Mr. Fyfe's thesis; I merely wished to point out the flagrant absurdity of vetoing "Blanco Posnet" and licensing "A Modern Aspasia." And the odd thing is that while, from the Redford point of view, Mr. Fyfe's play is flagrantly immoral, it has none of the redeeming grace of frivolity or lubricity. It is a serious discussion of a delicate moral problem—and yet the Censor licenses it!

Miss Lucy Wilson's performance of Margaret was a very able piece of acting, and Mr. Charles Maude, as the sagacious "Bunny," showed himself an original and delightful comedian.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

---

Letters from Abroad.

THE CRETAN PROBLEM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Diplomatists still argue about Crete as though the island presented an insoluble problem. Those who have taken the trouble to visit Crete, as I have just done, know well that there is no longer any real problem to solve. Since 1896 the island has been emancipated from Turkish domination by the joint action of its inhabitants and Europe. Since last October it has been a part of the Hellenic Kingdom, by the decision of nine-tenths of the inhabitants, and with the tacit consent of the Powers, whose representatives on the spot have continued their official relations with the provisional Government set up by the Cretans, thereby giving to the new régime their implicit recognition. At this hour the Hellenic flag floats over all the public buildings, order is maintained by a militia and a gendarmerie under Hellenic officers, and the whole administration is carried on in the name of King George. When the remnant of the international troops is withdrawn next July the island will automatically be left under Hellenic rule.

Wherein, then, lies the problem? Simply in this: the Mohammedan minority in the island (30,000 out of 300,000) dislikes the idea of fusion into the Hellenic Kingdom, and this feeling is exploited by a section of Young Turk politicians at Constantinople, who are encouraged in their attitude by certain Western circles apparently anxious to earn the favor of Young Turkey at other people's expense.

I inquired into the grounds upon which local Mohammedan opposition rests, and the reply was: "We prefer the Turkish rule because, although we are Greeks of blood and speech, we are Turks by sentiment." I asked them what material grievances they had. They could think of none. From 1896 till now their lives, their property, their religious prejudices and their political rights have been scrupulously respected by their Christian fellow-citizens—nay, as regards representation in the Chamber and posts in the Government service, I found them enjoying privileges denied to the latter. Their opposition resolved itself into a caste objection to being treated as equals in a country where they had for generations acted as superiors, and into a sentimental aversion from seeing the crescent supplanted permanently by the cross. Now this is an attitude eminently human, and therefore entitled to respect; but, I think, its political significance can easily be overrated when one considers that the people who maintain it have prospered under the cross as they had never prospered under the crescent, and that they form only one-tenth of the population.

What about the other nine-tenths? I found them unanimous in favor of fusion with Greece. That is the ideal for which they fought ten times during the last century, and for which they are again prepared to risk all. I suggested to them that complete independence might be sufficient. They scouted the suggestion without hesitation. "Independence," they said, "would be a gift that is no gift (δῶρον ἄδωρον). We have time and again risen against fearful odds, not for independence, but for union with our mother country." Besides, they pointed out, Crete is neither big enough nor rich enough to go her own way. Independence would mean a separate administration, a separate army and navy, a separate diplomatic service, and all those luxuries which would absorb the slender resources of the island—resources that are urgently needed for the construction of roads, the afforestation of mountains, the development of agriculture, the promotion of education, and the thousand and one practical improvements wanted by a country just awakening to civilisation. Thus, sentiment apart, even from a purely material point of view, the only solution that commends itself to the overwhelming Christian majority is union with Greece.

So far concerning the respective attitudes of the two local elements. Now a few words as to the politicians of Constantinople. Among sensible Turks I have found a sane recognition of the fact that Crete ceased to form part of the Ottoman Empire on the day on which the Turkish troops left the island and the Sultan's flag was relegated to an uninhabited rock off the Cretan coast. But, unfortunately, all Turks are not sensible. There is in Constantinople a party of aggressive young patriots, represented in the press by the newspaper "Tanin," who declare that the formal severance of Crete from the Ottoman Empire would be the beginning of the dismemberment of Turkey, that they would far rather go to war with Greece than acquiesce in the loss of Crete, and that, even if pecuniary compensation were offered to them, they would refuse to sell their country's prestige for money. It is hard to believe that the men who utter these opinions can seriously hold them. In the first place the formal severance of Crete is an infinitely less serious matter for the Ottoman Empire than was the loss of Bosnia and Eastern Roumelia. In the former province the Mohammedan element represents 600,000 souls out of a total population of 1,600,000; in the latter not only was there a very considerable Mohammedan population, but the Sultan possessed solid rights of tribute. In Crete the Mohammedan element is numerically insignificant and the only visible vestige of the Sultan's authority consists in a small red flag idly floating on a desert rock. In the circumstances, any pecuniary compensation that Turkey might get for resigning her nominal suzerainty over the island would be a very real and, in the present state of the Turkish treasury, a most welcome gain. But even supposing that it was worth Turkey's while to go to war with Greece about Crete, it is impossible to believe that responsible Turkish statesmen can contemplate with equanimity such an adventure in the actual condition of their country. The Ottoman Empire at this moment may be compared to an edifice resting on straws; the slightest commotion from within or from without would inevitably cause its collapse. It is all very well to talk of the recent triumph of the Young Turks; but those who witnessed that triumph a few weeks ago, as I did, need not be told that it was skill, assisted by luck, rather than inherent strength, that brought it about. The Liberals by conviction can easily be counted, the Turkish masses care nothing for the Constitution, and in the masses I include the vast majority of the very troops that have been utilised to establish it. Before the Young Turks can feel safe they will have to educate their co-religionists in liberty, and that education needs years of labor and tranquillity.

In addition to the danger of reaction, always present in the Turkish population, there are the Arabs and the Albanians—two races proud of their national individuality and actually fighting for their independence. Is it to be conceived that the Young Turks will embark on a profitless and purposeless foreign campaign when they see these domestic foes ready to seize the opportunity for splitting up the Empire? To the Arabian and Albanian perils must be added the Macedonian. Macedonia remains in a state of suspended anarchy. All the bands—Bulgarian, Servian, Greek, Turkish—are there armed and ready for action at a moment's notice. Would they maintain this hollow truce once war began? But these considerations, formidable though they be, do not exhaust the burden of responsibility that weighs on the shoulders of serious Turkish statesmen. On the northern frontiers of Turkey—within easy reach of Salonica and Constantinople—there are two efficient armies belonging to Powers neither of which has anything to gain by the consolidation of the Ottoman Empire. Bulgaria sold her neutrality to Turkey during the last Greco-Turkish war in return for ecclesiastical privileges in Macedonia. Now there are no more bishoprics to be had, and Bulgaria might well consider that an invasion of Macedonia would be the more profitable policy on an emergency. On the other side Austria stands with an enormous military force, ostensibly massed to intimidate the Serbs, but, though the Servian trouble is over, not yet disbanded. I happened to be crossing the Montenegrin frontier two days after the settlement of the quarrel with the Principality, and, instead of seeing the Austrians relaxing their military activity, I found their warships practising their new quick-firing guns in the Bocche di Cattaro. I went on to Bosnia, and, although all danger of trouble there also was over, I found the garrison of Sarajevo engaged in grand manœuvres. What is the meaning of all this?

At the very best, a successful war against Greece, though it might be attended by no complications, internal or external, would alienate for ever the sympathies of the large Greek population of Turkey from the Young Turks, and without Greek sympathy and cooperation the Turkish Constitution cannot hope to succeed. But it needs exceptionally vigorous optimism to expect that a Greco-Turkish war at this hour would be unattended by such complications as I have indicated above. On the contrary, everything goes to show that hostilities in one part of the Balkan Peninsula would raise a storm the dimensions of which no man could predict in advance, and no statesman—least of all a Turkish statesman—could contemplate with equanimity. Those who encourage young Turkish patriots in their unreasonable attitude towards the Cretan problem are doing an exceedingly unfriendly service to Turkey herself in the first place, and to the peace of Europe afterwards. It would be a far safer and saner occupation for them to advise the Young Turks to come to terms with the Cretans at once and, turning away from dangerous illusions, to grapple with realities, however disagreeable. One of these realities is that Crete is already Greek.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR CRETAN CORRESPONDENT.

June 10th, 1909.

Communications.

THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE LICENSING OF PLAYS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a letter to the "Times" of May 29th, Mr. George Bernard Shaw, evidently smarting under the refusal of the Lord Chamberlain to license a play of his, lays the blame of its being prohibited, personally and immediately, on the King.

(1) "The Lord Chamberlain and Mr. Redford"—(of whom he speaks as the "Censor")—"act simply as others of the King's household."

(2) " . . . in the days of Shakespeare and his predecessors players could escape being classed as rogues and vagabonds only by procuring permission to attach themselves to the household of some nobleman, or of the reigning monarch."

(3) "We are bound . . . to assume technically that this prejudiced person is no other than the King."

Let us consider these statements in detail.

No. 2. The Act of 1572 (14 Elizabeth, cap. 5) is manifestly that relied on by Mr. Shaw for his statement; for it is the first Act in which players as such may, under certain circumstances, be deemed vagabonds—neither theatres nor authors are mentioned in it at all. Indeed, this is the first time in any Act in which players were mentioned in any way which could be considered lowering to their dignity. The only previous mentions of them were in the sumptuary laws of Edward IV. and Henry VIII., in which they "in their interludes" were exempt from the penalties for wearing apparel not allowed to their degree. This statute was simply a re-enactment—with enlargements—of the Vagrant Laws from the time of Edward III. down, and applied not merely to players, but to all persons travelling without licence or other guarantee of their personal propriety—a condition necessary by the economic conditions of the time. It was only by an Act (Vagrant) of 1713 (12 Anne, cap. 26) that players, whilst under normal conditions, were deemed vagabonds. This Act was superseded by another in 1737.

It was not till the passing of this last Act (10 George II., cap. 28), that "Actors, Theatres, and Authors" as such, came into control. And even in that Act the vagrant aspect is only conditional. Clause 1 of that Act only applies to such persons as "shall not have any legal settlement in the place." Clause 2 relates to the unauthorised performance of plays, "Any person, having or not having a legal settlement," playing without license or authority, shall be liable to fine. These clauses are in no way contradictory. The first brings an actor without legal settlement within the penalising Vagrant Statute of 1713; the second necessitates specific licence or authority to play. Clause 3 of this Act is the one which applies to what Mr. Shaw calls the "Censor." It runs as follows:—

"No one shall act or cause to be acted . . . any new play or part, &c." . . . "unless a true copy thereof be sent to the Lord Chamberlain of the King's Household fourteen days before acting, with an account of the play house or other place where . . . and the time to be first acted . . . signed by the master . . . manager, or one of them . . . of such playhouse, place, or company."

This Act, with an enlargment in 1787, controlled theatrical matters down to 1843 when the existing Act (6 and 7 Victoria, cap. 68) was passed.

In his evidence given before the Select Committee on Theatrical Licences and Regulations, 1866, the Hon. Sir Spencer Ponsonby-Fane, then Mr. Spencer Ponsonby, said: "The Lord Chamberlain's authority over theatres . . . in early times was, no doubt, derived from the Royal prerogative. This is clear from the fact that no Act of Parliament, previous to 10 George II., cap. 28, alludes to his licensing powers, though he was certainly exercising them." So that we may take it that whatever statutory power was given to the Lord Chamberlain by the Act of 1843 was given by the legislature of the time in full knowledge of the historical facts.

In 1832, eleven years before the passing of the above Act, there had been appointed a Select Committee to report on "Dramatic Literature and Dramatic Entertainments." And it was largely on this report that the Act of 1843 was formed, its main lines following the Act of 1737. Many of its clauses were simply modifications of clauses of the earlier Act.

In the report of 1832 the word "Censor" is used (erroneously) for "Examiner." Such description was not officially accepted, as shown in Sir Spencer Ponsonby-Fane's answer to a question by the Chairman of the day in the Commission of 1866:—

"What do you call it (the 'Censorship')"?—"The examination of plays." The accuracy of this time-honored name is borne out by an item on the Revels account book of 1579: "Charges for examynynge . . . of dyvers playes . . ."

From the above it may be understood how incorrectly Mr. Shaw speaks when he says that "the Lord Chamberlain and the Examiner of Plays act simply as others of the King's Household." The Lord Chamberlain is a high official. The office was a principal one of State in the thirteenth century. In 1406 Parliament declared that he should always be a member of the Council ex officio. He is chosen for high social position; and as he regulates most of the Court ceremonials, it is necessary that he be a man of tact and discretion, as well as of aptitude and experience. How such an one can properly be classed with minor officials, perhaps with servants, it behoves Mr. Shaw to explain. He has a duty with regard to the Examiner of Plays, which is thus spoken of in the report of 1832:—

> "It should be clearly understood that the office of the Censor is held at the discretion of the Lord Chamberlain, whose duty it would be to remove him, should there be any just ground for dissatisfaction as to the exercise of his functions."

As to these functions much information is given in the report of 1832. The office of Examiner of Plays is regulated by old custom, and is formally signified. In an appendix to the Report the form of appointment is given; and fuller information regarding it may be found in the answers to various questions given by the then Examiner, Mr. George Colman, and his temporary deputy, Mr. Payne Collier.

In another letter to "The Times" (June 4th) Mr. Shaw asks to be told "how a certain Mr. George Alexander Redford" who "levies a play tax . . . and carries on his operations at St. James's Palace, can be prevented from compromising the Crown . . . and causing the public to believe that his conviction that I am a blackguard and a blasphemer is the King's conviction." The former part of this query may be answered generally.

The King, by custom, on the recommendation of his Prime Minister, appoints the Lord Chamberlain. By statutory authority, on the latter is placed the duty of governing theatres and examining plays. For this latter purpose he appoints an Examiner of Plays, who holds office until the next Succession. This official is in his way a judge in certain matters, and is to be accepted in these matters as having a judge's responsibility. Should he fail in essence, the remedy is shown in the Report of 1832. The fees were regulated after the passing of the Act of 1737 and were made statutory in the existing Act of 1843 (Clause XIII). That there can be no doubt as to the intention of the fee being a "reading" and not a "licensing" fee, is shown by the last sub-sentence of the clause: "And the said period of seven days shall not begin to run in any case until the said fee shall have been paid to the Lord Chamberlain," &c.

As to whether the King does or does not agree in the Examiner's estimate of Mr. Shaw's submitted work (or for that matter of Mr. Shaw himself or his good taste) it is not for any third person to speak. But Mr. Shaw will do well before attacking any person of responsibility—even the King—to consider carefully the records of historical facts, which in this enlightened age are easily accessible.—Yours, &c.,

BRAM STOKER.

June 8th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Bram Stoker's long letter and can gather nothing from it except that Mr. Stoker, being my fellow-countryman, feels himself irresistibly impelled to contradict me. Ever since 1544, when King Henry VIII. appointed a Master of Plays, Revels, and Masks, that official, though his name has been changed, has wielded the Royal power autocratically over theatres, players, and playwrights. The series of Acts of Parliament cited by Mr. Stoker have not abrogated that power; on the contrary, they have confirmed it without introducing a single constitutional safeguard against its abuse. It is true that the appointment of Lord Chamberlain is a political one, like many posts in the Royal Household. If the Government is defeated at the next election Lord Althorpe will be replaced by a Conservative Lord Chamberlain, though Mr. Redford will remain during the King's pleasure. But anybody who says or implies that the change of Lord Chamberlains will mean a change of censorial policy, or that any question of such policy ever comes before the electorate or in any really effective way before Parliament, or that the Lord Chamberlain and Mr. Redford have anybody's pleasure to consider except their own and the King's, is talking or implying manifest blazing nonsense.

As to how far the King personally interferes, I can say nothing, as I do not enjoy that privilege of personal intimate conversance with his Majesty which is apparently enjoyed by the many gentlemen who are at present giving the public their assurances on this point. Most of these favored gentlemen are agreed that the King is an entirely negligible person who takes no interest in the enormously important department of public morals and fine art represented by the theatre, and who neither knows nor cares whether the officers of his Household are maintaining the dignity and serviceableness of the Throne or not. And they seem to believe that in putting forward this view they are giving a touching proof of loyalty which the King cannot but contrast, greatly to their advantage, with my view of the matter. Even in the House of Commons, gentlemen who have blocked Mr. Harcourt's Bill have allowed this construction to be put on their action without protest. I can only say that I wish these gentlemen all the Royal honors and favors they aspire to, though I do not think they will get them. Neither by conviction nor nationality am I a royalist; but at least I have a strong sense that the King is a gentleman occupying a responsible public position, and, as such, is entitled to be taken with entire seriousness and treated with entire respect. I am sorry that this view finds so little acceptance in the very quarters where I should have expected it to be a matter of course.—Yours, &c.,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

10, Adelphi Terrace,
London, W.C.
June 9th, 1909.

---

Letters to the Editor.

SOUTH AFRICA AND THE COLOR QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I ask you to use your influence, and your readers to use their influence, in the direction of securing equal franchise and citizen rights for all civilised men in South Africa, of whatever race or color. The situation at present is this: The Draft Constitution, as finally approved by the National Convention, interferes with the franchise rights of the colored people and civilised natives in various unjust ways, but in one way which is particularly odious. By restricting membership of Parliament to citizens of "European descent," it excludes all colored people and civilised natives from being elected to Parliament, however capable they may be. (Some of these are doctors, lawyers, ministers, teachers, &c.) It thus strikes at the root of the fundamental principle of citizenship, and, as many of us believe, of Christianity. English readers will realise the meaning of this unjust proviso when I say that nearly all the rough work in the material development of South Africa—the thousands of miles of roads, railways, streets, telegraphs, and the vast developments in the mining and agricultural industries—has been done mainly by native and colored labor. The colored people are, truly, the "laboring classes" of South Africa, yet they are to be denied effective representation. Many of the Convention delegates themselves admit that this proviso is a "blot" on the Constitution. I therefore appeal to all friends of justice, of whatever party, in the British Parliament, to try to secure the removal of this color disability by the deletion of sub-sections 25 (d) and 44 (c) from the Draft Constitution, i.e., the sub-sections which impose a (European) racial qualification for a seat in Parliament. This can easily be done without imperilling the cause of Union. I may say that the heads of all the principal English-speaking churches here have petitioned the Convention to this effect, and many of the Dutch ministers are also opposed to the color-line, so that it is only the more backward part of the white population which has forced the color-line into the Constitution.

To those who would object that this appeal to the Imperial Parliament is an interference with the principles of self-government, I may say that the Constitution itself explicitly recognises the supremacy and protective powers of the Imperial Government, as several important clauses in the Constitution, embracing white franchise rights, are entrenched behind the Imperial veto. Why, then, should not the civilised natives' and colored peoples' franchise rights, including the right to represent their fellows in Parliament, be so protected? Those who make this objection can hardly have realised the full meaning of the word "Imperial," either in its ancient or modern sense. Personally, I dislike the word, but one must recognise the thing for which it stands. The Imperial Government spends hundreds of thousands of pounds annually in South Africa, and if native troubles occur it may be called upon to spend millions. Again, self-government surely applies only to those who are granted the rights of self-government. But by the unjust proviso in the Draft Constitution the colored people and civilised natives are denied these full citizen rights. To whom, then, must they appeal, if not to the Imperial Government?

I may say, in conclusion, that no new or extended franchise rights are being asked for—only the protection of existing rights—the right of all civilised men, of whatever race or color, to full citizenship, including, of course, the right to represent their fellow-citizens in Parliament. It is therefore with full confidence that I appeal to the readers of THE NATION.—Yours, &c.,

R. BALMFORTH.

Cape Town, May 16th, 1909.

P.S.—It is all the more necessary that white people should defend the franchise rights of the colored people, as many of the latter are employed by white men who are opposed to the color franchise, and consequently many colored people dare not agitate on the question.—R. B.

---

THE INCORRIGIBLE CENSOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While not greatly inclined to criticise the action of the Censor in banning "Blanco Posnet," I feel strongly that the blunt expression of a rough man's mistaken thought about God, however shocking to the religious mind, cannot possibly do the harm which plays that make black white—or, as your article says, "glorify lightmindedness"—must do. To call evil good is far worse blasphemy than to misconceive the character of the Divine Being. Blanco's experiences had not led him to accept, with "S," the New Testament conception of God as a Heavenly Father. Misapprehending God's character, he refuses to speak of Him with reverence and respect. Blanco, we say, is a bad man.

But badness and goodness are only relative. He is a drunkard and a horse thief, but he possesses sincerity and a heart. Another man against whose conduct nothing can be alleged, who may be both respected and worthy of respect, may yet lack in some degree one or both of these very necessary possessions. We can contrast bad Blanco with a man who was certainly good—Tertullian, one of the fathers of that Church whose Founder has given us the conception of God as Father. Tertullian believed that God consigned unbaptised infants to hell. The marvel is that, believing this awful blasphemy, Tertullian continued to worship the being whom he credited with such malignant cruelty.

Surely in worshipping something that was utterly unlike God, he did the real God a greater wrong than does blunt-spoken Blanco. Blanco's blasphemy, whether it is advisable to permit such language on the stage or not, is a comparatively venial offence. I do not imagine it would greatly trouble his Maker or need therefore greatly trouble us. It is not the sin against the Holy Ghost: he does not call bad good. Being sincere he will find the light. But it would never do to put Tertullian on the stage!—Yours, &c.,

D. R.

June 8th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with the greatest interest the article under this heading in THE NATION of the 29th ultimo and also Mr. Bernard Shaw's and Mr. Fagan's letters in "The Times" during the current week.

It is surely a ludicrous anachronism—if, indeed, such a thing as a Censorship ever was in accord with the times in England—that the taste of the public should be commanded, the feelings, or possible feelings, of adults protected for them by any one irresponsible person, be he King Edward VII. or Mr. Redford. It is true, as Mr. C. E. Maurice says in to-day's issue of THE NATION, we can less easily leave a theatre than throw aside a book, but we can always hiss; furthermore, this enforced suspension of judgment may be a disguised blessing, and, by the fall of the curtain, we may find that it has been good for us to have been there, notwithstanding, perchance, that our corns have received a kick or two. The real question is the moral worth of a tragedy. I, of course, use the word as connoting a play which treats thoughtfully and sincerely a theme of wide human interest, whether the end be happy or the reverse. The incidental shock of the unexpected in treatment is immaterial.

Vulgarly speaking, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Let the public be its own censor—coming for second helps and recommending it to other guests at the tavern of life, or leave it alone and advising others to do the same. How many excellent plays have survived and flourished notwithstanding the condemnation of the Press? How many have lived by the will of the people? What, however, is the proof of the pudding—the moral worth of a tragedy? I take it to be, in the words of Mr. W. L. Courtney, whether a play oppresses or does not oppress "human vitality." "A work," he says, "which depresses human vitality sins against humanity." The sole test of this is with the people themselves. If the spectators leave the theatre feeling disheartened, feeling that God is too far away in His heaven and all is wrong with the world, the play which thus croaks to them, is self-condemned. A healthy vigorous nation will not tolerate morbid pessimism; it is not the pudding that matters so much as the state of the public's digestion. Did the popular playwrights of all time, the playwrights who are never forgotten, who will never die—Æschylus, Euripides, Shakespeare—even for a moment despair of mankind; ever tell us that justice, mercy, and liberty were dead; that there was no hope for the world, no good as the final goal of all? Mrs. Grundy, we know, took offence with Euripides; she probably pursed her lips at the Prometheus, and may have shivered now and then at Shakespeare; her prejudices may yet be ruffled by some breach of etiquette towards the Deity, high society, the young person; but even Mrs. Grundy moves on—even Mrs. Grundy can be educated.

In the meanwhile, let us hiss and clap and write to the papers; let us publicly prosecute Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Granville Barker—taking the risk of being laughed at through the ages for so doing—even as they prosecuted Euripides and Sokrates, but let us not hit in the dark, in the dark even to ourselves; let us be sure of what we are silencing. Both writers and spectators, both authors and readers go to make the public—let them co-operate, co-educate, and be free.—Yours, &c.,

ISOBEL HECHT.

FitzRoy Lodge, Westcott,
Dorking,
June 5th, 1909.

---

PAIN AND THE THEATRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question which you ask me is an interesting one, and deserves an answer. Certainly I should say that pain is to be avoided both in life and on the stage, when it is not incurred in the performance of a duty or in the presentation of a scene which is really likely to produce a useful result. Of course, when these conditions exist, pain must be risked. I dare say you know the old story of the old lady who, on seeing "Romeo and Juliet" for the first time, was so much impressed by Romeo's misery on the opening of Juliet's tomb, that she called out, "Won't nobody tell the poor young gentleman that the young lady isn't dead?" Well, in that case, I should say that the pain was worth while. The old lady would, no doubt, feel how cruelly the fathers of the hero and heroine had sacrificed their children's happiness to their own foolish feuds. That was the very moral that Shakespeare obviously intended; one which is easily learnt and which might produce most valuable results on the ordinary citizen, and one, too, which is emphatically assisted by a really good actor. So, too, I believe that it is quite possible to startle people, in a different way, into perceiving the absurdity of the present phase of Jingoism. I believe strongly that Mr. Gilbert did strike an effective blow at the blustering Jingoism of the nineteenth century by his song of "The Englishman." Why can we not hope that the meaner and more hysterical Jingoism of the present day might receive a crushing blow from a similarly effective hand? But "Romeo and Juliet" and "Pinafore" both appealed to simple and obvious feelings, which are to be found in every ordinary playgoer; and any pain that the audience may receive from the shock of disillusionment would be followed ultimately by a higher kind of relief.

But the speech of Mr. Shaw's character simply shocks the pious playgoer or pleases the flippant and irreverent spectator. To think out the problem till the thinkers arrived at a useful suggestion is exactly what no ordinary playgoer can be expected to do.

To put it shortly, the playgoer must be appealed to by his feeling, not by his intellect.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead,
June 7th, 1909.

---

THE VISTA OF SCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been deeply impressed by the article in your last issue entitled "Thought and Instinct." It is a masterly review of the intellectual tendencies of the modern world.

Perhaps it is that the modern man is filled with a sense of disappointment with the tangible results of scientific research. The greatest gratitude is, therefore, due to the essayist for demonstrating that the devotee of science has not opened up to our vision a mere valley of dead bones, but rather a vista of living beauty.

But one feels an element of regret at the half-tone of pessimism as to the ability of science to complete its "pattern intellectually devised." True, the campaign upon which science has entered never will be completed—there will always be new worlds to conquer. Its progress has been laborious, yet, I take it, not more laborious than that of instinct, and with little less success; for has not the growth of instinct been simply contemporaneous with the growth of consciousness, and are not its achievements the acquirements of experience, rendered quick and certain by long usage, and are not its possibilities measured by its adaptability to a changing environment?

Too much stress has been laid upon Darwin's self-confessed loss of enjoyment in art and music. That Darwin was almost a life-long invalid is a factor lost sight of. Probably few other scientific men of eminence have experienced such a deprivation of the artistic sense, and surely such examples as Kelvin, Stokes, and Faraday, who were lovers of music and deeply imbued with the spirit of religion, are sufficiently notable as to provide an off-set to that of the great naturalist. It is too frequently assumed that the lover of accurate knowledge is blind to the beauty of the thing he dissects, and is obsessed by a dry-as-dust irreverence for the charm of the secrets he attempts to unravel.

One finds a spirit in Meredith similar to that of the reviewer:—

> "The voice of Nature is abroad
> This night; it fills the air with balm;
> Her mystery is o'er the land;
> And he who hears her now, and yields
> His being to her yearning tones,
> And seats his soul upon her wings
> And broadens o'er this wind-swept world
> With her, will gather in the flight
> More knowledge of her secret, more
> Delight in her beneficence,
> Than hours of musing, or the lore
> That lives with men, could ever give!"

Such an instinct of beauty, however lovely in its portrayal, divorced from the operations of reason and the insistent enquiry into the causes of its being, is, after all, in the words of the same master, only "fiddling harmonies on the strings of sensualism." A higher sensualism, true; but still sensualism—a floatage on a sea of feeling.

And similarly, a real retrogression, and not an advance, is to be noted in the implication of the words: "This useful habit, the intellectual habit, is a hindrance, not a help, when it is brought to bear on the secrets and the activities of spiritual life. The love of the beloved, and of beauty, the sense of religious bonds, involves an approach as from within, a sympathy of being, an intellectually undefined and shapeless, but experimentally vivid apprehension, as of masterful spirits who live and act by right rather than by rule. In the very highest of our modes of life we depart from the path by which we have reached our supremacy of intellect." Surely the author does not imply that the deepest problems of religion and of life must for ever remain mysteries—that they are above and beyond reason and the reasoning faculty! Principal Caird put the objections to such a mode of thought thus: "We know of no other reason than one, and what can never be brought into coherence with that reason is to us equivalent to the absurd or self-contradictory. Of what is in itself knowable though beyond our present knowledge we can pronounce, that it is not contrary to reason. But we cannot say the same of that which is above reason in the sense of absolutely transcending human intelligence, of that which can never be construed by human thought. What lies beyond reason in this sense is simply irrational or nonsensical."

The ways of man on his spiritual side may appear utterly inscrutable and past all finding out. Surely, however, we have not a necessity for a side-tracking of his intellectual energy, but rather an impetus to seek "all the light which reverent and thoughtful investigation can throw on them, to verify them, to disengage them from what is accidental, to develop their organic unity, to trace their connection with the other elements of its knowledge, to give them, in short, that form of knowledge which we designate philosophic thought."—Yours, &c., T.

June 6th, 1909.

FIRE BRIGADES AND INSURANCE COMPANIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I feel I owe an apology to Mr. S. J. G. Hoare, if, as he says, the trotting out of the old horse, or, rather, nightmare, of fire insurance contribution to fire brigades, is an annual exercise. No doubt, he is correct, although I, who see the reports of the L.C.C. Fire Brigade Committee year by year, can never remember my attention being so arrested by, what I imagined, the insinuation conveyed in the paragraph in the Chairman's report quoted by me. That I was not peculiar in this impression may be gathered by the fact that I first saw the paragraph in question in the halfpenny daily newspapers who only devote their necessarily circumscribed space to specially spicy or noteworthy matter.

I must also be prepared to accept Mr. A. E. Brown's dictum that my ideas are antiquated and survivals of a dead past, but he must also accept my statement that his own vision gives no evidence of experience and knowledge. When he speaks of fire insurance as "practically compulsory," I admit he does make me rub my eyes and wonder whether I am still one of the "Seven Sleepers" with whose company he associates me. Let him prove his contention and I could then go some way with him in his argument. As it is, I, distinctly, as a matter of principle, object to the insured being taxed for the uninsured. That Mr. Brown is absolutely wrong I can prove. Take the total amount insured on property in the Administrative County of London alone. The certified returns to the London County Council show this to be only £1,055,200,172. Surely Mr. Brown must admit this barely represents the "bricks and mortar" within the area, to say nothing of "the chattels" disposed therein! To estimate the proportion would be a mere guess, but giving general opinion for what it is worth, barely two-thirds of value is covered. Outside that area probably the proportion is greater, and for varying reasons. If Mr. Brown quarrels with these estimates, for estimates they can only be, I must refer him back to his original statement and ask him for his authority.

Take again his further statement about the "enormous profits of the tariff insurance companies." I have before me a "Chart of the Fire Insurance Business of British Companies in 1908," gathered from the published accounts, which appears in this week's issue of the leading insurance journal. Last year proved one of the best in profit results which has been experienced for some years. The chart, therefore, is a reliable test, and, further, comprises the operations of the forty-nine companies in every quarter of the globe. The net premiums for the year were £24,896,762, whilst the amount paid for net losses, agency commission, and other expenses was £22,133,245, yielding a profit of a little over 11 per cent. Is there anything "enormous" about this in a good year? Out of this profit has to be allocated the "fire reserve funds" mentioned by Mr. Brown, and which, it need hardly be said, are set aside for the protection of the insuring public, and not for any fancy of the shareholder who can have but a secondary and fleeting interest in them. How otherwise could such fatal years like 1906 be met when the loss and expense ratios combined with some of the tariff companies are as follows:—

| | |
|---|---|
| Alliance | 117 per cent. |
| Atlas | 129 per cent. |
| Caledonian | 196 per cent. |
| Commercial Union | 111 per cent. |
| Law Union and Crown | 230 per cent. |
| Liverpool, London and Globe | 113 per cent. |
| London and Lancashire | 142 per cent. |
| London | 227 per cent. |
| North British and Mercantile | 115 per cent. |
| Northern | 122 per cent. |
| Norwich Union | 115 per cent. |
| Phoenix | 125 per cent. |
| Royal | 111 per cent. |
| Royal Exchange | 178 per cent. |
| Scottish Union and National | 117 per cent. |
| State | 223 per cent. |
| Sun | 106 per cent. |

The loss represented by these percentages mean large figures when it is added that of the foregoing list seven companies have a yearly net premium income of over a million, three over two millions, and one over three millions in pounds sterling.

"The success," comparatively—judging by premium income as evidence of public support and confidence—of "the municipal corporation's alliance," referred to as such by Mr. Brown, may be gauged by the fact that the net premiums of the Municipal Mutual in 1906 were £3,207, as compared with, say, that of £3,431,416 gathered that same year by the Royal. Well, we all know what comparisons are! I have no nearer returns of the M.M.—Yours, &c.,

INSURANCE MANAGER.

June 10th, 1909.

RE INEQUALITIES OF THE INCOME-TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to the letter of Mr. St. John G. Ervine under the above heading in your issue of the 5th inst., we cannot agree with him that "In practice, gentlemen do not earn sums like £2,001." When he wrote that, he must have had in mind merely persons who derive their earned income from salary. A very large proportion, however, of those who earn their income, make it in some business or profession where the amount of their earnings is uncertain, and where the assessment is made on the average of the three previous years. In such cases where the profits are anywhere in the region of £2,000, they are as likely to be £2,001 as any other figure.

It is, no doubt, a hardship that a man earning £2,001 should pay so much more tax than another who is earning £2,000, but wherever you draw the margin—and in graduation you must draw the margin somewhere—there necessarily must be an inequality, and the only way to mitigate that is to make the graduation less steep, which would entail more expense in collection.

The fact of this inequality makes it all the more necessary that taxpayers should be most careful in making their returns, so that should their total income, when correctly stated, not exceed £2,000, they may obtain the benefit of the lower rate of income-tax which they may easily lose by setting down the rent instead of the Sch. A. value of real estate (to mention only one error that many people fall into) and thus make their total income appear to be over £2,000.—Yours, &c.,

The (Income) Taxpayers' Appeal Agency,
B. H. C. CURRIE.

191, Victoria Street,
London, S.W.
June 8th, 1909.

---

THE IMPERIAL CABLE SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of June 5th, Mr. Edward Shann draws sweeping deductions from unsound observations. As an Australian journalist, and no less an Imperialist than Mr. Shann himself, I must ask for a little of your valuable space to reply to his hysterical overstatements. If one half of Mr. Shann's charges be correct, surely all who have connection—even the remotest connection—with Australian daily newspapers, should be delivered over to the public executioner, and the disillusioned populace, after many disastrous years of baneful tyranny, should set torches to the offices, and shout that they never more will be "ideal subjects for psychological experiment on the crowd mind." For listen to a few of Mr. Shann's statements. He speaks of "sensational distortion of news beyond the wildest ravings of London," "mixed motives of sensationalism and journalism," "hysterical over-statement," which by "fictitious unanimity" of all our daily journals so works upon the "crowd mind" of Australians as to deliberately arouse instinctive combativeness which is to part the Empire and bring its "solid units" into "mutual recriminations and hostility." Journalists, according to the opinion of Mr. Shann, who, I may say, represents the views of an icy-cold theoretical section of academic opinion, are the worst conceivable traitors the young Commonwealth could shelter among its own. For they so "dupe" public opinion as to cause the general will—this is Mr. Shann's cleverly stated point—to take action which is in the very worst degree inimical to its future interests.

I not only desire to save my own neck—which I admit I find useful—from Mr. Shann's axeman—for there will be a busy Lord High Executioner under University rule—but I wish to remove false impressions which may have been created by Mr. Shann's letter.

(1) The news service from London to Australia is an impartial, accurate statement of facts. Mr. Kiffyn Thomas told us at the Imperial Press Conference that in a long experience of the Australian newspapers he had "never found prepossession to one side or the other in the interpretation of cables. Great national matters were dealt with at great expense in cablegrams of an ample kind." That is the general experience of those who know, and Mr. Shann's selection of a few headlines and a few sentences from the cable columns of the greatest Melbourne newspaper is no sort of argument in support of the serious statements he makes to the contrary. It is not to be thought of that, with the newspapers watching one another with jealous eyes, misrepresentation would be allowed to pass unnoticed. A rival newspaper ruthlessly exposes the mistakes of its adversary. (2) It is not correct to say that "all the Australian and New Zealand dailies are in a cable syndicate." There is a syndicate of the leading newspapers, which succeed by this means in getting a large supply of news for Australians in spite of the ruinously high Press cable rate of 1s. per word. Some papers get as much news as they wish from this syndicate, paying for what they like to use. Others are supplied by Reuter's service. Reuter's service of news satisfies the columns devoted to foreign matters in very many great British newspapers. The cable syndicate of Australia obtains an immeasurably better service of news than Reuter's Agency sends.

(3) The cable service of news to Australia gives us more information about Great Britain than the British Press publishes about Australia. From three to four columns each day are given to European and American news sent through London. What British newspaper gives more than a few casual lines and notes to Australian affairs?

The Imperial cable service may be inadequate, and is certainly too dear. Newspapers would publish more Imperial news if the price were not positively ruinous. We should all strive for a cheaper cable service. But we will not knit the units of Empire together by a mere increase in the size of our newspapers. A unity of interests will be found the only sure bond. Among the means for fostering that there are two which may be easily attained. One is the welding of a ring of Empire defence, and the other is the recognition of the right of the new nations to a voice in the vital management, as in the defence and the enjoyment of the Empire. Meanwhile I must repeat that Australian journalists are not the malicious enemies of progress described by Mr. Shann, but are zealously striving for the common good, informing faithfully and accurately, and presenting with their full force their points of view of what is best for the future life of the Commonwealth.—Yours, &c.,

KEITH A. MURDOCH.

Grosvenor Club,
Piccadilly, W.,
June 9th, 1909.

---

FEMINIST ARGUMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—That the logic of ordinary feminism is past praying for I have for a long time recognised, but that the logic of THE NATION'S feminism should repeat the same stale and obvious fallacies struck me with surprise on reading your article on "Ouida's Idea of Women" in your issue of June 5th. I confine myself to two points only. Ouida is accused of "trotting out" arguments that are familiar. One of the "familiar" arguments appears to be that women ought not to vote "because they cannot fight." Now, sir, you meet this possibly familiar, but certainly sound, argument against female suffrage by the threadbare sophism that "it is the women who suffer most" in war. How do they suffer, I ask? Are they shot down, killed, or wounded? No. On the contrary, they enjoy the privileges of their sex in not being touched. Their sufferings, such as they are and what there are of them, are distinctly vicarious. Let us suppose another case. The Editor of THE NATION goes forth to fight for some cause, as to the importance of which we are both agreed, while I "shirk." Reproached for not exposing myself to shot and shell, I reply that though I did not feel it precisely my function to do that, I suffered, nevertheless, more from the anxiety I felt for the editor, who was in the field, than I could possibly have done if I had myself been there. Now, sir, would not the answer of yourself and friends to the tale of my vicarious sufferings, real as they doubtless would be, take the form of what is popularly known as a "grinder"? Well, this is precisely the way most anti-suffragists feel when they hear this talk of women suffering more from war than men. Again, Ouida urges the other "familiar," but, as far as it goes, equally sound, argument respecting the inferiority of the female intellect to that of man, as indicated by the non-production of female geniuses. To this you reply by another similarly threadbare sophism—to the effect that the city and suburbs do not swarm with "masculine Platos, Shakespeares, and Beethovens." Surely it ought to be obvious to any intelligent person that this is utterly beside the issue. As I have pointed out elsewhere, the argument simply says that the heights of the summits may, other things equal, afford some indication of the height of the tableland beneath them—that the sex that shows a continuous output of genius in all departments is likely, as an average, to be higher intellectually than the sex that shows few or more. Of course, whether this average inferiority is sufficiently great to render the concession of the franchise undesirable is, I admit, another question. But the argument in itself is good enough, and, I submit, is certainly not answered by the ignoratio elenchi of your article. —Yours, &c.,

E. Belfort Bax.

June 10th, 1909.

"I AGREE WITH EVERY WORD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I am confident that many Liberal electors who like myself regard the jingo agitation now being engineered by the Tory Party as both mischievous and unpatriotic, will find much food for thought in the speeches of our leaders at the present Imperial Press Conference. Sir Edward Grey tells us that he "endorses every word" in Lord Rosebery's speech, and Mr. Haldane piping where Sir Edward Grey has danced, "agrees with every word" that Mr. Balfour said. It follows, of course, that for any of us to bother to record our votes at the next election is a needless piece of trouble.—Yours, &c.,

A Liberal Elector.

London, June 10th, 1909.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In common with many other people who believe in a forward policy as a cure for many of our social inequalities, I have been the recipient of a request to join or assist the National Committee to break up the Poor Law, founded by Mrs. Webb, whose letter on this topic I have read in The Nation of June 5th.

I should be very glad if you would allow me to state the reasons which lead me to think this agitation is totally misconceived, and why all reformers should be wary of devoting themselves to an advocacy of the specious proposals of the Minority Report.

Poverty, Mr. Bernard Shaw has told us, is a crime. It may be; but to treat the poor and the unemployed as virtual criminals is reaction of the worst description.

The institutional system has failed to cure crime, it has failed in the reformatories, it will fail in dealing with unemployment and the unemployed. With the grave inequalities in the distribution of wealth which are the outstanding feature of England to-day, it is a most ill-considered step to deal with the unemployed punitively; it is not a very long step from punitive treatment to enslavement. To reconstruct society on a semi-servile basis is a disastrous attempt to bureaucratise an undoubted evil out of existence. I am still old-fashioned enough to hope that the watchword of Liberty and Equality is not incompatible with Socialism. I am writing as a Socialist; but the trend of the Socialist "reform" of the Poor Law is enough to make one pause. That prominent Socialists are connecting themselves with the destructive theories enunciated by the signatories to the Minority Report is a grave symptom of the suicidal lunacy which has been sweeping across the Socialist movement in the last two years.

It is a serious issue, and I venture to doubt whether the many ladies and gentlemen who have accepted the invitation to "break up" the Poor Law really know what such a policy will involve. It appears to me that Mr. and Mrs. Webb, with their co-signatories, have merely gone out of their way to justify Herbert Spencer's attack on Socialism—that "Socialism is slavery." Socialists are entitled to say of the gift of the Minority Report, assuming they are Socialists who are determinedly opposed to the bureaucratic tendencies of Socialism, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes."

In all earnestness, I appeal to reformers, be they Conservative, Radical, or Socialist, to hesitate before embarking on a step which may create a state of things before which the most intrepid of us might quail. It is Mr. and Mrs. Webb's habit—I often have heard them discuss these matters, publicly and privately—to sneer at their critics as ridiculous idealists, or impractical dreamers. Yet, all their ingenuity cannot conceal from one who is proud to range himself in that category, the essential truth that the logical development of the theories in the Minority Report will mean the addition of a new crime to the calendar—to wit, Unemployment. I, at any rate, decline to be a party to such a backward step.—Yours, &c.,

C. H. Norman.

4, Hyde Park Mansions,
London, W.
June 9th, 1909.

Poetry.

IN THE DUTCH GARDEN, HAMPTON COURT.

In this deep, drowsy afternoon,
Vassal of silence and the sun,
I hear the mystic under-tune
Of life a-blossom round me run.

Color is music to the soul
Enthralled by color; beauty here
Is like a great musician's scroll
The eye interprets for the ear.

On that embowered westward wall
Wistarias' grape-like clusters sleep;
Brave tulips man the borders all
Like warriors marshalled at the keep.

The fountain's plash is silence' song
Transmuted to a silver shower
Laving the languid airs that throng
About the cool brink, hour by hour.

Soft puffs of perfume come and pass,
Soft doves' wings flash against the blue,
Soft shadows lie along the grass,
And all the living world is new.

O how shall mortal memory hold
The essence of this sun-thrilled peace,
How hoard it as the spirit's gold,
How cherish for the soul's increase?

How keep inviolate this sense
Of utter beauty, utter rest;
How guard for ever this intense
One hour within th' turbulent breast?

Ah, but the hour is with me yet,
Surely the dial's shadow stays!
My living heart cannot forget
This hour of hours, this day of days.

C. Kennett Burrow.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

M. JULES LEMAÎTRE is at work upon a study of Fénelon which, like his book on Rousseau, will take the shape of a series of lectures at the Sorbonne. It will be interesting to see how so warm a supporter of the clerical party will deal with Fénelon's share in the Jansenist movement at St. Sulpice and his later conflict with Bossuet upon the orthodoxy of Quietism. A study from so acute a critic as M. Lemaître of "the most original intellect—if we set Pascal aside—of the seventeenth century," as Fénelon has been described, is bound to be full of interest.

* * *

SINCE his conversion to Catholicism M. Paul Bourget has been very active in the propaganda of his new views, both in his novels and upon the stage. His last play, dealing with the question of divorce, had a great vogue in aristocratic circles. He is now about to follow it up by another called "La Barricade," which will shortly be produced at the Vaudeville Théâtre. As the title hints, its subject is Socialism, which, of course, M. Bourget paints in the darkest colors.

* * *

A BOOK that promises to be of value to students of military history is announced by Mr. Murray in the shape of "A Short History of the Chief Campaigns in Europe since 1792," written by General von Horsetzky, a distinguished Austrian cavalry officer, and translated by Lieutenant K. B. Ferguson. It will be a novelty to see a presentation of the Austrian point of view, which has been rather lost sight of in this country owing to the many works by German or French writers that have been translated.

* * *

THE New York "Nation" is now under the editorship of Mr. Paul Elmore More, who has been for some years connected with that journal, and who is also literary editor of the New York "Evening Post." Mr. More is known in this country by his brilliant series of critical studies called "Shelburne Essays" which now fill six volumes. It is to be hoped that his graver work will not prevent Mr. More from finding time to give us more of these essays which, in their critical breadth of view and thorough scholarship, belong to a type not too common on either side of the Atlantic.

* * *

"THE JEW IN ENGLISH LITERATURE" is the title of a treatise by an American rabbi, Dr. E. N. Calisch, which has just appeared in the United States. We hope that some English publisher will issue it here, for Dr. Calisch treats of practically everything that English writers have had to say about the Jews from the tenth century onwards, as well as giving an account of what Jewish authors have contributed to English literature. Many of the most familiar characters in our fiction and drama are Jews—Shakespeare's Shylock, Scott's Isaac and Rebecca, Dickens's Fagin and Riah, Beaconsfield's Sidonia, and George Eliot's Mordecai are a few that come into the mind at once—though it must be admitted that with rare exceptions they have not been sympathetically drawn. An examination of these and other characters from the Jewish standpoint may possibly supply illustrations of peculiar value to the works of our great authors.

* * *

ANOTHER American book likely to find an English publisher is "Old Friends: Literary Recollections of Other Days," by Mr. William Winter, the New York critic and poet. Mr. Winter was one of Longfellow's closest friends, and was acquainted with Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Whitman, T. B. Aldrich, Bayard Taylor, and other famous American authors. He has also something to say about English literary men who visited the United States, Dickens and Wilkie Collins among others.

* * *

THE late Mr. Marion Crawford has left several manuscripts in a nearly completed stage, which are now in the hands of his literary executors. Together with Professor Tomassetti he had planned a three volume "History of Rome in the Middle Ages," the first volume of which Messrs. Macmillan have now in type. Another work that he has left is a "History of the Papacy in the Nineteenth Century," though since Dr. Nielsen's book has already covered the same ground it is doubtful whether Mr. Crawford's will be issued. Among the other manuscripts are a couple of novels, one being practically complete.

* * *

MR. DAVID NUTT announces for autumn publication a book on "The Sources of the Decameron," by Mr. A. C. Lee, who describes the originals, parallels, and analogues of Boccaccio's stories, as far as these have been ascertained. The work attempts to survey the whole field of medieval and Oriental story-telling, and will be a supplement to Landau's "Quellen des Dekameron." Another book which the same publisher has in preparation is Mrs. Henry Hurst's "St. George of Cappadocia in Legend and Art." It traces the evolution of the Dragon slayer theme as associated with England's national saint, and illustrates its influence upon romance and art.

* * *

LARGELY through the efforts of Mr. H. Ramsen Whitehouse, the author of an English life of Princess Belgiojoso, which has been translated into French, a tablet has been placed on the walls of the hotel at Ouchy on the Lake of Geneva where Byron wrote "The Prisoner of Chillon." Mr. Whitehouse is at present engaged upon a biography of Lamartine. It will take into account the abundant fresh material which recent researches have brought to light about one of the most tender and graceful of French nineteenth century poets.

* * *

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD and Mr. E. F. Benson have both completed new novels entitled respectively "Canadian Born" and "The Osbornes," which will appear as serials in "The Cornhill Magazine." Mr. Benson has also finished another book, "A Reaping," which Mr. Heinemann announces for early publication. It is said to be a departure from the novel of modern life and a return to the manner of "The Book of Months." Two other novels of promise to be issued next month are "Fun of the Fair," by Mr. Eden Phillpotts, and "The Bride of the Mistletoe," by Mr. James Lane Allen.

* * *

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS are preparing an English translation of a volume of Franz Blei's essays. The title of the book, "The Powder-Puff: A Ladies' Breviary. From the Documents of Prince Hippolytus," is suggestive of the delicate and graceful irony something after the manner of Heine, in which Blei is almost alone among contemporary German writers.

* * *

MR. ARTHUR RACKHAM is to give us two color books next autumn, an adaptation of Fouqué's "Undine," by Mr. W. L. Courtney, which Mr. Heinemann is preparing, and Grimm's "Fairy Tales," which will be issued by Messrs. Constable. The latter publishers have also in hand a companion edition of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" to be illustrated by Mr. W. Lee Hankey, for which Mr. Thomas Seccombe is writing a preface.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Characters and Events in Roman History from Caesar to Nero." By Guglielmo Ferrero. (Putman. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Roman Life and Manners." By Ludwig Friedländer. Translated by J. H. Freese and L. A. Magnus. Vol. II. (Routledge. 6s.)

"Primitive Christianity." By Otto Pfleiderer. Vol. II. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A New History of Methodism." Edited by W. J. Townsend, D.D., H. B. Workman, D.Litt., and George Eayrs, F.R.Hist.S. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 Vols. 30s. net.)

"The Pyrenees." By Hilaire Belloc. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"In Unknown Tuscany." By Edward Hutton. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Papacy." By Gustav Krüger. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"Mexico." By C. Reginald Enock. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Evolutionary Socialism: A Criticism and Affirmation." By Edward Bernstein. (Independent Labor Party. 1s. 6d. net.)

"Frank Burnet." By Dorothy V. Horace Smith. (Murray. 6s.)

"Les Sept Femmes de la Barbe-Bleue et Autres Contes Merveilleux." Par Anatole France. (Paris: Calmann-Lèvy. 3fr. 50.)

"Vie de Senèque." Par René Waltz. (Paris: Perrin. 7fr. 50.)

"Montesquieu et la Tradition politique anglaise en France." Par Joseph Dedieu. (Paris: Lecoffre. 6fr.)

"Le Duc de Morny et la Société du Second Empire." Par Frédéric Loliée. (Paris: Paul. 7fr. 50.)

Reviews.

MR. NEVINSON'S PROSE WRITING.*

THE difficulty of reviewing a collection of essays upon widely diverse subjects is heightened in the case of Mr. Nevinson's book by the fact that the greater part of it has already appeared in our own columns. But, as Anatole France puts it, all criticism is a confession, and the critic who wishes to be frank with his readers must begin by saying: "Gentlemen, I am going to speak to you of myself apropos of Shakespeare, of Racine, of Pascal, or of Goethe; the opportunity, at least, is an excellent one." Varying this procedure a little, we shall speak of Mr. Nevinson's "Essays in Freedom," and of the special interpretation which he assigns to them. The freedom that slowly, even sluggishly, broadens down from precedent to precedent, and urges patriotic citizens to spend laborious evenings in committee-rooms, stirs Mr. Nevinson to no enthusiastic transports:—

> "To me," he says, "the word conveys nothing as a National Right, nothing as an abstract idea, and nothing as a symbolic woman with wings blowing a trumpet into the ears of marble captives, decoratively asleep in chains. I have learnt the reality of the thing only from the misery of its opposite, and when I hear the word Freedom I see shaggy farmers, rough with mud and storm, clad in leather cut from outstarved horses, waiting at the bottom of a watercourse, rifle in hand. Or I see a woman in rags cowering under a ruined wall, while sleet hisses upon the charred and open patch of ground which was her home. Or I see a pale man and girl hurried over the snow between brown-coated soldiers with fixed bayonets to be hacked to pieces in a barrack-yard. Or I see a herd of black Africans, men and women, huddled together upon a steamer's deck, gazing like driven cattle towards the misty islands where they will toil until they die, in order that our chocolate creams may be cheap. Or I see a white-robed crowd gathered upon a beach where the surf beats under a stormy moon, and from the crowd goes up a cry in honor of a prisoner spirited away from his country, untried and uncharged, for the cause of freedom. Or I see a great city whispering in terror at a decrepit and terrified old man, who sits above the city like a spider in a web sensitive with treachery."

The passage is characteristic of Mr. Nevinson's attitude and temperament. He has a horror of abstractions. Like Gautier, though in a different sense, he is a man for whom the visible world exists; and he sees it, not through veils of sentiment or illusion, but in its stark reality. He is an impatient idealist.

How far impatient idealism is an effective force in the fight for freedom is a question which we shall not attempt to answer. It is at any rate a temper by which in these days the world is not likely to be greatly troubled. So the world adopts the convenient method of professing to esteem it, while in reality condemning and fearing it, and ignoring its capacity for proving itself right in the long run, and justifying its precepts even upon the flat ground of expediency. And in truth its chief value is the continual war it maintains against that "depressing deference to the existing state of things, or to what is immediately practical," which Lord Morley instances as one of the results of compromise in the matter of forming and holding opinions. Of that depressing deference Mr. Nevinson does not show the slightest trace. His mood is rather one of instinctive defiance. His book is full of warnings against the danger of accepting things as they are, even when they seem to be tolerable. "Freedom," he tells us, "is a thing that we have to conquer afresh for ourselves every day, like love; and we are always losing freedom, just as we are always losing love, because after each victory we think we can now settle down and enjoy it without further risk or struggle." To most people the undoubted truth of this statement is merely depressing. On Mr. Nevinson it has an effect which stimulates both his intellect and his physical and moral energies. He may not go quite so far as Nietzsche and think that "a good war hallows every cause," but he has a delight in the conflict, and it is often difficult to determine which he rates highest, freedom, or the struggle to win freedom. He thinks, with Whitman, that:

> Where the men and women think lightly of the laws,
> Where the slave ceases, and the master of slaves ceases,
> Where the populace rises at once against the never-ending audacity of elected persons,
> Where fierce men and women pour forth as the sea to the whistle of death pours its sweeping and unript waves,
> . . . . .
> There the great city stands.

These essays, which are the ripened fruit of adventures among many peoples and in many books, are illustrations of this single theme. When Mr. Nevinson speaks of Swinburne, he laments that in face of "the two test questions for lovers of liberty in our day and country—the misgovernment of Ireland and the extinction of the South African Republics," he should have been "blind and deaf to the struggle for freedom when it lay close before his feet and was not yet illumined by distant time or the glamor of great names and picturesque adventures." And if he praises Milton, it is less as one of the greatest of English poets, than because being this, he shunned "culture's temptation" and "laying aside the sin that so easily besets the literary mind, he mingled without disdain in all the sweat and dust of envenomed and deadly controversies." So, too, he finds the deepest cause of "The Scholar's Melancholy" in the thought that "the tongue of men and angels cannot touch the inveterate cruelty, the oppression and vulgarity of all this slow, insensate world." He witnesses a performance of one of Gorky's plays in a Moscow theatre, and as he looks round the house he sees "the audience of freedom . . . who contemplated no compromise, no understanding, or agreement with the enemy of freedom." This resolve to test literature by its direct bearing upon life is in these days an unaccustomed note from an essayist, for the essay more than any other literary form has strayed away from life's deeper moods and experiences. Not that Mr. Nevinson cannot turn a sentence with the best of them. But as an accomplished man of letters who has also been a man of action, he knows that art is something more than a mode of self-sufficing experience, and that it thrives best upon the actual stuff of life. Mr. Nevinson does well to protest against any view of literature which lessens Wordsworth's classical view that its mission is "to console the afflicted; to add sunshine to daylight by making the happy happier; to teach the young and the gracious of every age to think, and to feel." Of course, life itself can do all this better than art, but Mr. Nevinson, we think, carries his protest a little too far when, in speaking of "imaginary stories," he cites the answer of the Spartan king when invited to hear a boy whistle like a nightingale: "I have heard the nightingale itself." Unfortunately many of us have not heard the nightingale, and an imitation is better than nothing at all.

Moreover, there is a shade of forgetfulness of his own art and order in Mr. Nevinson's ironical attitude towards literary men. For he is in many ways the type of what a literary man ought to be. His mind was clearly moulded by classical literature. But it has also been enriched by a wide commerce with modern authors, so that a great deal of his writing is a mosaic of hinted quotations, ripened by varied and thrilling experiences, and adorned with a style of unusual grace and flexibility. Mr. Nevinson's style seems to us his chief excellence. Those who have read his former books, notably "A Plea of Pan" and "Between the Acts," must have been struck by the unusual beauty of their writing. They will find in "Essays in Freedom" no falling off from this standard. Indeed, these three books are a sufficient proof that Mr. Nevinson, however much he may demur, must be classed as first and foremost a man of letters and one of the half-dozen living writers of English who for their style alone are entitled to serious consideration.

Modern English prose is just now in a peculiar position. When writers like Carlyle, De Quincey, and Ruskin laid hold of the eighteenth century prose and filled it with a color and emotion till then appropriated to poetry, they marked out the path in which most of their successors followed. The old tradition was pursued by a few who, like Arnold and Newman, aimed at precision and clearness more than at ornament. The difference between the two styles may be best expressed by saying that the one suggests an audible voice, while the other appeals mainly to the eye. Or better still, it is the difference between painting and sculpture. For a long time the new school seemed to have won the battle, but at present there is a tendency to return to the older classical diction. In the meantime, we would place Mr. Nevinson and Mr. Lowes Dickinson as the outstanding representatives of the two styles. Mr. Dickinson's prose is the prose of Addison, precise, severe, and unadorned. Mr. Nevinson has modelled himself more upon Ruskin, though he is not free from the influence of Sir Thomas Browne. His distinguishing qualities are color, movement, warmth, to which the habit of irony and the faculty for laughter largely contribute. At times he is a trifle self-conscious. But he is never undistinguished, and by this characteristic distinction his work attains and holds the precious title of literature.

* "Essays in Freedom." By H. W. Nevinson. Duckworth. 6s. net.

E.

OXFORD LECTURES ON POETRY.*

The philosophy of art, speculation on or discussion of its principles and creations, is apt to leave a sense of emptiness behind. For the essential thing in art is feeling—the feeling by which it is inspired, and with which it inspires us. And this is immediate; you either do or do not experience it; if the latter, it can no more be explained to you than light or air. Yet, like hand and eye, sensibility may be trained. The two, feeling and the theory of feeling, stand to one another as natural to acquired logic; the one grows into and develops the other, which receives the substance to which it gives form. Those, therefore, in whom poetry wakes no kindred note, had better leave these Lectures unread. Those to whom it speaks home, on the other hand, will do well to study them, provided that, mindful of the poet's "Enough of science and of art," they remember that criticism is secondary. They need not, indeed, "close up those barren leaves"; the leaves, taken rightly, are fruitful enough. But here, as elsewhere, the root of the matter is thing, not theory, and it is to be found within rather than without.

> "Come forth, and bring with you a heart
> That watches and receives."

Not everything in Nature is a fit subject for art: Art is the embodiment in fixed forms of the element of beauty in Nature. If this be idealism, as in a sense it is, it can be avoided only by counter-idealism, which is the negation of art. For the stereotyping involved in the embodiment of the idea in a concrete form magnifies; and the naturalist school sees and presents the world out of focus in consequence; the beast in Nature is, like the head of the Gorgon, death to those who see it. Art, in short, is to Nature what mind is to sense; it discriminates and interprets. Under its action the universe of things, in itself formless, takes form and meaning; the world as we know it springs to being before our eyes. Hence the sense of limit, which belongs to sanity, and is natural to normally constituted minds. The savage devours his food raw; the civilised man cooks it: and the case of experience runs on similar lines. The artist does not take experience as it comes, haphazard; he selects, adapts, rationalises, putting something mental, something of himself, into it before it is ready for use. This is what Hegel meant when he placed Art above Nature, and Aristotle when he speaks of it as being more philosophical and elevated than history. This premised, we come to Mr. Bradley's account of the relation of poetry to experience:—

> "An actual poem is the succession of experiences—sounds, images, thoughts, emotions—through which we pass when we are reading as poetically as we can. Of course, the imaginative experience differs with every reader and every time of reading: a poem exists in innumerable degrees. But this insuperable fact lies in the nature of things."

The Inaugural Lecture (1901), delivered during the author's tenure of the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, discusses the purpose of poetry. Does it exist for an end outside itself? or is poetry for poetry's sake a valid canon? In spite of the great authority of Wordsworth, Mr. Bradley pronounces for the latter view. There can be little question that he is in the right. To say that poetry, or art in general, is an end in itself, is not to say that it is "the whole or supreme end of the human life": and to the objection that the formula cuts away poetry from its connection with life, the answer is that—

> "there is plenty of connection between life and poetry, but it is, so to say, a connection underground. The two may be called different forms of the same thing: one of them having (in the usual sense) reality, but seldom fully satisfying imagination; while the other satisfies imagination, but has not full 'reality.' They are parallel developments which nowhere meet, or, if I may use loosely a word which will be serviceable later, they are analogues."

Or, to quote the fine words of the closing paragraph, poetry

> "still seems to be trying to express something beyond itself. And this, we feel, is also what the other arts, and religion, and philosophy, are trying to express—and that is what impels us to seek in vain to translate the one into the other. About the best poetry there floats an atmosphere of infinite suggestion. The poet speaks to us of one thing, but in this one thing there seems to lurk the secret of all. He said what he meant, but his meaning seems to beckon away beyond itself, or rather to expand into something boundless, which is only focussed in it; something also which, we feel, would satisfy not only the imagination, but the whole of us. . . . This all-embracing perfection cannot be expressed in poetic words of any kind, nor yet in music or in color. . . . We do it wrong, we defeat our own purposes when we try to bend it to them:—
>
> 'We do it wrong, being so majestical,
> To offer it the show of violence;
> For it is, as the air, invulnerable,
> And our vain blows malicious mockery.'
>
> It is a spirit. It comes we know not whence. It will not speak at our bidding, nor answer in our language. It is not our servant; it is our master."

Turning to the lecture on Wordsworth, with all his suggestive criticism, we do not think that the author has got the poet's secret. He reminds us of his wandering and undisciplined youth—the tradition of his sheeplike temperament must be relegated to legend—and discusses admirably the relation in which his work stands to that of the great German idealists of which it so often reminds us. "Tintern Abbey" and "A slumber did my spirit seal" are instances of this parallelism, and many others will occur.

> "His poetry is immensely interesting as an imaginative expression of the same mind which, in his day, produced in Germany great philosophies. His poetic experience, his intuitions, his single thoughts, even his large views, correspond in a striking way, sometimes in a startling way, with ideas methodically developed by Kant, Schelling, Hegel, Schopenhauer. They remain admirable material for philosophy; and a philosophy which found itself driven to treat them as moonshine would probably be a very poor affair. But they are like the experience and the utterances of men of religious genius: great truths are enshrined in them, but generally the shrine would have to be broken to liberate those truths in a form which would satisfy the desire to understand."

The same holds good of Newman; it is difficult to persuade ourselves that the author of the "Grammar of Assent" was unacquainted with the "Critique of the Pure Reason." The explanation is that these ideas were in the air, and that men of a certain temperament could not be strangers to them. Nor is the difference of expression more than would almost of necessity arise from the varying standpoints of the poet, the philosopher, and the divine.

To his loftier qualities—austerity, a singularly lofty patriotism, and an elevation of sentiment for which sublimity is not too strong a term—Wordsworth united a rare delicacy of affection and sensitiveness to beauty in detail. Of "the little maid" in "We Are Seven":—

> "Her eyes were fair, and very fair;
> Her beauty made me glad:"

"Three years she grew in sun and shower," and "She dwelt among the untrodden ways," with its great ending—

> "But she is in her grave, and, oh,
> The difference to me," are examples of the former: "Wisdom and Spirit of the Universe" of the latter gift. While the poet who wrote "The world is too much with us," and saw the > "Lady of the Mere > Sole-sitting by the shores of old romance," read deeper into man and Nature than probably any man before or since. He was before all things an interpreter; here he is without a rival. And, as his form at its best—and how often it is at its best!—stands in the first rank,

* "Oxford Lectures on Poetry." A. C. Bradley. Macmillan. 10s.

we are inclined to demur to Mr. Bradley's judgment that "there have been greater poets than he."

Amongst the remaining lectures that on "Shakespeare the Man" and "Shakespeare's Theatre and Audience" call for notice. The collection as a whole is a notable example of English critical work.

THE EUMENIDES OF AESCHYLUS.*

Dr. Verrall has now brought to completion his commentary on the great trilogy of Aeschylus; but he would be the last to claim finality for the conclusions which he presents. Indeed, he expressly repudiates any such pretension, and tells us that—

> "everything in this book, especially what may be new, is propounded simply as matter for consideration."

And the book is as full of such matter as an egg is full of meat. To begin with, Dr. Verrall is, generally speaking, ultra-conservative in textual matters.

> "No small part of my commentary," he observes, "might be described as 'considerations in favor of M.'"

Let us take examples of these from the opening speech of the Pythia. In v. 11 M reads—

ἐς τήνδε γαῖαν ἦλθε παρνησοῦσ θ'ἕδρας (a erased after παρ). Παρνησὸς θ'ἕδρας is clearly the right reading; but Dr. Verrall finds a play on words in the supposed adjective παρ(a)νήσους "from the isle" (of Delos). Again, in v. 27 πλήστους τε πηγάς, the original reading of M has been altered to πλείστους, while the proper name Πλειστοῦ is the true reading. Here, too, Dr. Verrall detects a punning adjective πληστός "filled," which he supposes to indicate the derivation of the name. The fact that in both instances the addition of σ to the termination lies at the root of the mischief at once arouses our suspicion; and when we find the intrusive σ in a number of passages whence even Dr. Verrall has no choice but to expel it (cf. vv. 314, 338, 909, and especially 1000) we cannot but feel that in such a matter the evidence of M is quite inconclusive. Sometimes, too, Dr. Verrall is led astray by the marginal notes in M. It is true that the scholia contain (amid much that is worthless) the disjecta membra of a learned commentary on Aeschylus; but it by no means follows that the scribe who copied these (at third or fourth hand) into our MS. was himself a first-rate scholar. Hence we should not assume (as Dr. Verrall does) that when he writes Ζτ (=Ζητητέον) in the margin some deep-seated corruption is to be inferred: such a wrong division of letters as δ'ἐπάλλας for δὲ παλλάς (v. 224), though to the "ancient editors" of Aeschylus it would doubtless have been easy of correction, sufficed to give pause to the medieval copyist; we have only to turn to v. 205, where we find δ'ἕκτωρ in M, with the note Ζτ οἶμαι δέκτωρ. There is thus no occasion to write, with Dr. Verrall, δ' ἐναλλάξ. Once more, the reading ταύτην τοιαύτην εἶπον in v. 641 is clearly due to homoeoteleuton; τὴν δ'αὖ is necessary in response to ἀνδρὸς μὲν in v. 639. But Dr. Verrall will have it that ταύτην is deictic, and that Apollo, in speaking the words, points to the ghost of Clytemnestra, which is visible to him (as a divine being), though not to his audience. Here we have an example of the tendency to assume by-play, such as the conditions of the Aeschylean stage forbade, which governs many of Dr. Verrall's ingenious interpretations. Two examples stand out prominently in this play. At v. 601 Dr. Verrall supposes that Orestes' action is as follows (we quote his translation and stage directions):—

> "Or.: I trust . . . (An abrupt pause. Sensation. He stands speechless, with eyes long fixed as upon some dreadful vision; then, recovering slowly, continues) But there is aid from the grave; my father brings it. (A pause.)"

We are to assume that the spirit of Clytemnestra appears to her son and transfixes him with horror; but surely this implies the use of resources foreign to Aeschylus. And so at v. 886, where Athena finally overcomes the resistance of Eumenides, it is hard to accept Dr. Verrall's startling suggestion that Athena here draws near to the spirits of vengeance, and that in silence indicated by the broken grammar of the text,

> "Something here passes between them, not worded, nor wordable at all, of which the human witnesses know and can know nothing but the effect—the instantaneous achievement of the impossible . . ."

Aeschylus, after all, was no Maeterlinck. We have no space to quote more from Dr. Verrall; but if scholars will, perhaps, not often agree with his suggestions, they will at least read his book with keen intellectual enjoyment. It is not so much a commentary as a budget of paradoxes.

* "The Eumenides of Aeschylus." With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation by A. W. Verrall, Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Macmillan.

STORIES AND SKETCHES OF WARFARE.*

The three pieces of fiction before us illustrate aptly the confusion of the modern man's feelings about war. We are not only in a transitional period of social development, a period in which several economic stages overlap, but our instincts are torn between an old-world, but by no means out-of-date set of moral concepts, and a new-world cosmopolitan attitude to our fellows derived from the expansion of intercourse and human sympathy. Probably this new cosmopolitan morality will gain ground enormously in the next few generations, but our old-world organisation of rival nationalities makes still possible spectacles of war as monstrous as the recent Russian-Japanese conflict, where two millions of Russian and Japanese peasants were set to work to slaughter one another because a Bezobrazov and an Alexiev wished to keep the exploitation of the Korean forests in their own hands. In the days of Catherine II. or Napoleon I. such a spectacle would not have been generally recognised as immoral—so rapid has the advance been in public intelligence in a few generations. But the morality of a given war is a matter strictly relative to the stage of civilisation reached by a nation and to the pressure of irresistible circumstances. This is clearly brought out by a reading of Mr. Lionel James's admirable sketches of life in beleaguered Tabriz, and on the Indian Frontier, an excellently written series of "Things Seen," which produce a moral effect on the reader, simply because the English officer's standards of humanity, justice, and courage are seen to be of a higher and finer order than are the corresponding standards of his semi-feudal Persians and Pathans. The English officer in the East may therefore come to represent to-day much what the Roman soldier represented in the Britain of two thousand years ago, and he is an integral part, and it may well be a more efficient instrument of our civilisation than, say, the peaceable Londoner who has never handled a rifle. Cant comes into play, however, directly we pretend that our motives in conquering or holding a foreign territory are other than self-regarding.

"Banzai," "written by a German official of high rank," is said to have sold 300,000 copies in Germany. The novel, which is a particularly crass example of the scaremonger's art, describes a supposititious conquest of the United States by a Japanese Army of 170,000 men who are landed on the Pacific coast, after the American Navy has been blown into smithereens by the treacherous manœuvres of Japanese warships! "A war of extermination against the yellow race, and the yellow peril" is preached by the ingenious "Parabellum," whose direct aim seems to be like the Fat Boy's in "Pickwick" to "make yer flesh creep."

We have no really illuminating analysis of war by an artist of rank save Tolstoy, and the Peace Societies of all countries could not do better than translate and distribute his work "Sebastopol," a masterpiece of psychological insight very little known outside Russia. The humblest work of professional military men, however, has its secrets to yield, and we can conscientiously recommend Ole Luk-Oiè's "The Green Curve" as worthy of attention. The author, who impresses one favorably by his tone of well-bred cameraderie and who obviously thinks for himself, shows a light and pleasant touch in his two sketches of humors of the South African campaign. In "The Kite," "The Joint in the Harness," "Mole Warfare," and "The

* "Side Tracks and Bridle-Paths." By Lionel James. Blackwood. 6s.

"The Green Curve, and Other Stories." By Ole Luk-Oiè Blackwood. 6s.

"Banzai." By "Parabellum." Stanley Paul. 6s.

From

SIDGWICK & JACKSON'S LIST.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE ESSENTIAL REFORM.

LAND VALUES TAXATION

In Theory and Practice.

By C. H. CHOMLEY and R. L. OUTHWAITE. With an Appendix by the late MAX HIRSCH. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net. Wrappers 1s. net. 256 pp. Postage 2½d. extra.

"The case for a uniform and universal tax on land values has never perhaps been better stated in so small a compass."—Morning Leader.

[In the Press.

THREE PLAYS BY

GRANVILLE BARKER

THE MARRYING OF ANNE LEETE
THE VOYSEY INHERITANCE
WASTE

In one volume, 5s. net. Separate Plays, in cloth, 2s. net; in paper wrappers, 1s. 6d. net.

The Westminster Gazette, in a review of the drama, 1907, said—"'Waste' proves what 'The Voysey Inheritance' caused some of us to suspect, that in Mr. Granville Barker . . . we have a dramatist in a class by himself—the first class."

THE SEVEN DEADLY SINS

By FREDERICK ROGERS. Extra demy 8vo, 5s. net.

Notes and Queries says—"A most charming book . . . . . adorned by excellent engravings."

POPULAR BALLADS

of the Olden Time. Three series, selected and edited by FRANK SIDGWICK. F'cap 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per vol.

EARLY ENGLISH LYRICS

Amorous, Divine, Moral and Trivial. Chosen by E. K. CHAMBERS and F. SIDGWICK. F'cap 8vo, 6s. net.

"It is a work of true scholarship, as well as of distinguished literary skill."—Manchester Guardian.

THE LETTERS OF JAMES BOSWELL

to the Rev. W. J. TEMPLE, with an Introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"For the real Boswell, in spite of all he wrote, and that has been written about him, you cannot rightly understand till you have read this life-long epistolary confession."—The Nation.

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE

AND OTHER POEMS

By the Rev. CHAS. WOLFE. With a Collotype Facsimile of the original Manuscript of "The Burial of Sir John Moore," with an introductory Memoir by C. LITTON FALKINER. 1s. net.

COMPLETE ENGLISH WORKS OF THOMAS CAMPION

Edited by A. H. BULLEN.

F'cap 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net. A Pocket Editton of the Poems and Masques, reprinted from Mr. Bullen's edition princeps.

[In the Press.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

Pocket Edition, 5¼ by 3⅜ inches. Cl., 1s. net; leather bindings in several styles at various prices.

J. M. SYNGE

THE WELL OF THE SAINTS

With an Introduction by W. B. YEATS.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THOMAS STOTHARD, R.A.

HIS LIFE AND WORK

By A. C. COXHEAD. With 53 full-page Illustrations and cuts in the text. Extra royal 8vo, cheap edition, 8s. 6d. net.

SELECTED POEMS BY LAURENCE HOUSMAN

F'cap 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Chosen by the Author from his four previous books of Verse.

[In the Press.

SAILING SHIPS

THE STORY OF THEIR DEVELOPMENT FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE PRESENT DAY.

16/- net. 16/- net.

By E. KEBLE CHATTERTON.

With over 100 Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings. Extra royal 8vo. 320 pp. Designed cover in cloth gilt.

The illustrations in their scope and variety form a special feature of the book, and great pains have been taken to secure from many quarters the best and most authoritative representations of Sailing Ships in all ages and of all builds.

3, ADAM STREET, ADELPHI, LONDON, W.C.

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS

Published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

HAILEYBURY COLLEGE.

By the Rev. L. S. MILFORD. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The editor has been successful in collecting much fresh information about the early days of the school, and the description of recent developments will serve to accentuate the contrast between September, 1862, and September, 1908.

THE PLACE OF ANIMALS IN HUMAN THOUGHT.

By Countess MARTINENGO CESARESCO. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net.

"The sort of book which makes the reader idly long for Macaulay's memory in which to store all the delightful things which the author has told and shown him. Stories, quotations, comments, and pictures are all alike good."—Spectator.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

With Memoirs of Joseph Knight and Woodfall Ebbsworth. By JOHN COLLINS FRANCIS. With 8 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

In this volume Mr. Francis, the veteran publisher of the Athenæum and Notes and Queries, has collected a number of valuable notes on English Publishing, Journalism, Old London, &c., &c.

GREAT NEW ROMANCE

By the Author of THE BLUE LAGOON.

THE POOLS OF SILENCE.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. 6s.

SOUTH AMERICAN SERIES—NEW VOLUME.

MEXICO: its Ancient and Modern Civilisation; History and Political Conditions; Topography and Natural Resources; Industries and General Development. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME, a Map, and 64 Full-page Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

THE NORFOLK AND SUFFOLK COAST.

By W. A. DUTT. With about 40 Illustrations, 6s. net.

The first volume of a new County Coast Series dealing with the history and romance of coast life.

CHRIST AND THE EASTERN SOUL;

Or, The Witness of the Oriental Conciousness to Jesus Christ.

Lectures delivered on the Barrows Foundation in India and Ceylon in the Cold Season of 1906. By the late CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, President of the Union Theological Seminary. 6s. 6d. net.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS ABOUT THE FUTURE.

By Dr. HENRY BURTON SHARMAN. 13s. 6d. net.

Based on a critical examination of the Synoptic Gospels, this book will call for the serious attention of students of the new Testament.

THE PAPACY:

The Idea and its Exponents.

By GUSTAV KRÜGER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

There has hitherto been no succinct and comprehensive history of the Papacy. It is believed that this volume, by one of the foremost German authorities on ecclesiastical history, will supply a want, since it gives a clear, concise, and impartial account of the development of the Papacy from the earliest times to the accession of Pius X.

L. G. CHIOZZA-MONEY, M.P.,

Contributes an article to the June

INTERNATIONAL REVIEW on

Mr. Lloyd George's First Budget.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE. 1/- NET.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

Point of View," we have technical studies of new developments in warfare, which, highly interesting to the professional soldier, may be commended to the general reader as conveying vividly the sickening details of scientific and overwhelming slaughter as was the case in the assaults on the Russian forts at Port Arthur. What interests the critic in "The Joint in the Harness," however, is the conflict between the author's keen professional enthusiasm over the scene of butchery and his mild pity for the "nice young fellows" whose heads and legs are blown to pieces in their enthusiasm for their calling. Even more interesting than the author's recoil, instinctive but restrained, from the human shambles his imagination has created, is his attempt to moralise civilised warfare by turning into contempt the "mere civilian's" unfitness for the trade of killing. This is a psychological feature in the military man's professional attitude which has not been sufficiently scrutinised. If the modern European were always in a state of chronic, or, indeed, of intermittent warfare with his fellows, the immorality of an individual not being trained, armed, and ready to take the field would indeed be appalling, but the author waves aside much considerations and in his story, "An Eddy of War," reads a moral lecture to the unhappy hero, Mr. Blaythwate, because he is not prepared for the invasion of England when it comes. In the story "The Limit," we find an amusing example of the professional military man's lack of perspective. An English army is supposed to be invading some Continental territory, and two English soldiers are discussing with bitter disgust the refusal of their stay-at-home brothers to join in, men who are "just carrying on their life at home, and have refused to waste their time or money in training or fighting." "It's the whole nation to blame," says one man, "the fool nation, that sits down and expects a few to do the work of the whole lot." This is meant to be a spectacle of infinite pathos.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Arthur Hayden's "Chats on English Earthenware" (Unwin, 5s. net) should have the effect of increasing the number of English collectors of this class of pottery. The volume has been written as a companion to Mr. Hayden's "Chats on Old China," in the same series; and those who recall the workmanlike character of that book will find this to be in no way inferior. Indeed, "Chats on English Earthenware" should make an even wider appeal than its predecessor, not only because earthenware collecting makes less demand upon the purse than does its aristocratic cousin, but for the reason that its manufacture has been more emphatically an English industry. Here, then, we have a handbook, written by a well-known authority, which gives in the concisest possible form all the information that the beginner in earthenware collecting is likely to need. Moreover, it contains one or two features that are not usually found in the multifarious "guides" that are produced today. One is a most lucid description of the process of earthenware manufacture, illustrated with photographs taken at Messrs. Wedgwood's potteries at Etruria; another, the carefully compiled identification tables and lists of prices realised at recent auctions. In the body of the text, the various styles in earthenware, "stoneware," "ironware," &c., in vogue in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, during which the renaissance and the decadence of English pottery took place, are traced to their sources and adequately illustrated. We have an excellent account of the origin and popularity of English delft up to the time when it was supplanted in public favor by the famous Staffordshire salt-glaze ware, the latter in turn giving place to Wedgwood cream ware; of Josiah Wedgwood and the school he founded, and of the Jasper ware which was his crowning achievement in ornamental pottery; and, generally, of all the principal potters and potteries from Dwight of Fulham in the seventeenth century to the early nineteenth century workmen, from the handicraftsmen to the factory system. Wedgwood, whose reputation Mr. Hayden is at pains to defend against some attempts at belittlement that have recently been made against him, is undoubtedly the most conspicuous figure in the annals of eighteenth century earthenware, and the brief, though essentially just, estimate of his place and influence, which is given in these pages, remind us of the singular fact that no official biography of him has yet been published. Surely the time has come for this to be done; and we cannot help thinking that Mr. Hayden is the man to do it. As a comprehensive summary of Wedgwood's art and of the history of earthenware in England, this book is a far more valuable contribution to the subject than its title, which suggests incompleteness, would indicate.

* * *

Nature and Art are blended very harmoniously in the volume of essays, by "The Country Contributor," published under the title of "The Ideas of a Plain Country Woman" (Constable, 3s. net). The Nature appears in the style, which is homely, and in the arrangement, which is discursive; the Art in the saying of a number of old truths in a way that is new and individual. Briefly speaking, the authoress is the apologist of the conservative woman with her elemental life, as against her advanced sister with her demand for "equality"; of the wisdom of the country and the open air, as against that of the city; of the simple emotions as against the complex ones. The sex question is one of absorbing interest at the present time, and most of the argument has come, as, indeed, was inevitable, from the reformers' side, while a good deal of what has been put forward by their antagonists has been based on instinct rather than pure reason. It is, therefore, refreshing, whatever one's opinions on the suffrage and such-like matters, to find among these "Ideas" a fair proportion that are supported by shrewd and persuasive logic. Again, although controversial topics are touched on here, the tone is in no way controversial; the book with its several gleams of humor, its sane and pithy judgments, and its obvious sincerity, the latter involving a desire to avoid smartness—there are one or two epigrams notwithstanding—is markedly tolerant, and could only be called provocative by those waiting and wishing to be provoked. Heartiness, born of the joy of living, is the prevailing note. It is struck again and again in the reminiscences of "full" days passed in a remote and simple American country home, and in the fearless, though not indelicate, treatment of delicate matters such as those dealt with under the titles of "The Marriage Question," "The Truth about Love," and "Old Maids and Single Women." And the note of religion which occurs at times is neither mawkish nor so insistent as to be inconsistent with the genuineness of a work-a-day woman of the type to which we believe "The Country Contributor" belongs; indeed, her expressed convictions would be less convincing without it, adroitly argued as they are. Many excellent people's "Ideas" would receive no damage from the mental stimulus that this book is capable of affording.

* * *

Beginning with an account of the Young Turkish movement from the time of Midhat to the Revolution of last July, and then proceeding to discussions of the international situation in regard to Persia, Tibet, Afghanistan, Korea, and the Baghdad and Hedjaz Railways, Mr. Angus Hamilton's "Problems of the Middle East" (Nash, 12s. 6d. net) supplies information that will be useful to students of international politics. His book is also enriched by maps and the texts of several documents of interest, such as the Turkish Constitution of 1876, the Persian Electoral and Fundamental Laws of 1906 and 1907, and the Baghdad Railway Convention. Mr. Hamilton's standpoint may be gathered from the fact that he favors a policy of intervention in Persia on the part of Great Britain, and, when dealing with Tibet, writes that "there can be no question that the Government of India should be permitted to exercise unfettered control over an irresponsible state lying within the shadow of her own frontier." He seems to have given little heed to the contention that the small countries whose difficulties and dissensions make the Middle East the cockpit of present-day politics may, after all, solve their problems in their own way, and should, at any rate, be given every liberty to make the attempt. But those who differ from Mr. Hamilton's views will often find his information useful. He has a first-hand knowledge of the countries he discusses, and though he sometimes strays into pseudo-picturesque rhetoric, as a rule he writes clearly and well.

* * *

An interesting memoir ("Principal Story: A Memoir by his Daughters," Glasgow, Maclehose & Sons, 10s. 6d.

BLACK'S BEAUTIFUL BOOKS.

NEW VOLUMES.

ESSEX. Painted by BURLEIGH BRUHL, R.B.A. Described by A. R. HOPE MONCRIEFF. Containing 75 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map. Cloth, gilt top Price 20s. net

HAMPSHIRE. Painted by WILFRID BALL, R.E. illustrator of "Sussex" in the same series. Described by the Rev. TELFORD VARLEY. Containing 75 full-page illustrations in colour, and a sketch map. Cloth, gilt top Price 20s. net

LAUSANNE. Painted by J. HARDWICKE LEWIS and MAY HARDWICKE LEWIS. Described by FRANCIS H. GRIBBLE. Containing 20 full-page illustrations in colour. Cloth, gilt top Price 7s. 6d. net

INNS OF COURT. Painted by GORDON HOME. Described by CECIL HEADLAM, M.A. Containing 20 full-page illustrations in colour, and a plan. Cloth, gilt top Price 7s. 6d. net

WORCESTERSHIRE. Painted by THOMAS TYNDALE. Described by A. G. BRADLEY. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour, and a sketch map. Cloth, gilt top Price 7s. 6d. net

THE HEART OF SCOTLAND. By A. R. HOPE MONCRIEFF. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour, by SUTTON PALMER, mostly taken from "Bonnie Scotland," and a sketch map. Cloth, gilt top Price 7s. 6d. net

DUTCH BULBS AND GARDENS. Painted by MIMA NIXON. Described by UNA SILBERRAD and SOPHIE LYALL. Containing 24 full-page illustrations in colour. Cloth. Price 7s. 6d. net

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London, W.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

The History of "The Daily News" is part of the History of modern England. Since its foundation by Charles Dickens in 1846, "The Daily News" has consistently fought for the Liberty of the People, for Social Progress, for all that makes life worth living.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

THE NEW DARWINISM

MR. JOHN LANE will publish on Wednesday next:—

THE MAKING OF SPECIES

By DOUGLAS DEWAR and FRANK FINN.

Demy 8vo. 15 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

 It is believed that this work will effect a revolution in biological thought only a little less marked than that wrought fifty years ago by the ORIGIN OF SPECIES. The authors are true disciples of DARWIN, seeking not to destroy but to revivify his great hypothesis. They present it in the form compelled by new discoveries.

A NEW POET

MR. LANE has just published:—

A VISION OF LIFE.

POEMS BY DARRELL FIGGIS.

With an Introduction by G. K. Chesterton, 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN LANE: The Bodley Head, W.

net), of the late Dr. Story, Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glasgow, and one of his Majesty's chaplains in Scotland, has been written by his daughters. Dr. Story was one of the ablest and most vigorous champions of the Church of Scotland. From the very first year of his being sent up as a member of the General Assembly he showed his practical interest in the affairs of the Church by taking a prominent part in the debates. He was very often in opposition to the general feeling of the House, but he was never deterred by fear of being in what he once called "an enormous minority" from expressing his opinion in discussions which he felt might lead to action vital or hurtful to the best interests of the Church. For Carlyle (whom he knew well) and his teaching Dr. Story had the greatest veneration. "When he dies," he once wrote, "the man who has taught me more than any other is gone, and leaves the world darker and poorer." Later, in a letter to Lady Frances Balfour, he wrote: "I think Froude utterly unjustifiable in printing all poor old Carlyle's scribblings, lots of which I don't suppose Carlyle ever thought of being published, and which are in part evidently little else than soliloquies written down in moods of sorrow and preoccupation. There is a good deal of ill-nature, however, that one is sorry to see in the mind of so great a prophet; but then he was frightfully dyspeptic, and that accounts for much." A warm friendship existed between Dr. Story and Dean Stanley, and a good anecdote is told by the writers concerning the latter's absence of mind and indifference to dress. Coming down to dinner with one side of his collar unfastened and flapping uncomfortably over his coat, the Dean's hostess drew attention to the fact. "Ah, yes," said Dean Stanley pleasantly, "I couldn't manage to fasten it before I came down. But I don't mind. Do you?" Lady Frances Balfour contributes an appreciative memoir of Dr. Story to the volume.

* * *

A SELECTION from the writings of St. Thomas Aquinas has been translated into English by Mr. H. C. O'Neill under the title, "New Things and Old in Saint Thomas Aquinas" (Dent, 3s. 6d. net). Mr. O'Neill's plan has been to group together representative extracts under such headings as "The Efficacy of Prayer," "Determinism," "The Incarnation," "Papal Power," "The Soul," "The Intellect and Knowledge." Care seems to have been exercised in choosing the extracts, and the volume gives a good conspectus of the "Angelic Doctor's" teaching upon most of the great theological and philosophical questions. To translate St. Thomas Aquinas was a difficult task which Mr. O'Neill has performed well. His rendering has smoothness and ease, while his choice of English equivalents for the Latin technical words is upon the whole excellent. A further merit of the book is the Life of St. Thomas Aquinas, which is prefixed as an introduction to the selections. This is well abreast with recent researches, though we think Mr. O'Neill exaggerates the opposition between the "Summa" and the tenets of modernism.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, June 4. | Price Friday morning, June 11. |
|---|---|---|
| Consols 2½ per cent. ... ... ... | 84$\frac{1}{16}$ ... | 84$\frac{3}{16}$ |
| German 3 per cent. ... ... ... ... | 85 ... | 84$\frac{1}{2}$ |
| Steel Common ... ... ... ... ... | 70 ... | 69$\frac{5}{8}$ |
| Southern Pacific ... ... ... ... ... | 132 ... | 135 |
| Rand Mines ... ... ... ... ... | 10$\frac{13}{32}$ ... | 10$\frac{15}{32}$ |

THE Board of Trade Returns for May were as good as could be expected, and confirm the statistics of pauperism and unemployment. Taken together they suggest that trade generally is reviving. At this time last year the movement was rapidly downwards. Now it is slowly upwards. When the American tariff is settled and favorable crops are assured, we may see a considerable expansion and a fairly Tight money market in the autumn. This seems to be the view of American bankers, some of whom certainly expect the Bank of England rate to be 4 per cent. in the autumn, and are speculating in bills on that basis. As to the returns themselves, the best feature of them is the increased import of raw materials. The higher value and lower volume of food stuffs are the natural consequence of the high price of corn. But this in all probability will be remedied by the crops. Another bad harvest would be a disaster for the world. The outlook, so far as this country is concerned, is clouded by fears of a strike in the coal fields of Wales or Scotland or both. Considering how well both mine owners and miners have done during the general depression, the nation ought to be able to count upon them coming to an accommodation in their own interests primarily, but also for the common good. The rains have done great things for the agricultural districts. They have saved the hay crops and have made the corn crops look promising. In spite of the late frosts the fruit reports are good. On the Stock Exchange dulness has supervened. Gilt-edged securities have fallen away; but activity continues in the Mining markets.

THE CHARTERED BOOM.

On Monday quite a boom took place in the shares of the Chartered Company. Thousands of shares changed hands, we are told, "and nearly a million sterling was added to the market capitalisation in a few hours." Rumor assisted as usual, e.g., that Rhodesia would join the South African Federation on favorable terms, and that the Transvaal Government is going to take over the railways, also on favorable terms, of course. Others ascribe the movement to a strong bull syndicate which hopes to produce a rising market, in which the public will buy, and then get rid of its shares at a profit. At one moment the price rose to 36s. It is not long since the shares were almost unsaleable at less than half that price.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S NEW TABLE OF PRICES.

A fortnight ago the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. MacVeagh, made public at Washington a table of forty-six articles in common use, which he had prepared at President Taft's request to show the effect of the Payne and Aldrich tariffs upon the cost of living. The publication indicates that the President really is thinking about "the ultimate consumer." One table shows that of forty-three articles enumerated, twenty-one were of domestic origin, and that no articles of such character and value were imported. These articles, on which the American manufacturer absolutely controls the domestic market, are men's suits and overcoats, felt hats, men's shoes, iron cook-stoves, heating stoves, beds with springs, cotton sheets, bureaus, dining tables, chairs, porcelain dinner sets, tin cups, iron knives and forks, tin pails, hams and bacon, wheat flour, go-carts. On only three of these articles, felt hats, men's shoes, and cotton sheets, are the duties reduced. On iron knives and forks they are increased to 45 cents from a compound duty ranging from 33 to 36 cents a dozen. The Senate Bill shows reductions from the Payne Bill on women's gloves and cotton sheets, and increases on hams and bacon and cabbages. In some cases more than a third, in most cases more than a quarter, of the whole price is accounted for by the duty. The duties on common woollen goods are crushing, and the cost is so high that few poor people can afford them. I know of almost first-class "pensions" in New York where the so-called woollen blankets are entirely made of cotton. The plague of tuberculosis is largely ascribed by American doctors to the impossible prices of goods made out of real wool.

LUCELLUM.

THE LEGAL Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell,
The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane,
The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£17 17s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.

£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.

£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary.
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. | 84, Piccadilly, W.
82, Strand, W.C. | 25, Cannon Street, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

A SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

(Open to Men and Women)

Will be held in Oxford 13th-24th September, 1909.

Among the Lecturers will be PROFESSORS S. R. DRIVER, PERCY GARDNER, E. VON DOBSCHUTZ, J. H. MOULTON, DRS. R. H. CHARLES, H. RASHDALL, J. E. CARPENTER, G. B. GRAY, REV. GEORGE TYRRELL, COUNT GOBLET D'ALVIELLA, MR. R. R. MARETT and others.

The fee for the course of about 50 lectures is £1. Applications for details and tickets to be made to

REV. A. J. CARLYLE, Univ. Coll., Oxford, or
REV. G. W. THATCHER, Mansfield Coll., Oxford, } Secs.

TANGYES TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

Splendid situation. Health Record one of the best in the Kingdom.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

LADY MARY MURRAY, 131, Banbury Road, Oxford, warmly recommends for board and residence, with or without Tuition, FRAULEIN METZEROTH, 13 Waltershauser, Strasse, Gotha, Germany.—Terms: £5 per month.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

ST. HELENS, CLIFTON, GLOS.

SCHOOL for a limited number of Girls of good social position. Thorough education on modern lines. Healthy outdoor life, with due attention to Games and Physical Exercise. Principals: MISS WINGATE, M.A. Dublin (Math. Trip. Cambs.), and MISS POTTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. M. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea.

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line,
52 , ... ... 6d. ,,

SUMMER-TIME BOOKS.

By Meadow, Grove, and Stream.

An Introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With two folded Coloured Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece, and 171 figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"It is a serviceable book for the young and their teachers." —Times.

"It is written with care and knowledge."—Westminster Gazette.

Adventures in Bird-Land.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, F.Z.S., Author of "Home Life in Bird-Land," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," etc. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author, and 100 Pen Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON, Demy 8vo, 6s. net, cloth gilt.

"Excellent illustrations and text in an alluring formation make a delightful volume."—Guardian.

"It is an ideal gift-book."—Amateur Photographer.

"Every boy and every man who loves birds will be delighted with this book."—Manchester Guardian.

The Brook and its Banks.

By the Rev. J. G. WOOD. New Edition. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"It is a charmingly written series of chapters in natural history. A reader of the book will be instructed without knowing it."—Scotsman.

By-Paths in Nature.

By FRANK STEVENS. Author of "Adventures in Pondland," etc. With 72 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"We cannot recommend this book too highly for the young student of Nature, and also for the teacher in his preparation for natural history object-lessons."—British Weekly.

Boy's Own Nature Book.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an introduction by the Hon. Sir JOHN COCKBURN, K.C.M.G., M.D. With two folded Coloured Plates, a Coloured Frontispiece, and 64 Plates, containing over 150 Pictures reproduced from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, M.A. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Will give boys an increased interest in the things they see in fields and woods or on the shore."—Daily Mail.

Every Boy's Book of British Natural History.

A reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord AVEBURY. Large crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"It should certainly prove sufficient to arouse enthusiasm for a delightful study."—Athenæum.

"It is a most excellently written and brightly illustrated volume."—Standard.

Fifty-two Nature Rambles.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With five Coloured Plates from Drawings, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo. 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"The pictures are too lovely for description."—Daily Chronicle.

"The studies are simply accurate and entertaining. The book will certainly prove very pleasing to any boy or girl with a relish for rural delights."—Morning Post.

Gleanings from the Fields of Nature.

By EDWARD T. CONNOLD, F.Z.S., F.E.S. With an Introduction by DAVID ANDERSON-BERRY, M.D., F.R.S.E. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 pages of Plates from Photographs, Photo-micrographs, and Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, medallion on cover, 3s. 6d.

"The illustrations are very good."—Field.

"The Author says much that is interesting concerning the spider, ants, wasps, dragonflies, &c., and some common objects of the sea-shore."—Athenæum.

How to Study Wild Flowers.

By Rev. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., etc., Author of "Plants of the Bible." New Edition, with 12 double-page Coloured Plates and 57 other Illustrations. 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"Professor Henslow has produced a volume which can be made of the greatest educational value, and is admirably suited alike for the private student and as a class-book." —School Guardian.

Home Life in Bird-Land.

By OLIVER G. PIKE, F.Z.S. With 4 Coloured Plates, and over 80 other Illustrations from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

"Mr. Oliver G. Pike has given us another delightful book." Morning Post.

"It is an entertaining volume."—The Field.

"Mr. Pike ranks high amongst bird photographers." —Manchester Guardian.

Woodland, Field, and Shore.

Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera. By OLIVER G. PIKE, F.Z.S. With two Coloured Plates and 101 Engravings of Birds, Animals, and Insects from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"Whether Mr. Pike writes about the denizens of a suburban orchard or a Surrey common, his matter is always interesting. All his illustrations are excellent."—Westminster Gazette.

Rambles with Nature Students.

By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN. With 130 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth.

"An admirable little guide for all who are weary of bricks and mortar."—Academy.

Hidden Beauties of Nature.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G,S. With 59 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth.

"Mr. Kerr has laid all lovers of the microscope and of natural history under a heavy debt by his diligent enterprise and enthusiasm. His book is full of wonderful 'things of beauty,' and is a credit to himself and his publishers."—Science Siftings.

Nature: Through Micro-scope and Camera.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S. Illustrated with 65 Photo-micrographs. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

"The marvels of the infinitely little are beautifully illustrated in Mr. Kerr's book."—Daily Mail.

Nature, Curious and Beautiful.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S. With 69 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

"There could be no better book through which to introduce a young reader to the study of nature."—Scotsman.

Ponds and Rock Pools.

With Hints on Collecting for, and the Management of, the Micro-Aquarium. By HENRY SCHERREN. 2s., cloth.

"A history of most of the inhabitants of ponds and sea-pools which are likely to fall under the notice of a young biological student."—Academy.

Through a Pocket Lens.

By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S. Illustrated. 2s. cloth.

"An exceedingly useful book, in which the powers of the pocket lens have not been exaggerated. We cannot imagine a more useful preliminary training for a young student than working with a pocket lens through the course indicated by the author."—Field.

Published by the Religious Tract Society, 4, Bouverie St., and 65, St. Paul's, London, E.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 12.] SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 405 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| The Argument for the Land Taxes | 408 |
| A Word to Adullamites | 409 |
| The Road to Indian Self-government | 410 |
| A Clerical Coalition | 411 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| A Turf for Manners | 412 |
| The Poetry of the Early Church | 414 |
| The Destruction of Dialect | 415 |
| Pockets of Spring | 416 |
| Open Questions:— | |
| Religion and Conduct. By Sidney Low | 417 |
| Present-Day Problems:— | |
| Organised Labor and Practical Politics.—III. By T. Kirkup | 418 |
| The Drama:— | |
| The First-fruits of Endowment. By William Archer | 419 |
| Communications:— | |
| Trade under Town-planning. By George Haw | 421 |
| Glastonbury as a Cemetery for the Empire. By the Rev. C. L. Marson | 422 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| The Incorrigible Censor. By A. | 422 |
| A Persian Quaker. By M. H. L. B. | 423 |
| The Intellects of Men and Women. By Edith Hunter | 423 |
| Women and War. By Henry W. Nevinson & Hilda A. Walker | 423 |
| Ministers and the Party. By John B. Martindale | 424 |
| The Tsar's Visit to England. By J. Allanson Picton | 424 |
| Reason and Instinct. By a Student of Bergson | 424 |
| The Break-up of the Poor Law. By George Lansbury and St. John G. Ervine | 424 |
| A "Daily Mail" Expert. By an Old War Correspondent | 425 |
| Fire Brigades and Fire Insurance. By A. E. Brown | 425 |
| The Defects of the Liberal Propaganda. By G. Wallace Carter | 426 |
| Poetry:— | |
| Knitting. By William H. Davies | 426 |
| The World of Books | 427 |
| Books to be read | 427 |
| Reviews:— | |
| The Patriotism of Venice | 428 |
| The Father of Modern Protectionism | 429 |
| The Hussite Movement | 430 |
| Some Excursions in Poetry | 430 |
| A Factory of Shoddy | 432 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| Dante in English Literature | 434 |
| The Love Affairs of Napoleon | 434 |
| The Exile of St. Helena | 434 |
| The School of Madrid | 434 |
| Adventures in Contentment | 436 |
| The Christian Minister and his Duties | 436 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 436 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

Something like a small cave has been formed among Liberal Members of Parliament to resist the land taxes in the Budget. These gentlemen have twice met, and their names have been duly blazoned forth in the Tory newspapers. We hope that their constituents will take equal and early note of them, for though their names include some gentlemen who are generally faithful to their professed creed, and are serious critics on points of detail, others are Liberals only in name. Mr. Harold Cox, for example, is a Tory individualist, and Mr. Rees has sat on the Liberal side for three years without, so far as we know, ever delivering a Liberal speech. Others, like Mr. Ridsdale, Mr. Chance, and Mr. Beck, have been most uncertain supporters of Liberal principles, one or two reflect some personal disappointment, others, again, represent landed estates or large interests in property. Generally, the cave resembles the earlier Whig Adullamites, who destroyed the Russell-Gladstone Reform Bill. It is not at all a large one, and it is a healthy sign that its occupants shrink from publicity, and from the charge of opposition to the Budget as distinct from special criticism. Meanwhile, it is pointed out that Sir John Dickson Poynder, their leader, was chairman of the meeting in Drury Lane Theatre on land taxation, when, after a speech by the late Prime Minister, a resolution was passed in favor of the valuation of land on its capital value, and of the rating and taxing of land values. They have interviewed the Prime Minister and Mr. George, without result.

Meanwhile, a stage army of hostile interests is being marched and re-marched across the stage. Our old friends the City, the Primrose League, the anti-Socialist Union, and the Liberty and Property Defence League, have been joined by a nominally new organisation, called the Budget Protest League, with Mr. Walter Long as its President, Captain Jessel (of the anti-Progressive movement in London) as its Chairman, and Mr. Raine (of the Coal Consumers' League) as its Secretary. Finally, an Association of corporate bodies has been formed, with Mr. Douglas Pennant (of the Penrhyn family) as Secretary, to resist the land taxes. This body includes such ardent progressives as Sir William Anson, Sir Nevile Lubbock, Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, Lord Valentia, and Lord Rothschild, who seems subtly to pervade all these alarums and excursions of the about-to-be-impoverished rich. For convenience of reference, we hope that these bodies will adopt a common address for their very slightly differentiated activities.

* * *

On the other hand, all observers report a movement of great enthusiasm and determined support for the land clauses, on which the fate of the Budget, of the Government, and of the Liberal Party itself depends. A Hyde Park demonstration has been arranged, in which the Labor Party will probably co-operate. On Thursday next a luncheon to the Prime Minister is being organised by the Land and Housing Reform Committee, at which Sir John Brunner will preside, and a great gathering of Liberal members will take place. Mr. Asquith's speech will, of course, be an event of the first importance, in view of his firm and unhesitating support of the land clauses, as well as of the entire scheme of the Budget. We may note, by the way, that the new number of the "Economic Journal" contains a temperate approval of the Budget from the pen of so great an authority as Professor Bastable.

* * *

But the most enlightening defence of the Budget has come from one of our own Junkers, Lord Onslow, who, after exaggerating the amount of the new charges on his properties, and stating, against the obvious facts, that their value in no way arose from the efforts of the State or the local community, declared that he was about to part with a portion of his estate near Guildford. Foreseeing such legislation as the Budget, he had lately sold part of his holding on terms, he hinted, which gave him as many pounds as it had formerly yielded shillings. Now, in view of the demand for land for "residential purposes," he was going to sell more of it. In other words, having "held up" his acres against the public, he now, under pressure of the coming tax on undeveloped land, proposes to satisfy the demand for them. According to the "Daily Chronicle," two such sales to the Guildford Board of Guardians were at the rate of £250 and £300 per acre, so that the Budget would appear to be Lord Onslow's "open sesame" to untold wealth. All we can say is that if Lord Onslow is prepared to sell his land on reasonable terms we are delighted to hear it, and hope that his brother Junkers will widely follow his example.

In that case the Surrey County Council may have a chance of gratifying some of the hundreds of applications for small holdings which it has received and rebuffed. Lord Onslow further proposes to cease directly employing carpenters and other workmen for estate repairs. On which we have to remark that if this be an uneconomic use of his land, the sooner he abandons it the better, and if it be a mere political device, we can hardly conceive a meaner one.

* * *

On Tuesday Sir Edward Grey, in answer to Mr. Morrell, said the Government assumed "full responsibility" for the Tsar's visit "to the English Channel," which would take place in August. Four Liberal members joined in questioning, and a Labor member, Mr. Thorne, called out that he hoped the Tsar "would get his deserts." We hope for nothing of the kind, but we are convinced that the great majority of British people echo the Labor Party's protest, and that if the Tsar landed on these shores they would receive him either in silence or with open disapproval. Nor, we think, would any separate vote for the expenses of his visit pass the present House of Commons. The visit exhibits the sharpest opposition between the deep historic sentiments of our people and the supposed interests of the foreign policy, with its anti-German purpose, laid down for them.

* * *

What we suppose we must call the State visit of the Colonial journalists to the capital was rounded off on Saturday by a visit to the Fleet at Spithead. The visitors, to whom Lord Rosebery appealed to witness the pitiless "pressure" put upon this "little island," were conducted through eighteen miles of battleships, occupied by 144 ships of war, a total which, we observe, is to be swollen, for the purposes of the coming manœuvres, to 350 vessels, distributed in three fleets. Of the 24 battleships in line at Spithead—which excluded the ships forming the third and fourth divisions of the Home Fleet, and most of the Mediterranean Fleet—it may briefly be said that 23 of them are heavier and probably more powerful vessels than any existing battleship in the German Navy. The same may be said of the three so-called cruisers of the "Dreadnought" type, which are more formidable engines of war than any battleship afloat. Counting these vessels, and reckoning in the two "Lord Nelsons," the fleet included nine vessels of the "Dreadnought" type, and eight "King Edwards," which alone could blow the whole German Fleet out of the water. As to our vast strength in armored cruisers only sixteen out of forty were exhibited to the eyes of our visitors. We are not surprised at the comment by Mr. Macdonald, the managing editor of the Toronto "Globe," that the sight of the fleet drove him to reflect how great must be the "uncivilised remainders" of international life in Europe.

* * *

Meanwhile, we are bound to add a word as to the double deception practised on the colonial editors. The first deception, as to the state of our defences, was, we hope, exposed at Spithead. The second, the attempt to enlist these gentlemen in the service of tariff reform and conscription, was, we think, also defeated. But we do not think that it was to the credit of the daily press of London that the occasion was used so largely for the advertisement of two or three papers, and that the organisation of the functions was largely placed in the hands of persons closely connected with the Tariff Reform League. So intimate was this association that, to mention one fact among many, a Cabinet Minister was presented by one of these persons with a list of guests from which Liberal and Free Trade journalists here and in the colonies had been thoughtfully omitted. This is not the first time that Colonial journalists have been made the instruments of British party politics, and it will not be the last. Liberal statesmen and newspaper men are perhaps a little to blame for remissness. On a future occasion they may be earlier and better advised.

* * *

Lord Morley speaking at Oxford to the Civil Service Probationers, strongly defended the Indian deportations under the Regulation of 1818. He admitted that they were violations of habeas corpus, but declared the measure to have been framed under as "good a law as any on our Statute-book," said that the evidence had been examined by the Governor-General in Council, and by four Lieutenant-Governors—not, we think, satisfactory substitutes for Courts of Law, especially in the light of the recent trials—and pleaded generally for the necessity of an "emergency power" for Government. But he promised to revise the cases next month. On Thursday the Prime Minister affirmed all these positions, in language of some rigor. He admitted, in answer to Radical questioning, that the Government had not framed, or intended to frame, any charges against those who had been deported. This was inherent in the nature of the Regulation, which provided for cases in which there might not be "sufficient ground to institute any judicial proceeding." But what of the risks of condemning the wrongly accused, and of making criminals of men who merely hamper our ruling system? Mr. Asquith added that criticism of the Government in the House might revive the elements of mischief in India, and refused amendment of the Regulation.

* * *

The Welsh Disestablishment Bill has been withdrawn for the Session, a course which we anticipated when it was introduced. But the Prime Minister has appeased an incipient revolt of the Welsh members by promising to make it the leading measure of next year—a decision which seems to promise a Dissolution in the autumn of 1910. The path of the Budget has been further cleared by an allotment of time for the Housing and Irish Land Bills. The former Bill, which has already sustained twenty-three days' debate in Grand Committee, is to have two days in Committee of the whole House and one day for report and third reading. The Irish Land Bill is to have eleven more days allotted to it—eight in Committee, two for report, and one for third reading. We confess to some sympathy with Lord Robert Cecil's complaint, made in reference to the allotment of two days to the Housing Bill, that the guillotine is destroying the efficiency of the House of Commons. It is also, we are afraid, strengthening the power of the House of Lords.

* * *

The referendum in Natal has ended, as we expected, in a decisive majority for Union with the South African States, 11,121 people recording a favorable vote against 3,701 hostile suffrages. Every constituency contained a majority for Union. White South Africa will therefore soon be a united Dominion of the Crown. Sir George Farrar has stated that this great historical event was due to the war, not to the grant of self-government. But it is notorious that not one step to federation was taken, or could have been taken, until Lord Milner's bureaucratic machinery had been swept away, and free units created in the former Dutch States. Every Dutch statesman in South Africa would have opposed union under the conditions which prevailed after the war.

* * *

The Tsar and the Kaiser met in Finnish waters on Thursday, and fears for the Tsar's safety led to the firing on a British vessel either by a guardship of his yacht or a torpedo boat. The Tsar was accompanied by M. Stolypin and M. Isvolski, the Kaiser by Herr von Schön, the Foreign Secretary, and the German Ambassador to St. Petersburg. The German Press has been sedulously pointing out that there is nothing in this meeting to distress either France or England, and that no change in European policy is aimed. The "Rossiya," which is M. Stolypin's organ, says that friendly relations with Germany are thoroughly consistent with Russia's special relations with France and England; and it takes occasion to explode once more the fable that during the Servian crisis Germany forced Russia's hand by menace. Perhaps the true meaning of the meeting is rendered by the "Novoe Vremya," which insists that in the event of an Anglo-German war, Russia's interest and duty would be to observe the strictest neutrality. One may draw the conclusion that though the meeting between the Tsar and the Kaiser will not alter the general lines of European policy, it will frustrate the efforts being made to give the Triple Entente a specifically anti-German point.

* * *

The report of the Finance Reform Committee drafted by the Centre and the Conservatives came before the Reichstag on Wednesday. A day or two before the Government had issued its proposed substitutes for some of the rejected taxes. These include a modified form of death duty calculated to produce half the estimated revenue from the original death duty. In the course of the debate the position of the Government was made clear up to a certain point. Prince Bülow said that they would insist upon some kind of inheritance tax as the only practical form of direct taxation, and Herr von Sydow said that they would not accept the Committee's taxes on stocks and milling and exported coal. Prince Bülow urged the Conservatives to make some concession, so that the Liberals could cooperate in the finance reform. He declared that death duties were inevitable sooner or later. What impression this appeal has made is not obvious, and Prince Bülow did not commit himself to an announcement that he would resign if the Conservatives remained obdurate.

* * *

On Monday President Penna of Brazil died. The Vice-President, Senhor Nilo Pecanha, has taken office, and there has been no disturbance, but this political crisis has come at a difficult moment. In March next a new President will in the natural course of events have to be elected. The deceased President Penna had nominated Senhor Campista, the Finance Minister, as the official candidate, and he in the normal course would have been elected. General Fonseca, however, the Minister of War, tendered his resignation as a protest, and, of course, he had the Army behind him. The President refused to accept his resignation, but Senhor Campista has been put out of the running, and General Fonseca himself has come forward as a candidate. He professes to support economy in armaments—it may be remembered that Brazil has entered on an extensive naval programme—but the most important State in Brazil, Sao Paolo, is against him. If he were defeated, there would be no little danger of a military revolution, and in any case the prospect of the Army dictating the choice of a President is not very pleasing.

* * *

On Friday evening week, at about 9.15, the South of France was shaken by an earthquake. The shock lasted a few seconds, and was most severe in the department of the Bouches-du-Rhône. The village of St. Cannat was wrecked, at least ten persons were killed, and most of the houses reduced to ruins. At Lambesc the damage was concentrated in a single quarter, but even more lives were lost, while at Rognes, the most northerly part of the region affected, eight persons were killed. Many other villages suffered heavily, and the casualties in all amount to fifty-five killed and several hundred injured. Had the shock come a few hours later and found everybody in bed, the destruction of life would have been much heavier .

* * *

The abolition of the Senior Wranglership puts an end to a competition which was in its way almost as much of an English institution as the Derby or the University Boat Race. It is perhaps a pity that a distinction in which the popular interest has always been great should be wiped out just as the democratic ladder to the Universities was beginning to be firmly planted. Thus the last Senior Wrangler, Mr. Percy John Danfell, was a Warwick County Scholar, and Mr. G. H. Livens, who was bracketed fourth Wrangler, was a pupil in a London elementary school. Mr. C. Galton Darwin, who was also bracketed fourth, was a grandson of Charles Darwin, while the ninth Wrangler, Mr. Benegal Narsinga Rau, was a student of the Presidency College, Madras, where he won the Government of India's leaving scholarship.

* * *

Lieutenant Shackleton, the leader of the British Antarctic Expedition, arrived in London on Monday, and, after a great popular welcome, was entertained by the Royal Societies Club and by Mr. Heinemann. His speeches in thanks were of admirable quality, full of frankness, and of a simple poetic charm, contrasting with the more purely scientific character of those of his famous predecessor in Polar adventure, Nansen. That he is a great leader of men the records of his journey amply show, and it is a singular proof of the quality of his captaincy that every member of his present expedition has pledged himself to return with him for a following attempt to capture the secret of the South Pole.

* * *

The second test match was easily won on Wednesday by Australia at Lords by nine wickets. England, after a tolerable but not brilliant first innings of 269, found their slow or medium bowling well mastered by Australia, and against the Colonists' 350 runs broke down completely in their second trial. Playing at once with rashness and poor spirit, they only put together 121 runs, leaving Australia with 41 to win. The defeat was due to the bad judgment of the Selection Committee and the bad play of the English eleven. The former committed the two errors which it would seem easiest for them to avoid. They omitted to provide a fast bowler for a ground peculiarly suited to him, and they left out Mr. Jessop, who is perhaps the least nervous, and certainly the most adventurous, batsman in England. The Australians, on the other hand, seem to have recovered all their characteristic qualities, such as steadiness in batting and power of combination in the field. But we cannot believe that they are superior to our best English sides.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ARGUMENT FOR THE LAND TAXES.

We do not attach overmuch importance to the resistance which is being threatened by a small number of undistinguished members of the Liberal Party to the land taxes proposed in the Budget. But it may be as well now to state briefly the reasons why these taxes have been placed in the forefront, and why, in fact, they form the core of the whole measure by which the Government must stand or fall. We have to look forward to the necessity for a considerable increase of national expenditure. The genuine needs of social reform on the one hand, the perpetual pressure for panic-armaments on the other, work in the same direction whichever party is in power and whether the progressive or the reactionary spirit dominates the public mind. New sources of revenue have, therefore, to be found, and at bottom, when we get below the tangle of controversy, we find two directions, and two only, in which they can be sought. The burden may be imposed on the necessaries and comforts of the people, on the materials, appliances, and processes of industry and commerce. That is the method, disguise it as we may, of the Tariff Reformer. Or it may be imposed on the economic surplus, on the mass of unearned wealth and of luxurious expenditure. That is the method of Mr. Lloyd George, and its most distinctive point of application is in the land taxes of the Budget. There are other elements of "surplus" besides the inflated rents of urban land, and with some of them the Budget directly or indirectly deals. Thus it imposes a moderate super-tax on all very large incomes; it reclaims for the nation a portion of the monopoly value which has been given away in the form of licences to sell intoxicating liquor. But it is in relation to the land, to the taxation of unearned increment and of undeveloped value, that the principle has its clearest application, and admits of the most useful development. Let us clearly understand what the object of these taxes is, why they are both necessary, and why they provoke such determined opposition.

We may usefully begin with the last point. The opposition is not based on the actual amount of the tax. In particular, the halfpenny in the pound on the value of undeveloped land is obviously a small affair. Be it remembered that all land valued at less than £50 an acre is excluded, and that even above this limit value due to the agricultural capabilities of the soil is not to be taken into account. What remains? On an acre of land suitable for building purposes, but undeveloped for those purposes, which is valued as worth £1,000 in the open market, the tax would amount to a little under £2. It is not the £2 that causes these searchings of heart. It is the necessity for valuation. It is the interest of the public to know accurately, and it is not the interest of landlords that it should be known accurately, what the value of the land of the country really is. It is not their interest, because on the present system they are taxed and rated on one value, but if it comes to selling, and particularly selling to the public, they proceed on quite a different value. The land clauses are disliked, not for the burden which they impose, but for the basis which they lay down for future transactions between the community and the landlord.

There are those who accept the tax on unearned increment, and reserve their opposition for the tax on undeveloped estates, though the former will in a short time bring in a large and the latter will never produce more than a small return to the Exchequer. Here again is an apparent paradox. It would seem that the landlord and his friends accept the bigger and object to the smaller burden, and here again the secret lies in the word "valuation." The taxation of the unearned increment starts from a date when enormous increments of value have avowedly passed into private hands. Except for the small portion that is recoverable by the tax on reversions, the increment which will come in for duty will be calculated from present values as zero. It will be all future increment. That being so, the obvious method of delaying the action of the tax would be to place existing values as high as possible, while it would be the interest of the valuers from Somerset House to keep them down. It is on this point that the development tax acts as a check on both sides. If the present value of land is unduly swollen by the inclusion of speculative value, it will be taxed as undeveloped land. If it is unduly depreciated, increment will soon accrue. Let us take the case of the same acre of land as before; let us suppose that it is now let to a market gardener for £3 a year, so that its capital value on that basis might be £75. Let us suppose that for building purposes it might readily find a willing purchaser at £1,000. If the landlord seeks to value it, say, at £800, he will have to pay 20 per cent. on the increment when he sells it, as he may do any day, at its full value. That is, he imposes on himself a possible tax of £40. From this point of view it will be his object to keep the value up. It will be better for him to pay the halfpenny tax on the undeveloped value, which is under £2 per annum. But if he exceeds, if, for instance, he puts the value at £1,100, he will be paying a halfpenny in the £ on a hundred pounds for which he will get no return. It is, therefore, his interest to find the true probable figure at which he can sell, and the interest of the Somerset House valuers will be the same. The case for the taxes, therefore, is simply the case for fair valuation, and taxation on real market value.

What is the strength of this case? We have only to think for a moment of the history of our great towns, we have only to form a mental picture of their existing condition and year to year expansion, to supply the answer. Stand at any point on the four mile radius from Charing Cross and consider the belt of country stretching ten or twenty miles beyond the site of the newer and greater London. Within the lifetime of middle-aged people this tract of land has been in the main converted from heath and common, marsh or plough land, into the seat of scores of prosperous suburbs, busy factories, canal wharves, railway sidings. What has effected the transformation? Not the foresight, energy, or administrative capacity of the owners of the soil as such.

Good ownership may here and there have assisted, and bad ownership retarded the process. But the mainspring has been the vital energy of the people, the whole complex mass of social causes that have given England industrial prosperity, and have made London the centre of the world's commerce. If reward went to the individual in proportion to his services, and were handed on to his descendants, what percentage of this wealth would go to the descendants of Watt and Stevenson, of Cobden and Bright, of all the discoverers and inventors, the thinkers, statesmen, and administrators, to whose efforts we owe this vast and peaceable expansion of an orderly and healthy community? We know no way of making the computation; but we are sure that the percentage so expended would be so great as to leave not much for those who have condescended to own the soil, and who have actually received the money. This vast increase has fallen into private hands, through the carelessness and want of forethought too characteristic of our public life, and the result is that we have to bear a burden that presses too heavily on the many whom our industrial progress has left poor.

It will be said—we ourselves have said—that the landlords fear the taxes not for the burden they actually impose, but for the valuation which they necessitate. We have pointed out that as the duties are arranged it will be in the interest of both sides to arrive at a fair value, and why should owners object to a fair valuation? The answer is in part that such a valuation will become, whether by custom or by statute law, the basis of price in compulsory purchases, but mainly that it will facilitate the next step in fiscal reform—that is to say, the shifting of the burden of local taxation from buildings to sites. What discourages building, what weighs upon the householder, and accentuates the housing problem at present is that our municipal finance, unable as it is to draw on the unearned increment for its revenue, is forced to impose the whole cost of the government of a town on buildings and sites indiscriminately. The result is a heavy tax on bricks and mortar, which for all social purposes it would be desirable to relieve as far as possible from all taxation. The separate valuation of the site necessitated by the Finance Bill will make it possible to lay a portion of the rate on the site, and so relieve the building. It is this change, perfectly just, and socially most desirable, which the owners of urban land anticipate with dismay. But the measure of their fears is the measure of the hope for democracy. The Budget has given new life to the Liberal Party, and brought it once more into line with those democratic forces which threatened at the close of last year to diverge from it. What is needed now is the resolution to despise timid counsels, ignore ridiculous threats, measure the opposition of unrepresentative men at its true worth, and deal drastically with any treason in the citadel. We have not always agreed with Mr. Asquith, but we rejoice to feel assured that some of his most distinguished qualities, his intellectual lucidity and directness, his powers of impressive speech, and his unflinching loyalty to his colleagues and to his declared policy, are precisely those which the present situation demands in the chief of the party in power.

A WORD TO ADULLAMITES.

The organisers of the small "Cave" on the land taxes in the Budget may be held to have justified that title, if not by their numbers, at least by the somewhat retiring, not to say furtive, character of their movements. For our part, we hope that, whoever they are and whatever they mean, they will come into the light and enable their constituents to judge them. A very few of them are, we believe, convinced Liberals, and we should be the last to deprecate fair criticism of a Liberal Government or close examination of a new and necessarily complicated scheme of taxation. But there is no point in disguising the fact that the tidal wave of 1906 washed into the House of Commons a handful of men who feared and resisted its force and sweep, and believed that it would quickly subside. Their names duly appear, as we expected them to appear, in the list of Adullamites published by the "Daily Telegraph." With them are associated one or two independent political spirits, some large landowners, and men with special propertied interests caught in the net of a Budget thrown to cover a deficit of sixteen millions. Now, there should be no misunderstanding as to the character and consequences of action which goes beyond criticism and extends to downright hostility. The land clauses constitute that part of the Budget which is most vital to Liberalism. If they go, the Budget goes too, and the Government with it. They are the centre of the real opposition, closely parallel as it is to the war now being waged by the German Junkers on Prince Bülow's scheme of succession duties. They represent a movement of political thought which has twenty-five years of preparatory work behind it. In that work not merely Liberal partisans, but most of the great municipalities in England, Wales, and Scotland have played an active part. As the result of these diverse activities the principles of land taxation have for years been absorbed into the regular Liberal programme by the authoritative bodies and spokesmen of the party, with the full assent of the late and the present Prime Minister, until last year 250 Liberal Members of Parliament petitioned Mr. Asquith to include a scheme of land taxes in the next Budget. Those taxes constitute the main key to the scheme of fortifications which the Government have built up against the incursions of Protection and its assault on the workman's food and on the fabric of our present industrial system. Finally, they are part of a constructive scheme for raising the standard of English life, for opening out the land of England to freer use by the mass of its people, and for relieving the extreme burdens of age and social pressure. These are grave considerations. Are they present to the minds of the Adullamites? If they are ignored or despised, it is the business of the party organs and of the progressive electorate, which has received the Budget with enthusiasm, to present and enforce them with the utmost emphasis.

This task is the more necessary as we perceive where lie the true forces of opposition to the first large proposal to ensure a true "scientific" form of taxation. What has Liberalism to do with the complaints of the most petted interest in Christendom? Take the German case. Without hesitation a Protectionist administration, which already raises £15,000,000 a year in taxes on necessaries which Free Trade sets free, claps an extra £20,000,000 out of the £25,000,000 it wants on the back of industry and labor. This fact has in no way conciliated the landed interest, who receive the greater share of the taxes on food, and to whom the Bülow scheme of taxes distributes a new host of favors in the way of special assessments and exemptions. They were originally asked to find a chief share of £5,000,000, largely raised on a scale of death duties, which never rise above three per cent. This contribution has now been cut down by nearly one-half, and the Junkers are still unconciliated. Their real objection, like that of their British brethren, is to the inventory, which, according to the open statements of the Liberal leaders, would reveal enormous under-assessments of their estates. For this cause the bloc has been split to pieces, the Imperial finances disorganised, and the Government driven on to the rocks.

The same motives and methods, as we have shown in our first article, pervade the anti-Budget propaganda here. But our landlords would like to smash the Budget, even when it works without injury to themselves. An English Junker, like Lord Onslow, confesses, in the face of the world, that the mere threat and prospect of the land taxes have brought about one result which the duty on undeveloped land was specially designed to accomplish—namely, the bringing of undeveloped land into the market. Hitherto, he says in effect, he has kept out of the market land desired for residential purposes in a part of the country especially suited to them. Now he proposes—not at a loss to himself, but, by his own admission, in hope of a swingeing profit—to hold up his Guildford acres no longer, but to open them to public use. Is this the kind of purpose which it is desirable to encourage, or is it not? If it is, we want no fainthearts or malingerers in the camp while the battle is being fought. If the grip of the great landlord is relaxed and the way opened for the small holder, if the economic use of land is stimulated, if building is encouraged to expand on the borders of our towns, if part of the increases of value clearly due to the labor of the community is divided between the State and the municipality, as it ought to be, what Liberal member, be his private interests what they may, is prepared to defeat these purposes and to destroy the instrument that promotes them? The issue here is not ordinary: it is one of exceptional interest and importance to the life of the community. The majority of 1906 have fulfilled part of their mandate; now there remain the general public ends, and the specific methods of taxation, associated with the Budget and its triple chain of land duties. The member of Parliament who resists them will find it hard to retain the title of Liberal, and harder still to deserve it.

---

THE ROAD TO INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT.

We hope that Lord Morley will not misunderstand us when we say, after reading his speech at Oxford, that in one or two passages of his notable and beneficent career at the India Office he seems to make too much of the occasional criticism by his friends of administrative acts which are only partly his, and too little of their strong support of his scheme of reforms. Both attitudes are natural to British Liberals, and both, we think, are essential to the cause which they and Lord Morley have equally at heart. For that reason we shall venture to reject Lord Morley's suggestion that Mr. Mackarness's proposal to assimilate the procedure of the Regulation of 1818 with that of the Irish Coercion Act of 1881 amounts to a vote of censure on him and Lord Minto. If Liberal members concerned about personal freedom in India—and what Liberal can fail to be concerned about repeated suspensions of habeas corpus?—desired to censure anybody, they would not select those two statesmen. They know that on the whole Lord Minto's Viceroyalty has been a most fortunate contrast to Lord Curzon's, and they are too grateful for Lord Morley's initiative in the way of reform to charge him with full responsibility for acts of repression where regretful acquiescence may be the Indian Secretary's true attitude of mind. They feel about the case much, we imagine, as Lord Morley felt to Mr. Gladstone during Mr. Forster's tenure of the Irish Secretaryship in the Government of 1880. They know where the pressure of the head of the administration falls, and where his sympathies lie. None the less, it would be affectation to say that they approve the Regulation of 1818, or that they do not with all their hearts desire to amend it as Mr. Mackarness would amend it, and to see deportation, if it must be used as an "emergency power," applied only to the advocacy of outrage or rebellion, and not to extreme political agitation.

Let us put the case in a concrete form with reference to two of the deported men, Aswini Kumar Dutt and Krishna Kumar Mitra. We suppose that their approval of the policy, the very unwise policy, of a boycott of British goods is beyond question. We imagine it to be equally true that they are innocent of all sympathy with physical violence. Both are religious and educational reformers, and religious and educational reform is, as we all know, closely related to the political movement in Hindu India. Aswini Kumar Dutt is the founder of the society of schoolboys and students known as the "Little Brothers of the Poor," organised to minister, by personal service, to the sick and destitute of Bengal. Krishna Kumar Mitra is a leader of the great religious movement—comparable to our own Reformation—known as the Brahmo-Samaj, and it is enough to say, not only that violence is inconsistent with his faith and ideas, but that the vernacular paper which he edited distinguished itself by prompt and uncompromising denunciation of outrage. When therefore we see men of this type hurried into banishment without a trial, or a charge, or even a public statement of the case against them, we fear that something is wrong between the people and the Government of India. We feel somehow that "reasons of State" are being set up as rivals to the old Liberal concepts of justice and personal rights. No Liberal now defends the inclusion of Mr. Parnell and Mr. Dillon in the bands of "village ruffians" at whom Mr. Forster aimed, or accepts the conclusion that murder and violent or unwise political propaganda are almost identical categories. We cannot accept it for India, for if we did we should be shaping a rod for the backs of future "agitators" in England or Ireland. Anarchy has not ceased since these men were deported, and no reasonable man expected that it would. But the general amelioration in the state of British India since the promulgation of the Morley reforms is a striking political fact, and its full merits may be claimed for the policy of conciliation.

But, indeed, the great case of Indian Government goes further than these incidents of an ugly but passing phase of discontent can carry us. Lord Morley recalled to the imaginations of his young hearers the rather appalling fact that one of them might soon be placed in charge of the well-being of a million souls. The conditions of our Indian service have not materially changed since Sir George Trevelyan wrote of them, more than forty years ago, in language closely recalling Lord Morley's:—

> "Here is Tom Goddard, in his 31st year, in charge of a population as numerous as that of England in the reign of Elizabeth. His Burghley is a Joint Magistrate of eight-and-twenty, and his Walsingham is an Assistant Magistrate, who took his degree at Christ Church within the past fifteen months. These—with two or three Superintendents of Police, and last, but not least, a Judge, who, in rank and amount of salary, stands to Tom in the position which the Lord Chancellor holds to the Prime Minister—are the only English officials in a province a hundred and twenty miles by seventy."

Must we assume that the inevitable alienation between a tiny group of overworked governors from overseas and the swarming millions whose lives they order will grow both with the complexity of the task and with the development of a "political * consciousness" in native India? And is our Civil Service, maintaining its noble tradition of work and personal devotion, to become fixed in its second tradition of personal aloofness from that India, and of adherence to bureaucratic forms which tend to fall by their own weight and by virtue of the changes that Lord Morley's reforms must bring about? Is adaptability never to become a virtue of the British raj, and will it not acknowledge in time the salient fact that at length India stands face to face with the problem of self-government?

Take one question, the character and functions of the Cabinet of India, the Viceroy's Executive Council. To-day that Cabinet is formed out of the great departments of Indian administration—police, public works, education, railways. The contrast between the distinguished specialists who thus rise to supreme power in the central government and the average Cabinet Minister in England is complete. But is the Indian type a permanent one? The Indian Minister of the future will not be able to limit himself to the drawing up of symmetrical schemes of interior policy, framed so as to keep within the bounds of the Civil Service regulations, and to pass the scrutiny of like-minded and similarly trained colleagues. He will have to defend his proposals before a semi-popular tribunal, and more or less in the public eye. That task will require qualities and capacities of a different order from those that can be effectively secured by drafting to India every year forty or fifty young men withdrawn from the ranks of the Home Civil Service. The very suggestion that England should select her Cabinet on the results of a competitive examination amongst the pupils of Wren's Academy, raises a smile; but that in effect is what at present obtains for India. The marvel of it lies in the fact that such a system has worked so well, and that its break-down has not been far more speedy and catastrophic. But as the pace of progress increases all the world over, it will be more necessary to arrange governments and administrations in such a way that vital decisions may be arrived at by the best possible brains in immediate contact with the conditions for the amelioration of which policy and statesmanship exist. It will then be necessary gradually and steadily to broaden the character of the Executive Councils, the Cabinets of India, just in proportion as they become, as they inevitably must, more amenable to the ideas of the Indian public. Here lies the true goal of Lord Morley's scheme, and, let us add, the one hope of the addition to the Empire of a great area of free and genuine political life.

* See an interesting book, "Glimpses of Hidden India," by John Law (Miss Harkness), recently published by Thacker, Spink & Co.

A CLERICAL COALITION.

It matters very little to the general life of Europe whether a Calvinist or a Liberal Ministry rules in Holland. Secure in her neutrality, happy in her patent inability to resist aggression, she enjoys a real independence which some of the greater Powers might almost envy. No one forces her at the point of an ultimatum to dismiss her Foreign Secretary—a mishap which three years ago befell the French. She is not a factor in the balance of power; she can breathe freely amid the hush of an armed peace. Partly for this very reason her internal politics are peculiarly interesting. They show the real social conflicts which busy Europe in abstraction, as it were, and isolated from Imperial issues which deflect and complicate the fortunes of other peoples. The General Election, of which the first ballots have just been completed, presents indeed a phenomenon which it would be hard to parallel for the moment anywhere else in Europe. The Liberal-Conservative coalition which Prince Bülow created to defeat the German Socialists was a monstrous birth, and it has died—or seems likely to die—of its own inherent absurdity. But the solid coalition of Calvinists and Catholics which has won its astonishing victory in Holland is no new experiment in political hybrids, and it has proved its permanence. Yet at first sight no combination would seem more improbable. It rules a nation whose heroic history is based on the incompatibility of these two extremes. It has forged its unity out of a tradition of civil war and religious hate. It preserves its compromise in a land where every dyke and the walls of every storied town tell of the feud which once divided these two Churches. Nor has there been any approximation or fraternisation in the process. An absolute wall divides the two communities. Neither is lax, or tolerant, or modernist. Both obey their clerical chiefs, both cling to their rigid creed. They have met simply on the common ground of their determination to maintain the sectarian standpoint against the Liberal theory of the State, and on their united fear of Socialism and the modern spirit.

The origin of this strange partnership began in the struggle to restore the sectarian schools against the State schools which the Liberals created with the Constitution of 1848. Both churches saw in the secular schools an intolerable breach with the historic past. And, indeed, the effort to maintain a neutral atmosphere in these schools must have sadly diminished their educational value. It was necessary, in order to make them acceptable to both creeds, to banish not only theology but history, and a generation grew up in them which was not even allowed to hear of the wars between Spain and the Dutch Republic. Catholics and Protestants united in the first instance to win the liberty of sectarian teachings. They have maintained their union to defend the privileges of property in a singularly orderly and prosperous community, against a Socialist party which is formidable by its intelligence, if not as yet by its numbers. Modern though they are in their concern for education, their genius for organisation, and their respect for positive science, the Dutch are none the less an essentially conservative race. Their respect and affection for the House of Orange, the influence which they allow to their old landowning families, and, above all, their patient acceptance of the authority of a clergy which preserves much of the old Calvinist rigor in its attitude to morals and dogma, give a unique character to their national life. But it would probably be a mistake to assume that the continued ascendency of the two Clerical parties at the polls accurately measures their real strength. The franchise is far from being universal, and the Socialists have many thousands of adherents unqualified to vote. But the main cause of the Clerical success lies simply in discipline and unity. They faced the divided progressive parties absolutely united. The Catholic third of the Dutch population is concentrated mainly in the South, and it was easy to arrange that only one candidate of the Catholic, Anti-Revolutionary (Calvinist), and "Christian Historical" parties should present himself in each constituency. The Liberals, on the other hand, are divided into three warring groups—Old Liberals, Liberal Unionists, and Democrats—each at issue with the other and all opposed to the Socialists. The Socialists in their turn have been in Holland peculiarly fissiparous. They long ago expelled a quasi-Anarchist wing, whose brilliant leader, Domela Nieuwenhuis, anticipated some of Gustave Hervé's positions. They quarrelled only this year with a small orthodox Marxist minority. The main body of Reformist, or, as the Germans would say, Revisionist Socialists, under their capable leader, Troelstra, has failed in the first ballots to return a single member. The forces of property, united to maintain a steady defensive strategy, have by their discipline more than held their own against progressive legions divided by half-a-dozen scruples or principles. There will be no rally until the masses are admitted to the struggle by an extension of the franchise, and the machinery of representation improved, as in Belgium, by the adoption of the proportional principle.

A certain movement there is none the less even under this continuous clerical régime. The narrow authoritarian tendency represented by the Ex-Pastor Dr. Kuijper, who was Premier for some four years up to 1905, is no longer supreme. A more opportunist and open-minded attitude reigns under the leadership of his successors of the Heemskerk Ministry, whose clericalism has been dubbed by the Liberal "Handelsblad" a "jovial Christianity." The churches and middle-class continue to govern, but with a certain suppleness and geniality. Property is willing to pay something for its popularity and its opportunities. It even coquets with the idea of establishing some scheme of insurance against sickness and invalidity. But under these concessions and disguises it is a class-conflict which governs the division of parties. The dominant "anti-revolutionary" group, originally drawn from the native land-owning Protestant class, which resisted the alien free-thinking Liberalism introduced by the French conquest, has become to-day, in spite of its nationalist color and its historic Calvinist clericalism, a party of capitalism, which differs in none of its essentials from other European Conservative groups. Its readiness to sink its fundamental Protestantism in a Catholic alliance, is the decisive proof that it is the economic cleavage which ultimately governs Dutch politics. That clericalism is ultimately in all countries a spiritual disguise of a defensive movement whose inner citadel is the right of property, is not a deduction which need surprise us. We have witnessed the same phenomenon nearer home.

Life and Letters.

A TURF FOR MANNERS.

A PENNY for learning and a turf for manners were long the customary fees for Irish hedgerow schools. It must have been a fine sight to see the children crossing mountain and bog with a penny in one hand and a turf in the other, so that every aspect of the human spirit might be harmoniously developed, if only in a ditch. No one who touches Ireland can doubt that the turf was well expended, and on returning to this country it may sometimes strike one as unfortunate that in England peat is so scarce.

To be sure, in the upper classes, we have plenty of pence, and we lavish them ungrudgingly on the learning taught at our public schools. The annual amount that a father will pay to a public school for fear lest his son should miss the highest opportunities of learning would enrich a whole Irish family for five years beyond the dreams of luxury. But for the teaching of manners we have no turfs to give. Certainly, it may be said that our boys learn manners without being taught, and grow polite by being herded together, just as young elephants grow tame. And so inscrutable are the devices of Providence that this is partly true; indeed, such learning as is bought for our money is usually acquired in the same way, and in education, as in war and business, we pride ourselves with justice on our freedom from scientific pedantry. Always suspicious of mathematical precision, we greatly prefer to muddle through, and, as at a Balaclava charge perpetually repeated, all the world wonders. But still, sometimes when we stand among our favored race on steamers or in football crowds, a vision passes before our eyes of little boys and girls running barefoot over bog and mountain, each with a turf in one hand; and it is a pleasing vision in comparison to what we see and hear around us.

The island on the other side of the world, so like our own in nature and even in numbers, is following our example in many things—in dress, in commerce, in the building of "Dreadnoughts," and the occupation of Korea. But in neglecting to teach manners Japan does not follow us. It is true that we must lay aside nearly all our old ideas of the Japanese. Less than twenty years ago poetic travellers still told us of lovely islands rippling with innumerable laughter; philanthropic travellers still told us of a people that might become great if only they could become serious; and amorous travellers told us of Madame Chrysanthème. The alluring daintiness of a Geisha, the merry jests of a Lord High Executioner, set in a background of the flowers that bloom in the spring and adorned with the sweepings of a curiosity shop, were all we looked for from Japan, and unless we got it we were not happy. For the picture her name called up to our minds was always:—

"Happy Japan, Garden of glitter, Flower and fan, Flutter and flitter."

It was never a true picture, and it has all gone now. The Japanese themselves rubbed it off with something of the impatience a child feels in rubbing out a sum that won't come right. When they began hewing down their ancient avenues for timber, and proposing to burn their most splendid temples as the quickest way of getting at the gold, in their zeal for emulating the ideals of Western civilisation, they swept away our false conception alike of their weakness and their charm, and with it they swept away perhaps something that was true. The notion we had formed about the courtesy of Japanese manners appears to have been less false than the rest of our old-fashioned and rather delightful imagination. There must really have been a double dose of politeness in the people who in the deepest domestic grief would smile and smile, so that a guest might not be burdened with their sorrow. The habit appears to be verified, and how finely it contrasts with the weeping and wailing, the mourning streamers, the hatbands, plumes, palls, black chargers, and funeral hearses with which we struggle to stir the envy, if not the hearts, of all beholders! Or, to take another instance of that delicate and graceful consideration for others which manners mean, we are told on trustworthy evidence that in the real Japanese theatres special rooms—called, not Tea-rooms, but Tear-rooms—are provided, to which the men and women of the audience can retire for private weeping when the pathetic horrors of the stage and the facial contortions of suffering protagonists render the expression of their emotions uncontrollable. Overcome with a passion of sympathetic lamentation, they remove themselves, so as not to inconvenience the neighboring spectators, just as an English lady has been known to remove her matinée hat.

Nor can a special grace of sympathetic power be denied to a people that in a street song can thus sing of hoary age and withered beauty:—

"Mock not the puckered
Bloom of a dried plum:
Once on its fresh spray
Nightingales wept."

The translation of the song is given by Mr. Osman Edwards in his book on Japanese plays, and may be contrasted with our popular music-hall songs, such as "Let me sing" or "Duck-billed Sue." And, for a final instance of national politeness, we may remember the well-known story of the Japanese girl who killed herself because of the disgrace brought upon her country when an attempt was made to assassinate the Tsarevitch (the present Tsar) during his visit there. The fact is authenticated, the girl's name was Yuko Hatakeyama, and all must regret that for a mere attempt so beautiful a disposition was sacrificed.

But this habit of manners, whether natural to the race or acquired by immemorial repetition, is not allowed to decline even under Western influences. In the lectures on Japanese education recently delivered by Baron Kiluchi to London University, and now published by Messrs. Murray, many of the most interesting chapters deal with the long course laid down for training in behavior. Owing to the neglect of manners in this country, we forget that, like all behavior, they are part of morality, and, indeed, the words have only recently been separated even in Europe. In Japan manners are included in the teaching of morality, and if that seems strange to us, it is perhaps only so because we have ceased to teach morality also, and a public-school master would be more likely to give four hours a week to teaching billiards than filial piety. How our public-school boys would laugh, how exult, if a master gave them an hour's instruction in the correct manner of behaving to their father and mother or sisters! Yet the knowledge would certainly be new to them, and in Japan it counts as the most vital knowledge of all, or second only to behavior to the Emperor. On the Emperor's brief rescript of nineteen years ago the whole system of education is based, and if he personally represents the excellence he there inculcates, we cannot wonder that generals and admirals attributed to his personal virtues their triumphs in the Russian war.

Step by step the Japanese child is led along the course of behavior, learning how to stand up, sit down, bow, hang its hat, and think of its parents, brothers and sisters, and the Emperor. In the next year many of these lessons are repeated with illustrations from short stories, and in the year after from actual history and the lives of the great men of all countries—Nelson, for instance, illustrating one virtue, and weary little Washington with his cherry-tree another. But all manner of new virtues and points of behavior have been introduced by the end of the third year, such as patriotism, courage, cleanliness, and (especially in the case of girls) the proper ways of advancing and retiring, offering and accepting things, sleeping and eating, visiting, congratulating and condoling, mourning, and holding public meetings. So the course continues from year to year, the elementary course lasting four years, and the secondary four years more, and leading the boys and girls up to the study of benevolence, their duty to ancestors, to other people's property, other people's honor, other people's freedom, and, finally, to self-discipline, modesty, dignity, dress, labor, the treatment of animals, and the due relations of men and women, both of whom are to be regarded as equally lords of creation. In such a summary we have not mentioned a tenth part of the lessons in virtue and behavior that have to be studied and taught, before the children come to the final course, which is called the Good Japanese. We have also omitted all mention of the ordinary subjects of knowledge—reading, language, history, mathematics, and the rest. But from end to end of the long training, behavior rather than knowledge is insisted upon, even down to the tiniest detail of what our great-grandmothers valued as deportment.

In such scrupulous minuteness of habit, such hourly devotion to the two ideals of House and State, there is perhaps something a little oppressive to the mere man, something that might bring life too close to a perpetual celebration of Empire Day. "Some men's behavior," said Bacon, "is like a verse, wherein every syllable is measured," and he warned us that manners must be like apparel, "not too strait or point device, but free for exercise or motion." It is a warning of which Bacon's countrymen have little need, but sometimes when one remembers those soldier ants of Central Africa that, in their devotion to the duty of race, march in irresistible and devouring armies, clinging to an enemy with their jaws though their bodies are torn off, bridging streams by linking themselves in myriads together, like ropes of living strands, and instantly renewing the bridge though it is cut away at both ends and sent drowning down stream with all its myriad lives, then perhaps we connect those efficient ants with the devoted people of Japan, and feel for both an admiration touched with horror.

The storming of Port Arthur was like that bridge of ants, the slaughter at Mukden was the fruit of that training in manners. Is there then no middle term between life for the swarm—the life of bees and ants—and the manners of a football crowd, the embarrassment of Kipps when he comes into society, or the insensitive self-assertion of the model "bounder" in "An Englishman's Home"? If there is none, no historian can doubt which manner of life will prevail and inherit the earth. But it is a little discouraging to think that efficiency like the Japanese may, after all, be a fearsome thing to live with.

THE POETRY OF THE EARLY CHURCH.

Not very long ago the announcement was made of the discovery of a Syriac text of the Psalms and Odes of Solomon. The Psalms had been known before, and were accessible to the reading world. Of the Odes only a few were known, which were buried in a little-read book. These and a quotation in a fourth century writer served to identify the newly found poems. When they are published, scholars, no doubt, will discuss the many tangled questions of their origin, who was the writer, to what section of the early church he belonged—if he was a Christian at all—when he wrote, and in whose interest—what influences of book or dogma can be read in his work—and so forth. Meanwhile, some who have seen the little poems speak of their beauty and their spiritual feeling with some surprise.

The fact is that the early church produced little poetry of its own. In prose it achieved something. As the age of instinctive writing, of prose with a purpose, passed away, the Greeks wrote with more deliberate thought of form and sound in themselves and for themselves. As a consequence, the literature of the day lacks ideas, and is tedious and sterile. It has been remarked that in Paul's epistles—especially those to the Romans and the first to the Corinthians—the notes of freedom and power are again to be found. In an age full of self-conscious style, of reminiscence, alliteration, assonance, and preciousness generally, here is writing of the old and eternal kind—the real and vivid expression of powerful feeling, where style is lost sight of and reappears in its most triumphant vitality, glad and strong, re-created unconsciously in the joy of a genuine impulse acting upon the soul.

The Greek of the Apocalypse is peculiar, and this book, in a way unique among New Testament writings, shows literary dependences. But there are passages where the writer gets clear of his reminiscences and his library, and escapes into the open air of eternity, and speaks in a fresh way things that one can read for ever. The first three Gospels, too, are remarkable for their freedom from the stylistic methods of the day. Their sheer simplicity was remarked upon in the second century by some converts too familiar with the pretentious elaboration of contemporary writing, they were affected by the plain force of these natural little books—proof enough that, however badly an age may write, it may yet recognise the real thing when it meets it.

Outside the Canon, the Christian literature is inferior—though not markedly worse than what was written by other people. It had meaning, after all, and a certain intensity. When we reach the end of the second century we find two men who can write in a living way. Clement of Alexandria is in many things a true son of his age, a born dabbler in philosophy, trained in rhetoric. Often he is wearisome. His writing may be very formless and intern inable, and yet at the worst—or very near it—there is something in it that speaks of a living man, a man of charm and character. But at his best Clement has a note that might not unfairly be called lyrical. He does not use metre, of course, and to speak of rhythm might suggest the writers of his day too painfully. But the beauty and rich simplicity of Clement's best passages come from the heart, and not the school. He feels intensely, and he achieves the inevitable language, and one can read with the happiest kind of enjoyment. The mark of the "sublime," Longinus wrote (perhaps about this period) is that, when we meet it, "the soul takes wings and springs on high in exultation, is filled with joy and pride, as if she herself had given birth to what she hears." Many must have felt this in reading some of Clement's happiest passages. It is at least something that one can come back to them after years and feel the old thrill again.

The other man with a real style is Tertullian—a writer who incurred the disapproval of the church and of her enemies. Strong and true as he is at his best, he has little of the lyrical. His métier is prose, and he writes it as no one else ever wrote it. Every sentence is Tertullian, and nobody else, word and sinew unmistakably himself.

In the third century a much more remarkable work appeared. It tells a story which we meet in Christian literature over and over again, but never so well told. After some centuries it was incorporated in a larger production known as the "Gospel of Nicodemus"—a rather tedious remodelling of the Passion, dull and lawyer-like, save for the borrowed inset. It may be found in Hone's Apocryphal New Testament. The inset is the Harrowing of Hell. It is the story how Christ descended into hell, and set free its captives, and went on high with them. It is told by two of these captives. It has the naïve sincerity of a true poet, and the large and honest imagination. We find ourselves in hell, and overhear Satan and Hades talking with some anxiety as to what may follow from the crucifixion; for now "into the darkness there dawned as it were the light of the sun, and it shone and we saw one another." This sudden gleam of light brings out for us the age-long darkness of the grave with strange feeling. A voice is heard calling on the everlasting gates to open that the King of Glory may come in. Hades bids make fast the gates of brass and defend them; but the forefathers who had been with him from the beginning mock him. Again the voice sounds, and Hades asks, "Who is the King of Glory?" The answer comes, "A Lord strong and mighty, a Lord mighty in war," and at the word the gate of brass and its bars of iron are shattered, the dead are loosed from their bonds, "and we with them," as Jesus of Nazareth enters. The King of Glory stretches forth his right hand and raises up Adam and "blesses him on the brow with the sign of the cross"; and then with patriarchs, prophets and martyrs he "leaps forth" from Hades. Still holding Adam by the hand, he brings them all to Paradise, where Enoch and Elijah meet them, and then a more interesting figure. To him the fathers said, "Who art thou that hast the look of a robber, and what is the cross thou bearest on thy shoulders?" And the penitent thief tells them his story, and how, when he came to the gate of Eden, "when the fiery sword saw the sign of the cross, it opened to me, and I came in." (The expression reminds the reader how George Fox at a later day "came up through the fiery sword.") And then the story ends simply enough: "All this we two brothers saw and heard."

To choose a sentence or two from such a piece is to risk something of its impression, but a sympathetic reader can hardly fail to feel that here we have the real beginning of the great imaginative literature of Christendom.

Another great piece of Christian poetry is the Gnostic "Hymn of the Soul," in which a Syrian poet tells of the soul's descent from its heavenly home and its royal father and mother to bring back from Egypt a Pearl that a serpent guards. By a hard and dangerous journey it comes and treads at last the foreign soil; it puts on the garb of Egypt for a disguise, and then, in evil hour, eats of the food of the land, and forgets the Pearl in sleep. The Parents send a winged letter, that flies like an eagle; at its voice "I started and rose from sleep, I took it up and kissed it, and I loosed the seal. . . . Again I knew I was a son of Kings and free." The Pearl is seized, and the Letter leads the soul homeward till Babylon is past; the Heavenly Robe meets it, moving like a living thing itself, the exact heavenly counterpart of the soul. So the Father welcomes the child home again, and gives him a place as a Prince among the Satraps.

But the great poetry of the Church was after all the Psalter. It would be interesting to imagine this book suddenly recovered—the Psalms of David as new to us as the Odes of Solomon. Where and how should we date them? Some of the pieces would almost certainly be of Christian origin. Who but Christians could have written them? we might ask. And this raises some questions as to literature. How much is a poem worth, and whose is it? No one can tell how much it is worth till it has been tested by time and by genius. The true work of art comes inevitably from its creator, not quite by choice, nor yet quite understood. It may lie long unheeded; the gifts required for its understanding may not be found for generations; and then they appear in their turn, and the masterpiece, with its growing wealth of significance and suggestion, is discovered for all time. This happened with the Psalms, when once the mind of mankind was quickened by contact with Jesus of Nazareth. St. Augustine's case may serve to illustrate this. He looked in his earlier days at the Bible, but he did not care for it—"my sight did not penetrate to what lay within it." Then a great change came in him, and he turned again to the Psalms—"the sounds of piety that exclude the proud spirit." He had found the key to what was within them, and they gave him the predestined language for the expression of a joy in God that went far out beyond anything conceived of by their writers.

What does all this literature mean, new-born and re-discovered? Surely some new and first-hand experience of the real and eternal lies behind every awakening of mankind. And whose this experience was, and how it came to work with such force among men, we know very well.

---

THE DESTRUCTION OF DIALECT.

One of the most deplorable results of universal education appears to be the impoverishment of the English language. A language learnt at school can at best be but a step-mother tongue. The sacred character of language is well expressed in that same phrase "mother tongue," "Muttersprache," "madre lingua." Language comes from the community in which the child is born, it is traditional and local, an heirloom, a heritage, belonging to his little native corner of the earth, having the sad color of its hills or the salt savor of its sea. The possession of some local speech, of Northern burr or Western drawl, the remembrance of the proverbs and phrases of a far-off countryside, is a thread which all over the world binds men to some secluded valley which for them is home. Language and land are one, as is so well expressed in the old French name of Languedoc. Out of this traditional and local language rise the great books of the world, filled with the most intimate experiences of the people's life.

Modern conditions are revolutionising this. The traditional and local language, varying in every part of England, is being displaced by an alien book language, or rather newspaper language, having no root in the soil or the people's past, utterly without color or savor, imposed upon their children from without. The Cockney accent grows and spreads. The circle of those who say "rine" for "rain" is wider every year. The accent is no doubt good enough for the language. The old writers wrote such good English because they wrote the language that the people were talking every day. Open "Tom Jones" or "Roderick Random" or "The Vicar of Wakefield," and see if it is not so. Open Boswell, and you will read that Goldsmith "couldn't say bo! to a goose." The difference is this. The old books were written in the traditional language of the English people. The English people at the present day speak a language derived from books. We all write and talk newspaper.

The writer remembers a secluded hamlet in the Yorkshire dales, far from railways, where the educational steam roller had not flattened out the local speech. He has not been there for fifteen years, but perhaps that speech may still be heard at Richmond on a market-day. A gossip or a chat was a "crack." The homely people were always ready for a "crack" at their garden gates in summer twilights, or by the fire on winter nights. To hide a thing was to "felt" it. A bag, by the way, was always called a "poke." The writer remembers that this first revealed to him the meaning of the proverb he had heard all his life, about "buying a pig in a poke." Dialect words are mostly the sound and vigorous English of an earlier day. The local rendering of "to meddle" was "to mell." "Don't mell of it," a child would be told. This is an admirably expressive word. To country people all over England a funeral is always something of a "festa," and "a strange funeral" was the consecrated expression invariably used for a funeral attended by a great concourse of people. "A vast" was used as a substantive denoting a great quantity or number. "There was a vast of people there," it would be said. "Starved" was always used in the sense of cold or frozen. To be very busy was to be very "throng." "Jannock" was a good word for "genuine." Book English has not got so good a word as "fettle" for "get ready," "prepare." These turns of speech crowd back upon one's memory as one writes. To go back part of the way with a friend was "to set him," "to set her." One remembers in particular the ever-recurring phrases of the weather. In that grey country it was always rather doubtful whether a day would "get out" or not. "I think it will get out," one would hear again and again. "Very stormy" would be the greeting on days of intense stillness when the snow lay deep. "A very soft night," you would be told under an icy downpour of drenching rain. Icicles were always spoken of as "ice shovels." The "back end" was a dreary, colorless name for the autumn, but it was the term always used.

It was, indeed, a sad-colored country, but one now sees, what perhaps one did not see then, that the friendly, homely people of that countryside were a community. They had a common tradition—no doubt a dull and grey one—a common life and speech. It is the community that we are losing to-day. A vast agglomeration cannot be a community. To belong to a community is to have, besides the things one feels with all, some things that one feels intensely with a few. It is to speak the language that is spoken at Pistoia, but not at Prato, some few miles away, to feel that there is no world outside Verona's walls, to long for Ludlow like the "Shropshire Lad." A community should have its own dialect, its own speech. In Italy they say "ogni paese, suo dialetto." It is one of the delights of going about Italy to find language in this fluid, plastic state. In the Veneto the hard "b's" and "g's" become soft "v's" and "z's." The "biglietti" of a Piedmontese railway station are "viglietti" at Verona. The names of the trades over the shops change from place to place. The "pollajuolo," the Tuscan poulterer, is a "pollivendolo" at Venice. It is delightful to see that language is not stagnant or frozen, but living and variable as the sea. Man surely was not made for language, but language for man. Dialect is language spoken in the way that the people find pleasantest and easiest. The languages of modern Europe are dialects that have become stereotyped. The Romance languages are poor, stammering, human attempts at the supernatural dignity and majesty of Latin. The country people aimed, for instance, at the sonorous "vespertilio," which is like the very stretching of the wings of night, and succeeded in making the delightful, childish word "pipistrello."

> "I like the language, that soft, bastard Latin,
> That melts like kisses from a Southern mouth,"

Byron says. The recollection of these facts should make our board school teachers and other superior persons less contemptuous of the linguistic efforts of our own poor.

The writer is fair to confess that there is nothing at which he so shudders as at the idea of "a universal language." To him there is no nightmare comparable to the idea of the whole world wrapped in one single shroud of Esperanto, Volapuk, or the English of the "Daily Mail." "At Faido we heard the pleasant Italian tongue for the last time," says Charles Dickens in "Pictures from Italy." There would be no "last time" with a universal language, no charm of the fleeting and transitory, no change as of spring or autumn, lengthening or shortening days, there would be always the sacred high eternal noon of Esperanto or the Anglo-Saxon and Colonial tongue. There would be no sense of the border, no excitement of crossing frontiers. A universal language would be the end of the charm of wander-years, the romance of travel. Stay-at-home folk no more could dream and fable of foreign lands as the old Norse saga-makers dreamed and fabled of the Rhineland and the shores of the Middle Sea. It would be the end of illusion—everything would be known in its banal reality. It would be the end of the community. One feels that an old-time community in its seclusion must have taken a new, vivid interest in the things about it, must have looked at dawn and sunset, fire and water, with fresher, clearer eyes, just because it always felt the possibility of some immense Tidings coming to it from the unknown outside lands. Thus they must have lived in expectation at the court of some far-off Celtic king, or amid that friendly company of the barbarous people who showed no little kindness to St. Paul.

The ideal surely is that all possible communities should subsist in some greater unity. Mr. Belloc would not love Sussex so much, if he did not love Europe more. The destruction of languages and dialects is the destruction of Europe. One knows the feeling with which, say, in a museum, after incredibly alien things, Babylonian, Assyrian, Carthaginian, after shapeless, monstrous forms, after obscene rites and reptile gods, the brazen images of Moloch and Beelzebub, god of flies—one knows the shock at once of salutation and surprise with which one comes on a proud and noble European face, the broad, stern brow and mobile, sensitive lips of Cæsar Augustus.

---

POCKETS OF SPRING.

It is weeks since we renewed our youth by picking the largest cowslips that grew on the ridges of our fat southern fields. Yet we have to travel a very little northwards to see the pleasant "paigles" still spangling the meadows with their unmistakable pale green. Just beyond the Humber we are still rejoicing in long purples, milkmaids, and other jewels of the field that we had thought to have seen the last of. Marsh marigolds still exhibit their fat beauty; stitchwort is scattered over acres, like rice at Spring's great wedding; the gorse bushes are one unbroken blaze of gold.

The moorland has caught the strength of the sun, and responded at length as amorously as the commons of Surrey. On the greatest heights the cloud-berry has opened its great blossoms, that remind us at once of the anemone and the blackberry; a little lower the bear-berry exhibits clusters of pink-and-white bells at the tips of its box-like foliage; the whinberry has pink blossoms like globes of fruit, each filled with a tiny drop of honey of exquisite sweetness; the bottle-like fruit is also there, though in green instead of the bloomed black that will refresh the traveller next month. The whinberry gives patches of bright green in a waste of sullen heather, for the time of the heather's glory is not yet. Tiny green fingers of fern and tormentil creep round the base of the few grey blocks of gritstone which the sea long ago carved and left on the summit of our moor, now a thousand feet removed from the eroding waves.

After the sea went down the hillside, the mists of heaven took up the work of carving and beautifying the hills. The rains found out the softer streaks, however winding they might be, and made runnels that neither sea-pink nor cistus nor heather nor whortleberry could protect. It sank gorges that widened into mile-wide valleys; formed island hills far out in the plain that now stretches twenty miles to the sea; gashed a tidal river-bed five hundred feet deep; set modern piddocks to drill holes in the fossil ammonites of ten million years ago. After the deeper slashes of time's chisel the eye rests on the more delicate work that graces the round edges of the moor. The little runnel creeps hidden under the heather stalks, then plunges down a fern-smothered trench, then loses itself for awhile in deep green moss, then, boring a deeper and wider V, brings up all manner of bushes and trees, whose vivid green rejoices in the summer that has been opened for them in the flanks of the winter-teased mountain.

The rain carves its channels where it will or where it can. Perhaps the sea-urchins' cemetery proves more soluble, or the slabs that pre-historic piddocks fretted most, or the crack that a wanton sea filled long ago with pebbles or more movable silt. At any rate, the rain may not stay on the hill-top where the clouds have delivered it. North or south or east or west, it must flow away, and where it began to flow yesterday it will flow again to-day. So our streaks of tree-decked gullies wind and straighten in all directions. In one the golden oaks are mingled with soft green rowans and silver birch, a lady among trees, though not so feathery as when she queens the lowlands. The thicket is snowed with hawthorn, silvered with sallow cotton, reddened with cornel, ink-spotted with Scotch pine. Another gulley, pointing more westerly, is all bursting with the grey-green of ash, another sparkles with sycamore, another that has reached a lower level with greater speed, has alder all along the stream and flowery meadows beyond.

A goat-path threading the wall of a precipice leads us down to a wooded table-land beneath our frowning moor. We could toss a biscuit into the tops of the feathery larches three hundred feet below, and they swim up to meet us as we pass down the steep gradient of our mountain stairs. It is on the cool side of the mountain, the compass tells us, though the sun is beating on it fiercely enough at this hour of the day. That which seemed a flat table-land is carved by incipient becks still more extravagantly than the longer slopes, and we find ourselves clambering amidst a perfect perplexity of green banks, bouldered fissures, thickets and open spaces. In one pocket of this small Switzerland the hawthorn is in full blossom, with a spray of lingering blackthorn to keep it company, another has bluebells and red campion in rich profusion, and a third is on this day of mid-June a perfect picture of rather early April. The larches, green after blossoming, stand round in a crescent that almost touches the grim and trickling walls that compass the rest of the dell; moss and tussocks corrugate its slope like an arrested avalanche, and all among their bubbles the primroses come starting forth in pale bunches. It is just so that we saw them two months ago in a Surrey coppice. The same black bee that flew then is here now; the willow wren that sang its descending scale for the first time then is silently hunting here to-day; the cuckoo calls to us as though with the opening announcement of his arrival.

Spring lingered delightfully in the south, but, once she sets forth on her northward journey she flies with summer hard on her heels. Summer even lies in wait for her, and at her coming breaks out with an accompaniment that drowns the song. Down by the waterfall, whose beauty can charm us by the hour together, the lesser celandine is starring the green rocks. But close to the falling stream the dipper has its nest, woven right in the track of the winter water, and in peril of a sudden freshet. And the dipper is feeding young just above the flower whose coming in most counties precedes even the mating of the robin. On the moor the young grouse are creeping through the heather stems like shrew mice, and lying to be trodden under foot rather than reveal their presence. In the lane we see a dozen little dots threading along under an overhanging fringe of grass. When we stand by them they stop each in some cranny or tuft, and most of them become invisible. But two of them we pick up and admire for a moment as they sit with apparent confidence in the hand. They are young pheasants, so small that we could almost squeeze them back into their egg-shells without harming them. Further on, the plovers come wheeling and screaming round us, and by their mistaken anxiety make us see their tiny offspring cowering close beside the road. Where straggling pines dot a wild piece of heather whose tufts of cotton-grass proclaim its bogs to have been undrained, curlew fly and shriek at unwonted intrusion on their solitudes.

Only in the water does spring seem to have gone forward without regard to latitude. The trout spawned here even earlier than in Hampshire, and if we leave the lordlier domain of the beck and look into the poor scum-laden pond, we shall see that the tadpoles are of the same magnificent dimensions they have attained to in the south. In fact, they seem larger, as though they might be tadpoles that were too late last year to become frogs, and had gone over the winter into a second year. It has been so, and there are even creatures that have given up the perfect state altogether, and live, reproduce, and die as tadpoles where once they blossomed into beings apparently as superior as the butterfly is to the caterpillar. But we are assured that these tadpoles of the sub-moorland pond are the produce of this spring's eggs. Their parents slept in the pond itself, and were called betimes. The newts on the other hand hibernate on dry land, and came into this northern pond after we had bursting eggs in lowland counties. Some of them may have slept in the grotto of primroses whose inhabitants escape the cold snaps of April and May, and begin the year amid the smiles of June.

Open Questions.

RELIGION AND CONDUCT.

The recent curious Reminiscences of Mr. John D. Rockefeller has set some people asking a natural question. The great Trust millionaire, the Napoleonic financier, who was long the moving spirit and controlling brain of that remarkable concern the Standard Oil Company, is revealed in these pages in an unexpected light. He appears as a kindly, good-natured, and exceedingly religious person. His religion is his strong point, next to his domestic morals. He came of the old New England Puritan stock, and apparently he carried through life quite unchanged the rigorous principles of private ethics and the simple Calvinistic faith which he imbibed in the nursery and the schoolroom. In private, indeed, he seems to be an amiable man, affectionate, simple in his tastes, temperate in his habits, extraordinarily generious, and unimpeachably upright. When one looks at Mr. John D. Rockefeller's picture of himself on his own estate, quietly amusing himself with golf and tree-planting, endowing churches, founding colleges, and helping the poor, one finds it a little difficult to turn to that other picture of the money-making machine which ploughed through American finance and industry with a ruthless unity of purpose, carrying ruin and devastation in its train. The man who in his country home could not pass a beggar without relieving his wants, in his office must have reduced many thousands to beggary without giving them a thought. Whatever may be urged in defence of the operations of the Standard Oil Company, no one can say that they worked in the spirit of Christian ethics, or that Mr. John D. Rockefeller himself acted up to the tenets of a creed which bade him take no thought for the morrow, and find his treasure in incorruptible things. Like many other successful business men in the United States, he apparently kept his commercial and private morality in watertight compartments, and it puzzles some observers to understand how he managed to perform the operation. In other words, how can a deeply religious man occupy himself during his hours of activity in a manner which is often irreligious and sometimes anti-religious?

The truth, perhaps, is that religious and ethical conceptions exercise less influence upon conduct than is commonly attributed to them. Life is not so much a science as an art, a matter of practice, temperament, knowledge, and training. Men have excelled in that art, as they have in others, with all religions and with none. In any practical operation—say the driving of a motor car or the command of an army—everyone must recognise that the practitioner's conception of the universe is of less importance than his skill and expertness in his business. Even his character is of value chiefly in so far as it affects these qualities. Nobody would willingly employ a drunken chauffeur, because drunkenness would interfere with his steadiness of hand and quickness of judgment; but the man might be an atheist, a free-lover, or a gambler, and still a reasonably good chauffeur. On the other hand, he might be a saint or a philosopher, and a particularly bad one. Take the case of great military and naval leaders. Collingwood, with his lofty and intelligent devotional zeal, was assuredly not a better sailor than Nelson, who was dominated by a rather confused amalgam of sentiment, caprice, sheer personal vanity, and idealistic patriotism. Was he, all things considered, a better man? Wellington's narrow Anglicanism certainly does not seem to have done much for a character in many respects unpleasant—harsh, illiberal, grasping, and coldly self-indulgent. But the Duke had the temperament and the intellect of the soldier, developed by much practice, and he became a very good general: not, however, so good a general as Napoleon, who believed in nothing except his own strength and the weakness of others. If we carry the survey from these special pursuits to the general art of living, the result is really the same. A man may have a very bad creed and be a very good father, husband, friend, or citizen; he may be lamentably defective in each of these capacities, in spite of a high ethical and religious ideal. This is because our social activities are very little dependent on theory, but are, in fact, controlled and conditioned by character and habit. The main principles of morality, though their application varies infinitely according to custom and convention, are common to most schools of thought. I am prepared to assert that the first man who passes me as I walk down the street will be theoretically aware that he ought not to beat his wife, though he be a Calvinist, a Roman Catholic, a Swedenborgian, a Socialist, or a Tariff Reformer. Whether he does or will beat his wife I have not the slightest idea; nor would precise information upon his religious or political views help me to form an opinion. I should be better able to judge if you told me that he was addicted to alcohol, or that he had been brought up by a maiden aunt. Most of our difficulties in conduct are concerned with the choice between motives of nearly equal force or with the subordination of one set of emotions to another. And here an instinctive grasp of realities, rapidity of decision, the control of the lower appetites by the higher impulses, tact, temper, and firmness are of more avail than any synthesis of thought. After all, the chariot of life is driven, much as the motor car is driven, by knowledge of the machinery and adeptness in handling it. If you go into the bathroom and turn on the hot-water tap instead of the cold douche you will scald yourself, though you are as wise as Solomon and as virtuous as St. Francis.

What, then, is the true value of ethics and religion? Can man go through life without any synthesis at all? Surely not. Faith is needed not to make a man live better, but to make him feel better. And a theory of the universe is required not to direct his conduct, but to sanctify him in the successes and fortify him in the failures of action.

That is what one feels in reading Mr. Rockefeller's confessions. His remarkably successful and entirely absurd career has just missed being used as a text for sermons. If his mediocre talents and his exceptional luck had happened to have been displayed on a less conspicuous stage, we should have been freely invited to admire him. We should have him exhibited as a shining example of that old-fashioned Biblical Christianity which has made America and Great Britain what they are. We might have books written about him by excellent persons like the late Mr. Samuel Smiles, holding him up for the instruction of the young, to show what can be done by industry, perseverance, and intense application, fortified by sound religion and austere morality. It would have been explained that he would not have become so great unless he had been so good. We have heard too much about Mr. Rockefeller to be able to say that about him. The millionaire-manufacturing process has been laid open too plainly to the world in his case; the Mammoth Trust is too big; we know too well what it has cost to make the fortunes of its "magnates." I do not think that even one of Mr. Rockefeller's own professors, in one of his own universities, would care to lecture on his patron from this standpoint.

I suppose many thousands or millions of people envy "John D."; I do not imagine that even in the United States there are many who venture to admire him openly. With the best will in the world it is difficult to attribute his success to high abilities and hard work based on Christian ethics. We cannot say that, because he is clearly not very able, and he tells us himself that he was not particularly industrious or persevering. He went through the greater part of his active life comfortably and easily, taking plenty of holidays, enjoying himself blamelessly, and occupying himself in his business hours in scheming, financing, borrowing, intriguing, and organising. He did very little work himself; he was clever and lucky enough to make other people work for him. He can seldom have put in as sound a day of steady labor as most of his own clerks. His puritanical New England upbringing can neither be credited with his success in money-making nor with the means by which he made it. His real achievements as an organiser of distribution and economiser of production had no relation to the teaching he received in the chapel and the schoolroom; those other exploits which have made him famous stand equally apart from the religion in which he believes. The New Testament does not suggest that it is desirable to pile up riches by the methods and devices which the Oil Trust sometimes employed. There is no relation, so far as one can see, between Mr. Rockefeller's creed and his conduct in commercial life; and the fact that out of business hours he is affectionate, moral, and lavish in giving away his plunder makes the contradiction all the more striking.

It is clear that Mr. Rockefeller's practice of what he calls "the difficult art of getting," was not determined by his religion. He would have acted much the same as he did, and probably with much the same results, if he had not been a devoted member of his church. But he would not have felt nearly so comfortable; he would have lacked that inner glow which makes him a happy man in spite of his wealth, his weariness, his narrowness, his crudity. He would not have found consolation in the thought that the world which has made John D. Rockefeller its richest inhabitant, is divinely ordered. He would not have been so sure of his own righteousness, or so callous to the sufferings of his victims. He would not have been able to decree the massacre of his enemies in much the same spirit as that which inspired Godfrey of Bouillon, or a sergeant of Cromwell's Ironsides, or Gustavus Adolphus, or any other entirely devout destroyer. Like them he had faith, which not only casts out fear, but gives its possessor power to sustain all kinds of shocks and buffets, including those of his own conscience. The Protestant religion (New England version) did not make Mr. Rockefeller a successful man, it did not make him, in any true sense of the word, a good man; but it seems to have given him that peace which the world cannot bring, and fortified him, not merely against the obloquy of his fellow-men, but also against dissatisfaction with himself. He is calm, contented, kindly, tranquil in mind and soul, at ease in his relation towards the Universe and the general scheme of things. But his success as a man of action does not spring from this source. It is due to his expertness in a difficult art—the art of financial adventure—in which he would probably have failed if he had not kept it sternly apart from his religious ideas and ideals.

SIDNEY LOW.

[Mr. Low's article opens up a question of profound interest to our times. Our readers might like to discuss it.—ED., NATION.]

Present-Day Problems.

ORGANISED LABOR AND PRACTICAL POLITICS.

III.

THERE are three countries in which the Socialist movement has assumed a distinctly revolutionary character—France, Italy, and Russia. Let us first glance at France. It might seem that as regards France the statement of the hope, with which I started, that the movement is outgrowing its too revolutionary youth, was unduly optimistic. Even the Unified Socialist Party, which was formed so lately as 1905, is avowedly revolutionary and intransigeant in principles and policy. Revolutionary syndicalism goes still farther. It rejects parliamentary action as weak and futile, and advocates direct action through trade unions—direct action which expresses itself in the strike, culminating in the general strike. In this direct action we have the suggestion of force—the pressure and menace of force. Revolutionary syndicalism is simply trade unionism inspired more or less by anarchism.

The question that we really have to determine is: In what direction is French Socialism moving? Now, we must, I think, regard it as a considerable feat to have succeeded in establishing a unified party in any form. Since it began to revive after the Commune the story of French Socialism is a record of constant contention and dissension. The different sections of it began to draw together in order to maintain the Republic during the Dreyfus case. They combined to form the Unified Party under the moral pressure of the Amsterdam Congress of 1904. It is surely a material gain that the main force of French Socialism should be an organised and responsible movement under the leadership of a man like Jaurès.

If France is the country of revolution, it is also the country of clearness and good sense. We may take it as certain that all who have any feeling for reasonableness and responsibility among French Socialists will strenuously resist the spirit of anarchy which may endanger the Republic and lead to the restoration of despotism. At the recent congress at St. Etienne they have been trying to formulate an agrarian policy suitable to the peasantry. No such policy can be shaped except by serious departure from the abstract collectivism which they have hitherto maintained.

With regard to revolutionary syndicalism, we should remember that anarchism has existed among French workmen for a considerable time. Its evils and excesses can be best remedied by the spread of light, the removal of real grievances, and a more active sympathy between Government and people. We can understand the revolutionary syndicalism of France, as we can understand that of Italy, only by trying to comprehend the conditions in which it has arisen. The Socialism of Italy has had a history of about forty years. It has had a far more changeful and stormy life than that of France since the Commune. But in the main the Socialist movement of the two countries has been on similar lines. Dating from 1892, the Italian Party prefers parliamentary action, but it also has strongly revolutionary leanings, and, as in France, it is unable either to control or repudiate the trade unionism which inclines to anarchism. In both countries we see a perfervid temperament, lacking in discipline and political experience.

But in Italy we see the conditions which make for unrest operating in a very aggravated form. Italy has long been applying to naval and military preparation and to the other ambitions of a great power the attention and the resources which have been sorely needed for the regeneration of her people. The extreme misery which brutalises and crushes men in soul and body has for generations reigned over wide regions of Italy. Interminable hours of labor for the scantiest pay, the crassest ignorance, entire want of social and political guidance, sordid apathy and moral degradation have prevailed, especially in central and southern Italy and the islands, under a system of official corruption and neglect. During the last generation there has been a notable awakening, but the new life naturally bears traces of the soil from which it has sprung. It has been an excitable and turbulent life, suspicious of Government and ready to resent wrong with violence. The young and energetic have left the country in great numbers. In recent times as many as 350,000 have emigrated, chiefly to America, in a single year, while 270,000 have in the same time gone in search of temporary employment, mainly to the countries of Central Europe. Those who have stayed at home have not seldom been driven by hard work, by the want of work, and by hunger, to strike and riot, and have been shot down by the police and the soldiers.

Thus the last word between the Italian Government and its people has too often been the fusilade. We may fairly measure the greater progress of France by the willingness and even anxiety to reason with the workers which the Government now shows. A Government which truly represents the people and is responsive to their needs and wishes should not insist on the infallibility of the officials. Both Government and officials are the servants of the people, and have no divine right of exemption from error or of freedom from responsibility. We may regard both Government and people in France and Italy as at different stages of progress towards a new era, in which labor and the rewards of labor will be better adjusted. There is abundance of new life, but it is lacking in regulation and discipline, and especially in the highest form of discipline, which is self-discipline. The disorder is the necessary preparation for a new order.

In Italy we can see many promising signs of the advent of the new order. The leaders of organised labor are men of high character and capacity. Though much remains to be done, both organisation and policy are attaining to greater stability and definiteness. Socialists take an increasingly active part in the practical work of the communes. Italian Socialists now particularly claim that as regards the three classic forms of the working class movement, the General Confederation of Labor, the National League of Co-operative Societies, and the Italian Federation of Friendly Societies have come to a common understanding; all are inspired by the Socialistic ideal.

The second act of the revolutionary drama in Russia, under Nicholas II., has terminated, like the first, under Alexander II., in the suppression of the revolution. But we may be assured that the drama is not ended. The revolutionary spirit will rise again, and the fear of it remains as a very important factor in European politics. As compared with the revolutionary movement under Alexander II., that under Nicholas II. has shown a marvellous increase in strength and volume. The fear of another and more formidable rising may be regarded as a strong guarantee of European peace. Neither Germany nor Austria would desire a war in which Russia would probably be defeated and the revolution precipitated. Such a revolution might unite the entire Slav race in a movement which would upset the whole political system of the old world. The future of Austria after the passing of the present Emperor is a sufficiently obscure subject as it stands, without the tenfold complication of a great Pan-Slavic revolutionary crisis. In spite of political differences, there has always been a strong feeling of sympathy between the courts of Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg. And it should be remembered to their credit that for the long space of a century and a half since the Seven Years' War there has been only one serious military struggle among them—that of 1866.

It will be seen that organised labor is now taking an active part in the politics of the world. It will also be seen that the situation contains very serious possibilities of revolution. For this—if for no higher—reason all prudent statesmen and good citizens should energetically push forward the work of reform. But if reform is to be wise and effectual it must be based on real insight into the needs and aspirations of labor. We can best find what these are by a study of the practical and constructive side of organised labor during recent years. For in that side of the movement we can see what labor has been seeking to attain under the pressure of real needs.

In Belgium and also in Denmark the Socialist parties work in harmony with the trade union and the co-operative movement. In Italy progress is still more fundamental and comprehensive; trade unionism, the co-operative movement, and the friendly society form an organic whole. The root of the whole process of progress is to be found in the friendly society; the principle of mutual aid is the germ from which the whole movement of organised labor in modern times has grown.

We should note that the working man has carried on this great movement of progress almost entirely by his own efforts. The State and its chiefs have been far too busily engaged in war and the preparation for war, in diplomacy, in party struggles, and in the concerns of courts and of society, to spare much time for understanding or satisfying the needs of labor. The working man is not even yet a full member or partner in the modern State. But it is hoped that in process of time we may see a widening development of the democratic State, in which, on the basis of the friendly society, the trade union, and the co-operative society, an effective system of insurance against accident, sickness, unemployment, and old age may be built up and the entire life of labor advanced to a higher plane. We may expect to see State and people in organic union and sympathy, and a system of social polity capable of a progressive development, to which no bounds can be set by the most active imagination. And it will, we hope, be not the least of the happy results of the development of this social polity that it will supply a solid basis for mutual understanding and goodwill among races which have so long been alien in mind, tradition, and policy.

T. Kirkup.

The Drama.

THE FIRST-FRUITS OF ENDOWMENT.

It was an unfortunate chance which last week made rival attractions of the Irish National Theatre Company at the Court and Miss Horniman's Manchester company at the Coronet. The coincidence, however, was not wholly to be regretted. It had the excellent effect of hammering home, stroke upon stroke, the value to theatrical art of even a very moderate endowment. I have no inside knowledge of the finances of either company. I do not even know whether, on the whole, their supporters have been out of pocket. But one thing is certain—namely, that neither of these enterprises would have been possible unless there had been people behind them who were willing, if necessary, to face a considerable loss, and who in no case looked for any personal profit. We may probably assume that in neither instance has the loss been very great; but even if it had run into tens of thousands, that would have been a moderate price to pay for the results achieved in Dublin and promised—and already partially achieved—in the much younger Manchester enterprise. I understand that in Dublin a large part, and in Manchester the whole, of the financial support comes from Miss A. E. F. Horniman. If so, I think it may safely be said that no woman in England to-day is making a better use of her money. Few forms of beneficence are so free from drawback as that which goes to remedy the starvation and malnutrition of dramatic art.

What the Irish Theatre is to the national movement in Ireland I leave those to determine who have studied that movement from the inside. What it has meant for English literature, on the other hand, everyone knows who has seen or read "The Play-Boy of the Western World." The late J. M. Synge was a humorist, a poet, and a master of exquisite phrasing. His style was in part, no doubt, derived from observation—was, in fact, a transcript of the actual color and cadence of Irish peasant speech. But it was an idealised transcript, a concentrated essence of imagination and beauty. I know nothing quite like it in any other literature. In the speech of the English, or Scottish, or German, or Norwegian peasant, what pleases us is sometimes a racy uncouthness, sometimes a laconic shrewdness, sometimes a rugged simplicity and primitiveness of outlook; never, I think, sheer beauty either of idea or of diction. For that we must go to peasant poetry; we shall not find it in peasant prose. But the prose of Synge's plays is all poetry. The speech of his peasants thrills and throbs with imagination, and the rhythm of their phrases has a somewhat monotonous but caressing and irresistible beauty. Four of his plays were presented last week: "The Play-boy of the Western World," "The Well of the Saints," "Riders to the Sea," and "In the Shadow of the Glen." The first, and unquestionably the best, I did not see; but all the others charmed me afresh. If the Irish Theatre had produced no other writer than Synge, it would have been worth more to Ireland than can be reckoned in money. But endowment was necessary to make Synge possible.

In our admiration for his genius, however, we must not forget that the National Theatre has brought to the front a whole school of noteworthy writers. Mr. Yeats, of course, is not a product of the movement, but rather its motive power. Still, had the theatre not existed, he would probably never have given us "Kathleen ni Houlihan," "The King's Threshold," or "The Pot of Broth." The other writers represented in last week's programme are Lady Gregory, whose comic character-sketches, "Hyacinth Halvey" and "The Workhouse Ward," are full of spirit and humor, and Mr. Norreys Connell, whose "Imaginary Conversation" between Robert Emmett and Tom Moore is, as it were, "Kathleen ni Houlihan" transposed from the fantastic into the historical key. As for the acting, one may say at once that, though the loss of the Brothers Fay is doubtless felt, their place is quite ably and sufficiently supplied. Mr. Arthur Sinclair, Mr. Fred O'Donovan, and Mr. J. A. O'Rourke are good and versatile actors; Miss Sara Allgood has greatly developed; and the simplicity, sincerity, and charm of Miss Maire O'Neill are invaluable to the company. Its style remains unchanged, and is still simple, unaffected, a little constrained, a little lacking in variety. It has the charm of primitive draughtsmanship, before mechanical accomplishment has been attained. The company, somehow, has never quite acquired the freedom of the stage. But this very touch of helplessness is admirably suited to the work they do. Never in the theatre, I think, have I felt the shiver of the supernatural so irresistibly as in their rendering of "Riders to the Sea."

But the Irish Theatre is, after all, a product of peculiar conditions. It taps, so to speak, a virgin vein. What endowment can do is still more clearly manifest in the admirable and delightful company that comes to us from Manchester. When one thinks of the dramatic fare with which the provinces in general have to put up, and contrasts with it the work done by Miss Horniman's organisation, one cannot but wonder in what way Manchester proposes to show its gratitude to her. The best way would certainly be to vote her a subsidy which should enable her to enlarge the scope of her operations.

The unlucky clashing of dates prevented me from seeing "Widowers' Houses," "The Silver Box," or Sudermann's "The Vale of Content"; but I hear on very good authority that the English plays, at any rate, were excellently rendered. The plays I did see—two by Mr. Charles McEvoy and one by Mr. Edward Garnett—were all new to London. They were none of them masterpieces, but they were well worth doing and worth seeing.

Mr. McEvoy, author of "The Three Barrows" and "When the Devil Was Ill," has a pleasant, facile talent, lacking, as yet, in depth and solidity. If he does not take care, he will awake one morning to find himself popular, and will go the way of Somerset Maugham and Clyde Fitch. The faults of "The Three Barrows" are so obvious that every critic, so far as I saw, put his finger on them at once. It is a mere story, a sequence of incidents without any constructive design; and the author is far too slow in making clear to us the type of character he proposes to study. The story is like that of a novel of Turgueneff; indeed, I think there is more than one book of the Russian master in which he places a well-intentioned, weak man between a simple, devoted girl whom he really loves and a masterful woman who carries him off, in spite of himself, by sheer force of compulsive egoism. But in the Turgueneff story (or stories) the prime factor in the subjugation of the hero is a more or less morbid sensual glamor; whereas it does not appear that in "The Three Barrows" anything of the sort comes into play. In Victor Meux's passion for Anna, not only his heart but his senses are strongly engaged; yet he gives her up for Clara Ossler, whom he dislikes and despises, simply because he has not the moral courage to break off his engagement. It is not even his sense of honor that paralyses him; it is a sort of physical funk. The psychology may be all right; but there is this disadvantage about it, that we cannot feel the play to be really finished: Victor will certainly run away from Clara as soon as she ceases to hold him with her glittering eye. Moreover, his pitiful pusillanimity comes upon us quite as a surprise at the close of the scene in the barn. In the encounter with Anna's brother he is ineffectual and undignified, but acts with tolerable spirit. It would try anyone's nerves to face an infuriated rustic armed with a shot-gun. Not till Anna suggests the propriety of announcing to Clara his change of sentiment does his courage begin visibly to ooze out at his finger-tips. The character is not exactly inconsistent, but it is unskilfully developed, with insufficient art of preparation. "When the Devil Was Ill" is a lighter play, agreeable and amusing, but, like "The Three Barrows," strung together rather than constructed. Mr. McEvoy does not seem to realise that half the art of drama lies in arousing and satisfying, or outdoing, or pleasantly disappointing, anticipation. We live in his plays from moment to moment, foreseeing nothing, desiring nothing. His character-drawing is generally clever, his dialogue is always easy and vivacious; but he does not as yet know how to extract from his themes the maximum of specifically dramatic effect.

It is entirely to the credit of the Manchester management that it should have produced so serious and in some ways able a play as "The Feud," by Mr. Edward Garnett; but Mr. Garnett's ability is unfortunately not seconded by any expertness in the handling of his material. Through two-thirds of the presentation of this Icelandic family-saga, one's attention is entirely absorbed—mine was, at any rate—in trying to make out who the characters are, and in what relation they stand to each other. To this moment I am uncertain on various points that ought to have been made perfectly clear within ten minutes of the rise of the curtain. Again, though I, personally, divined at an early point that Helga's apparent hatred for Bue was in fact the mask of a half-unconscious but passionate love, my insight did not proceed from anything in the play itself, but from the fact that I was already familiar with the characters—in another play. It is quite possible that Mr. Garnett has never read "The Vikings at Helgeland," by Henrik Ibsen; it is quite possible that he simply drew upon the same material; but the fact remains that his Helga, Hordis, Anna, and Bue reproduce very closely Ibsen's Hjördis, Dagny, Gunnar, and Sigurd. In the conduct of the two plays there is little enough resemblance. Mr. Garnett leads up through a series of scenes of small intrinsic interest to a strong, and I suppose one ought to say a "daring," last act, which, by an odd coincidence, had been parodied in advance, only a few days earlier, in "A Merry Devil" at the Playhouse. In both plays a woman finds, bound and at her mercy, a man whom she thinks she hates; in Mr. Fagan's play she proposes to horsewhip, in Mr. Garnett's to kill him; and in both she cuts his bonds and falls into his arms. It is a good enough situation, as situations go; but there was more real dramatic originality in an earlier scene of "The Feud," in which the women of the Gudmund family watch a cavalcade of men, after a skirmish, wending their way down the distant mountain-side, and try to make out who has come alive out of the fight, and who is being carried feet-foremost. Mr. Garnett, in a word, has flashes of dramatic power; but is unskilled in the arts of exposition and development. Has he the patience to acquire them?

It is not, then, because of any startling discovery of new genius that I think the Manchester enterprise so valuable and hopeful. Manchester still awaits her Synge. None the less is it encouraging to know that in a great provincial centre a company of intelligent young actors is producing, week by week, plays of a strongly progressive tendency, is winning high local appreciation, and is, in the meantime, acquiring an invaluable variety of experience. Under these circumstances, it would only be reasonable to make allowance for a good many shortcomings in mounting and acting; but, in fact, there is no need for any such forbearance. The plays are well put on the stage, and the average of acting is more than creditable. Mr. Lewis Casson, Mr. Iden Payne, Mr. Basil Dean, Mr. Jules Shaw, Miss Hilda Bruce Potter, Miss Ada King, and Miss Sybil Thorndike, all do admirable work; and I cannot but single out Mr. Charles Bibby's Leatherhead in "When the Devil was Ill" as a delightful piece of quiet comedy. Beyond all question, however, the most interesting figure in the company is Miss Mona Limerick. It is many a year since such an arresting personality has appeared on the stage. With her tall, willowy figure, and her great dark eyes blazing in a face of extraordinary delicacy of outline, this young lady looks at times like an allegorical embodiment of Tragedy. Her art is as yet immature, her voice harsh and ill-governed, her enunciation defective. But if she will learn to subdue her personality to artistic ends, instead of emphasising it to the point of mannerism, Miss Mona Limerick may go far indeed.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

TRADE UNDER TOWN-PLANNING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Perhaps the first fruits of the Government's Housing and Town-planning Bill will be found in the recent visit to Germany of the British housing party. That some hundred public men and others interested in social service should have spent the best part of a fortnight in investigating the town-planning features of German cities may be taken as an earnest of the desire to give effect to the town-planning proposals of Mr. Burns's Bill.

One of the surprises of German cities to the British party was to find town-planning something more than the well-ordered arrangement of streets and houses and open spaces: it is an integral part of the trade policy of Germany. Town-planning has made German cities prosperous as well as stately. Town-planning is undertaken in order to capture trade. It is carried out, too, without permitting the unpleasant features of trade to obtrude themselves or to deface the city.

The apology for the ugliness and smoke of so many of our British towns is that they sprang up rapidly, before public control could assert itself, during the great industrial awakening of the early Victorian epoch. Since then Germany has experienced an industrial development as rapid and as revolutionary as was ours of fifty years ago. Her countrysides have been denuded, while her towns have doubled and trebled their populations. There is this difference. While British towns grew up haphazard, following the whim of unrestrained railway companies, of narrow manufacturers, and of jerry builders, the Germans have directed the growth of their cities on scientific lines.

One of the best examples is Dusseldorf. This thriving city on the Rhine has clothed itself with beauty. It is clean and well-ordered, with spacious tree-planted streets, rings of carefully-planned suburbs, and a river front well-nigh equal to the Thames Embankment. Yet Dusseldorf is primarily an industrial town and one of recent and rapid growth. It stands on the border of the German Black Country. Had it been left to grow in the haphazard way common to English towns, it might have become another Dudley or Wolverhampton. The municipality has encouraged trade without allowing trade to disfigure the town. As an example it offered a site worth £100,000 to the German Steel Trust as an inducement to build its central offices there. In this way the city became the headquarters of a business with an annual turnover of eleven millions. No factory is allowed to be built on the west and south-west of the city since the prevailing winds come from those quarters. Dusseldorf, in consequence, is never shrouded in smoke. "We in Dusseldorf have not allowed questions of trade to interfere with questions of public health," the British party was told by Dr. Brandt, who spoke in his dual capacity as secretary of the local Chamber of Commerce and as a member of the City Council.

More instructive is the trade town-planning features of Frankfort. A scheme is in the making there at the present time on which the municipality is spending over three million pounds. To the east of the city by the banks of the Main, several new docks are being excavated for the largest barges from the Rhine, while adjoining sites are being laid out for extensive wharves, warehouses, factories, and railway sidings. A little beyond this area, bordering on a beautiful wood acquired by the city authorities, streets are being generously laid out for dwelling-houses, interspersed with open spaces and playing fields. A new town in effect is being laid out, as a sort of industrial annex to the fair city of Frankfort. All this because the municipality sees a reasonable prospect of the city becoming the exchange centre of the carrying trade of mid-Europe.

There has been nothing like it in the whole history of municipal town-planning. Such a bold venture has only been possible because the city is its own landlord. For years the municipality has quietly been buying land on the planned-out area until to-day it owns over two-thirds of the whole, with such powers of control over the remainder as will compel the owners either to sell or to accept the town-planning principles which the city submits. Having planned out how every part of the district shall be developed, the municipality is now letting or selling its own plots to buyers who agree to utilise them within a given period for the specific purpose set out. This for wharves, that for factories, and the other site for dwellings. The city authorities assist buyers of plots by asking for no more than ten per cent. of the purchase money at the outset, the payment of the balance being spread over a period of years.

Frankfort is not alone among German cities in being a large landowner. Town-planning has only been made possible in Germany by reason of the municipalities having bought large tracts of land, both within and without the city boundaries. Such a decision as that of the London County Council the other day to sell suburban land acquired for housing purposes fills the German councillor with amazement. The systematic purchase of suburban land is part of the ordinary municipal life of Germany. Its local authorities have taken to heart the dictum laid down at Heilbronn a hundred years ago by one of the greatest of their fellow-countrymen. "A town," declares Goethe, "is prosperous through the land which it possesses more than through any other consideration; and the best token of a good administration is that a town is going on buying land."
—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE HAW.

June, 1909.

GLASTONBURY AS A CEMETERY FOR THE EMPIRE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"The Abbey makes us we," says Mr. Kipling, meaning Westminster Abbey; but it does only in rather a lame and limited way. It was never British, for instance, nor did the Danes worship and offer there. Westminster is part of the theory of English history that wants to begin with Norman William or thereabouts, and to end where the Dean and Chapter choose. In Glastonbury we have a possible mausoleum for the great English dead all round the planet. The place has a much greater claim than Westminster to "make us we." It was an ancient Druid shrine before it was Christian, and is ringed round with Celtic names. It was the resting place of St. Patrick and the halting place of St. Bridget. It is connected with the first disciples of Christ. It contained relics of all the ancient Scottish Saints. It was the religious centre in which grew up the work of the makers of England—Alfred, St. Dunstan, Edgar, and Athelstan. It was the burial place of King Arthur and the home of his romance. Thus English, Irish, Scots, and Welsh are equally concerned in it. It is the one shrine in all the Empire where each wave and race of men has worshipped continuously at one altar. The first Christians in and of Britain, the first founders of Saxon Wessex, Canute and the Danes, William and the Normans, worshipped here. Its old Church of St. Mary was built by the first King of the united English, Henry II., and was greatly honored by the first founder, as we may call him, of the English rule, Edward I. The Benedictine Abbey, great and glorious as it was, is only a later growth of Christian Glastonbury, and lasted at the most during half only of the time of its activity.

For over three centuries and a half the sacred acres have been widowed and desolate. Now there is life stirring there once more. Something is to be done. The Bishops are laying their heads together, Churchmen have laid their purses together, and the chief plot is bought back. But the great question is: What is to be done with it? A missionary college, say some. St. Mary's evangelised the rude Germans in the eighth century, why not their equally rude descendants now? And the runic Swedes in the eleventh century, why not the Hottentots of to-day? Because there are already theological and missionary colleges as much as the generosity of folk will support, and even those are usually a little yellow for lack of gold. What we really want is what some jovial pagans of the Press call a Valhalla, what might be better described as a cemetery for the Empire, where each one of the new nations should have a portion, with power to send the bones of those she delights to honor, to lie in that holy ground, with as much faith and hope as they can muster.

That would appeal to the heart and the imagination of our people more than anything which could be suggested. It would be like a thread round which crystals cluster. It would embody and form some of that great sentiment of unity, which is not only essentially Christian and Catholic, but which is really the strong and only bond of the Empire. Imagine what it would be to visit Glastonbury and muse not only of those who have done great things and thought mighty thoughts in a remote past, but on those, whom we have seen and known and loved and obeyed—the men who led us, not only in battle and in law, but in song, in color, in witty invention, discovery, exploration, and in any great deed or thought. What a fine reminder to the new and naked lands, to breed, not millionaires, wheat kings, corn, beef, oil, or tomato kings. but men whom all the sister nations would equally delight to praise and approve! What finer reproof could be given to the inhabitants of any quarter of the Empire than to notice that their share of the plot was empty or filled only with braggarts and local nobodies?

This plan would give some real use and future history to the Abbey. There is no need for the old wealth and bigness, for the many attendants and elaborate machinery. These things did not belong to its best period, and in effect caused its downfall and ruin. There is no need for huge collections, magnificent bequests, lands in seven counties. All that is needed is to say to each one of our kingdoms, "Give us your great dead," or, if they hold these too dear, as is not unlikely, "Give us your memorial to those whom you hold closest to your heart." There would be a great response to this, and, perhaps—who knows?—another great Church might naturally arise there, built not by sudden contract, but by slow growth and much love, as it should be. But that matters less. The great Abbey Church was one hundred and nineteen years building and was adorned by the work of another two hundred and thirty, so that a good many years are likely to pass before this becomes a finished and embodied thought. In the meantime, there is no other plan proposed, and certainly none that is worthy of so splendid a past, and full of possibility for a splendid future, as this—to make Glastonbury the sleeping ground of our great dead.—Yours, &c.,

C. L. MARSON.

June 15th, 1909.

---

Letters to the Editor.

THE INCORRIGIBLE CENSOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On the plea that my previous letter was very short, will you suffer a few words further?

Like Mr. C. E. Maurice, I, too, have been pondering your question, "Is pain to be avoided, &c.?"—a far-reaching thesis, which may invite even more comprehensive handling than that of Mr. Maurice's letter, able and interesting as it is.

When the phrase is considered, one finds as usual that some further definition is required for the purposes of discussion; and it seems to me that much depends (as, indeed, Mr. Maurice recognises) upon the character of the pain which is produced, i.e., whether it is simply a passing sensation, which will leave behind it no harm, but perhaps benefit, or something of a deleterious sort.

Reverting now to the main question out of which this correspondence has arisen—that of the Censorship, it is observable that some of your readers seem to favor the idea of abolishing any sort of official supervision, or, as it is sometimes put, let the public exercise the function. That may sound very well, but can we afford to ignore the practical drawbacks and dangers? What about the possible affliction of a—well, a Sir Felix Janion of Theatres? Have we not heard of indications, and more than indications, of some such controlling organisation in America? And as Mr. William Archer recently pointed out in your columns, the serious feature about this method is that the organiser can, if strong enough, gradually "make the public want what he wants"—"do what he wants them to do," and so forth.

But apart from any such forebodings, does the present state of matters justify the adoption of "free play"? No doubt many of our leading dramatists on various occasions deliver most admirable and edifying utterances about the mission of the theatre; how it must be kept worthy of its traditions, and of its great opportunities of influence, &c., and we rightly applaud these excellent sentiments (and with a little extra heartiness perhaps, by way of a thrust at those needlessly pernickerty people who still express some misgivings about "the theatre"); but when we suggest, privately, to some of these same dramatic authorities, to whom we have listened with so much appreciation, that perhaps such and such a play, or such and such treatment of an episode, was not quite in accord with good taste and good morals, there is reason to fear that we shall sometimes be told that, although, of course, a high tone is desirable, yet sometimes "one must fill the house." Alas! but this is to give away the case for the theatre; and surely the plea is not really well founded. At any rate, some of the most successful plays are the most free from objections of the sort in view; and with a combined purpose on the part of playwrights, performers, and critics, what might not be attained? As to the critics, one often feels inclined to implore them not to pass by things which on moral grounds they do not approve of, with a sort of shrug of the shoulders, but to apply the lash (which they can handle so effectively) more particularly to that special defect. Surely efforts in this direction are in a paramount sense well bestowed. When one thinks of the vast multitude of persons who constantly resort to the theatre, often after a day of monotonous toil, for relaxation and amusement, one feels the cruelty of accustoming them to a diet which is sweetened, so to speak, with arsenic.

Lastly then, if some sort of, I will not say censorship, guardianship, in regard to the stage is required, at least as yet, might not this be secured by a Council or Board of a representative character, either constituted ad hoc or by an addition to the functions of some existing public body?

The idea, which, of course, is not new, seems to be worthy of discussion.—Yours, &c., A.

June 15th, 1909.

A PERSIAN QUAKER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I read with much interest your article on "The Persian Quakers," and was indeed glad to learn that "Babism" has not only survived, but that in spite of persecution its followers have gone on increasing, and that it possibly represents a third of the population.

In the account of its foundation under Mizza Ali Mohammed, "the Bab," I observe you make no mention of the band of women martyrs of the movement headed by Gourret-ûl-Ain" ("Consolation of the Eyes"), a beautiful and highly-educated young woman, who became deeply imbued with the spirit of the Master, protesting against the moral evils involved in polygamy, divorce, and the unequal social standard between men and women. She was one of the original band of apostles numbering nineteen (a sacred number), and one of three who became conspicuous as leaders while Mirza himself was in captivity. She carried on the mission all over the Western province, speaking, it is said, without her veil, and moving her hearers to an extraordinary degree. Many women, and even children, followed her devotedly, and endured suffering and death for the faith that was in them. She could have saved her life by denying her name. She refused, and she, too, within a very few years, joined "the noble army of martyrs," being strangled at Teheran in 1852.

Many others who went to their death sang of their way, "Truly we belong to God. We came from God, and are returning to Him."

M. le Comte de Gobineau, in his "Religions et Philosophies dans l'Asie Centrale," has given the history, and a short account was published in the "Contemporary Review" several years ago.—Yours, &c.,

M. H. L. B.

June 17th, 1909.

THE INTELLECTS OF MEN AND WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I venture, in the name of self-respect, to point out one or two of the most obvious flaws in the arguments which your correspondent so dogmatically dubs "sound," in a letter on the "feminist argument" in your last issue.

That women ought not to vote "because they cannot fight" is the first so designated. Surely, if that were carried to its logical outcome, numberless men, who cannot, either from entire lack of training or from physical deficiency, fight even in the direst extremity, should also be excluded from the franchise! But to lift the discussion to a higher and a saner level; suffragists, like other serious-minded people, look forward to a time when the idea of war will be much less popular and far more repugnant to the average mind than it is to-day—to a state where none would dream of judging capacity for governing or qualification for franchise by merely a physical test. Therefore, a theory which might be of temporary value in a savage tribe will scarcely hold water when applied to a civilised society. To answer with patience the second "equally sound argument respecting the inferiority of the female intellect to that of man," one needs to remind oneself that "charity suffereth long and is kind." If your correspondent would take the trouble to study the position of women from the standpoint of historical development, and take into consideration the narrow groove in which they have been compelled to move, it would perhaps be a matter of surprise that the male sex has not the monopoly of genius. Such, however, strange to say, is the case, and if indeed "the heights of the summits may . . . afford some indication of the height of the tableland beneath," it must be remembered that George Eliot's philosophy moves in much the same atmosphere as does that of Meredith, of Browning, and of Shakespeare, and considering the cloud of suffering whence issued Mrs. Browning's songs, was she, after all, so very far beneath her husband? I venture to assert that it is not fair to judge the capacity of the "tableland," until equality of educational opportunities has had time to bring forth results. "That God made man a little lower than the angels," and woman a stage lower still, it is possible to forgive Milton for believing, three hundred years ago; but to a correspondent of a newspaper to-day—and that paper the most progressive in the kingdom—it is a little difficult to extend the same magnanimity.—Yours, &c.,

Edith Hunter.

37, Angles Road, Streatham, S.W.
June 15th, 1909.

WOMEN AND WAR

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Belfort Bax objects to your argument that one of the reasons why women ought to have the vote is that, though they do not fight, they suffer most in war. He calls this a threadbare sophism. "How do they suffer?" he asks. "Are they shot down, killed, or wounded? No; on the contrary, they enjoy the privileges of their sex in not being touched. Their sufferings, such as they are, and what there are of them, are distinctly vicarious."

That is the typical attitude of the doctrinaire—the man who thinks he knows all about war if he has sat in his study and heard the troops marching away to the tune of "The Girl I Left Behind Me." All his concern with a war seems finished when he has discovered from his atlas whether the scene of conflict is in Africa or Asia. He cannot imagine that war sometimes actually enters a country where women live, and sometimes it has even disturbed philosophers in their studies.

He has not seen, as I have seen, crowds of women, mixed up with cattle and soldiers, carrying their children on their backs or on their heads, and running for their lives from afternoon all through the night till morning. He has not seen women watching the lines of children's graves grow longer as they sat huddled together in the dust and sickness of concentration camps. Nor has he seen women shivering in the rain upon the bare patch of cinders where their home had stood, or wandering in snow-covered mountains with their children, maddened with illness, fear, and starvation; or "enjoying the privileges of their sex" while they hid in woods, terrified of outrage from hour to hour; or lying dead upon the road.

Those are some of the sufferings that war brings upon women. To me it is outrageous that they should have no voice in a question that involves for themselves horrors beyond anything that men suffer in war. But it is more outrageous still that a man who appears to know nothing of war beyond the look of a soldier walking out with a nursemaid, should sit quietly at home and sneer at such sufferings as "distinctly vicarious."—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

4, Downside Crescent,
Hampstead,
June 17th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Belfort Bax's relation to the Editor of THE NATION is surely not so sympathetic nor so intimate as that between a mother and her son who is risking his life for his country, or a wife whose whole happiness depends upon the safe return of her husband.

Women have suffered terribly in times of war, and therefore should be allowed their voice in so great a question. —Yours, &c.,

HILDA A. WALKER.

Knowle House,
Mirfield, Yorks,
June 14th, 1909.

MINISTERS AND THE PARTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is there not an aptitude on the part of reformers to come to hasty decisions? "A Liberal Elector's" letter in your issue of the 12th inst., I trust, is not his expression of a carefully-considered conclusion on a matter which, after all, is not the quintessence of Liberalism. In all probability my own views on the recent hysterical outburst of "anti-Germanism" coincide with those of your correspondent, and, with him, I deplore the tactlessness of our Liberal leaders in giving any possible grounds for the suggestion that they are encouraging such a degraded conception of our modern European civilisation; but the bankruptcy of the Liberal Party has certainly not come.

The Budget is the solidification of our most cherished ideals, and the mere comments of our Ministers are, after all, words. The meeting which may have been taking place as your correspondent wrote, certainly showed the views of two other important members of the Government as being wholly hostile to the recent artificial exposition of the aims of some Continental Powers.

The Liberal Government may not be perfect in every respect, but it does deserve to be protected from those supporters who, no doubt, in perfect good faith, rush into print with the avowed intention of registering the withdrawal of their support on every occasion that a certain utterance from high quarters displeases their true Liberal feelings.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN B. MARTINDALE.

232, Great Clowes Street,
Higher Broughton, Manchester,
June 14th, 1909.

THE TSAR'S VISIT TO ENGLAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your incisive utterance on the above subject in your issue of the 12th inst. ought surely to have practical effect. You say "The Tsar of Russia is about to visit the British Court." Being myself a plebian, I may not understand correctly what is meant by "the Court." All I hope is, that the British nation will not be called upon to welcome in any shape or form the pitiful despot whose rule you describe. We, living under a happier form of government, cherish, especially in recent years, a sincere respect for our own peace-making King, who knows how to reign in accordance with the will of the people. It would be an impertinence in the true sense of the word—that is, an irrelevance—to discuss his family relationship, or the family reunions he may desire. But for his Foreign Minister to force on us an unwelcome public visit from the man, the bloody chaos of whose so-called Government you so describe, would be an intolerable insult to the whole British people. Certainly it would not pass unresented. Thanks to the victory of our seventeenth century Parliaments over the superstition of the "divine right" of kings, we have learned gradually and slowly, but surely, to rely more and more on moral force. It is not therefore for a moment to be feared that any of British breed, however much they may hate and despise the Tsar's methods of rule by bloodshed and torture, would lift a hand to hurt him, or would by open insult break the laws of hospitality. But there are legal, constitutional, and peaceful methods of making an intrusive visitor feel that he is unwelcome. And there are people enough in London sick at heart with the horrors of Russian prisons to make sure that those methods will be adopted.

Besides, though we may be sure of the peaceful behavior of our own people, even under a cruel outrage such as this rumored visit would be, who can guarantee that some Russian or Polish refugee from the maddening miseries of his country may not do a deed which would pollute our sacred land with a damning stain? It is all very well to line the streets with troops, and scatter spies in every public house; but we are too much accustomed to the habits of freedom to do this sort of thing as it is done in Russia—even there not always effectually. And if we bungled in the wretched business—God help us—we should be blackened in the opinion of all the world; and the prospects of constitutional progress would, for a time at least, be blighted, not only in Russia, but in all places where the terror of anarchism lurks. A Foreign Minister has no right to incur such unutterable risks for the sake of a petty show of triumph in diplomacy. A visit to "the Court," provided the Court be far enough off from London is, I suppose, not our business. But if "the Court" could be afloat, on board a royal yacht, so that our shores are not polluted, so much the better.—Yours, &c.,

J. ALLANSON PICTON.

Caerlyr, Penmaenmawr, North Wales,
June 13th, 1909.

[We notice that the proposed visit will be to Cowes, so that the events and possibilities which our correspondent discusses cannot arise.—ED. NATION.]

REASON AND INSTINCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Why should we feel, with your correspondent "T." "an element of regret" because the writer of the fine paper on "Thought and Instinct" (in your issue of the 5th inst.) expresses "some pessimism" as to the ability of science to do that which it is not the business of science alone to do? The whole paper is surely intended to show that intellect alone, artificially isolated from life, is insufficient to solve speculative problems. Far from desiring to divorce instinct from reason, as your correspondent suggests, the whole effort of the newer philosophy is to prove that the divorce already attempted by scientific dogmatism is unnatural and mistaken.

In Monsieur Bergson's words:—

"S'il est vrai en effet que notre intelligence tende invinciblement à matérialiser ses conceptions et à jouer ses rêves, on peut présumer que les habitudes contractées ainsi dans l'action, remontant jusqu'à la spéculation, viendront troubler à sa source même la connaissance immédiate que nous aurions de notre esprit, de notre corps, et de leur influence réciproque. Beaucoup de difficultés naîtraient donc peut-être de ce que nous brouillons la spéculation et la pratique, ou de ce que nous poussons une idée dans la direction de l'utile quand nous croyons l'approfondir théoriquement, ou enfin de ce que nous employons les formes de l'action à penser. En délimitant alors soigneusement l'action et la connaissance, on verrait s'éclaircir bien des obscurités, soit que certains problèmes arrivent à se résoudre, soit qu'il n'y ait plus lieu de les poser." (Matière et Mémoire Avant-propos.)

Yours, &c.,

A STUDENT OF BERGSON.

June 16th, 1909.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with some interest Mr. C. H. Norman's letter in your last week's issue. May I just say that the Minority Report was signed by Prebendary Russell-Wakefield, Mr. F. W. Chandler, Mrs. Sidney Webb, and myself. The first two are not avowed Socialists, one of them being a prominent trade unionist, and the other a Liberal Churchman, who has given proof over and over again of his honest desire to treat unemployment not as a crime to be visited on the individuals, but as a crime for which society is responsible, and for which society must find a remedy. Mrs. Webb's record as a social reformer needs no defence from me. As for myself, I have been a Socialist for at least eighteen years of my life; or at least I have thought I was one, though apparently nowadays every Socialist who disagrees with a fellow-Socialist at once sees in the other man an anti-Socialist. In addition to being a Socialist, I have lent a hand in the practical administration of the Poor Law, and measures for the relief of unemployment. And I just put my experience of actual facts against Mr. Norman's statement, and say that if the Minority Report is studied as a whole, and judged as a whole, it will convince any impartial observer that what we aim at is to abolish the causes of destitution and poverty, and further to impose upon all of us the responsibility of not being content with the wretched miserable conditions under which so many people live. I believe that if the proposals in regard to unemployment are carried out, they will inevitably lead to the almost entire suppression of unemployment. In any case they will enable the men and women who are the victims of our commercial life to find some more ready way of relieving their need when unemployed, than the means now at hand, in the shape of the Poor Law and Distress Committees.

I therefore hope that your readers, instead of accepting the mere statement of Mr. Norman or myself, will each buy a copy of the Report, or at least get a sight of the literature being issued by the National Committee. I am certain that if they do this, they will send their names along to the secretaries, and become active agents in bringing about the destruction of the Poor Law, and the organisation of the labor market. For they will realise that the scheme put forward will not make unemployment a crime, but will make us all ashamed of the preventible destitution and misery which form so large a part of the lives of many of our fellow citizens.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE LANSBURY.

June 15th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. C. H. Norman's objection to the Minority Report—that it contains proposals to deal with the unemployed punitively—is not one which need cause him a moment's uneasiness. As I understand them, the Minority Commissioners propose a re-arrangement of industrial conditions so that the unemployed man shall not be able to say, "I am unemployed because I cannot find work!" He will have to confess that he is unemployed because he does not wish to find work. At present we are totally unable to distinguish between the unemployed man who is eager to obtain employment and the unemployed man who isn't. If the Minority Commissioners' proposals are carried into effect, we shall know that the unemployed man is unemployed of his own volition; and since an unemployed man is a social evil, we must take such steps as are necessary to prevent his continuing to be a social evil. If a man, who is fit to work, will not work, then he must be made to work, for a nation cannot afford to maintain a body of consuming non-producers. That has been the cause of the downfall of the empires of the past, the maintenance of bodies of consuming non-producers. Mr. Balfour's assertion in the House of Commons recently that the rock on which all past democracies have split was the rock of the many taxing the few, was, like most of Mr. Balfour's hasty generalisations, simply untrue.

I cannot follow Mr. Norman's contention that a society which adopts punitive measures for its own protection is tending towards slavery. It seems to me that a great deal of slavery has come about through society not adopting punitive means to compel all men to perform their share in maintaining the social fabric. The error into which Mr. Norman has fallen is that he confuses the punitive measures adopted by minorities to coerce majorities into maintaining them in idleness, with the punitive measures that may be adopted by the whole society to compel service from all the members of that society. As a matter of fact, for most men, compulsion to work is unnecessary. For that very reason it is necessary, however, to reserve the power to compel men to serve, in order that you may protect the willing worker from the shirker. To call this slavery is, to my mind, an abuse of terms.—Yours, &c.,

ST. JOHN G. ERVINE.

13, Champion Park,
Denmark Hill, S.E.
June 14th, 1909.

---

A "DAILY MAIL" EXPERT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Daily Mail" experts are sometimes amusing. Last Saturday after the report of the field day held at Aldershot for the benefit of the Colonial Pressmen, the "Daily Mail" published an article headed:—

"A GERMAN VIEW.
"PUNGENT CRITICISMS OF CIVILIAN IGNORANCE."

The amusing thing was the display of the writer's own ignorance, joined as it was with an assumption of superior knowledge. Here is the boast of superior wisdom:—

> "The most remarkable thing of all—always speaking from a German standpoint—was the ignorance of almost all the civilians present of things military. Hardly anyone knew the names of the regiments. In Berlin every child would have known better."

And here is proof of the expert's ignorance. He writes:—

> "A thing absolutely unknown in Germany is a military police. There is no use for one. The German army would not know what to do with one if it had it."

One wonders if the writer has ever been with a German force mobilised for manœuvres. And, if so, has he failed to recognise—what, no doubt, the Berlin child would have "spotted"—certain keen-looking officers and troopers riding about and wearing green tunics, with light blue collars and cuffs? If one gets too near the front of an advancing line, one of these green coats is soon on the spot to warn one that one must get out of the way. They are the "Feld Gendarmerie" (the Army Police). Every Army Corps has its detachments. There is a specially "swagger" detachment attached to the Kaiser's headquarters, with white pants and bright cuirassier helmets, the Leibgarde Gendarmerie, an officer, and twenty-four picked men, who see to the Emperor's personal safety. In war, the Feld Gendarmerie attend to the grim duties of what we call the Provost-Marshal's department. In peace they do the work of the military police, and do it in a much more arbitrary way than our own "red-caps" ever venture upon.—Yours, &c.,

AN OLD WAR CORRESPONDENT.

June 16th, 1909.

---

FIRE BRIGADES AND FIRE INSURANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"Insurance Manager" is wise in apologising to Mr. S. J. G. Hoare for his faux pas, but what can we think of an insurance authority who bases his attacks on paragraphs culled from the half-penny Yellow journals? I still affirm that fire insurance is "practically compulsory"—on business people, at any rate. And to prove my contention is fairly easy. "Insurance Manager" says that the certified returns in the Administrative County of London alone are only £1,055,200,172. Agreed, but he forgets that hundreds of firms have their own fire insurance funds amounting to millions. Also that the return he gives of insurances applies to British offices alone, and not to foreign and Colonial companies, whose London insurances are no small items. Nor is he including the fire insurances effected through Lloyd's underwriters, which, according to a return I have seen, cover over twelve millions. Of course, I must admit that there is considerable property non-insured, but I believe that the larger bulk of insurable property is covered by insurance in a very great measure. I have not before me the chart he speaks of, but I have its equivalent—the "Finance Chronicle" chart for 1907-8. And I think I can justify my assertion of enormous profits. The total paid-up capital of the thirty tariff fire offices amounts to £7,311,034, and their premiums received for the year £24,727,448, the interest (less income-tax, bad debts, &c.) being £1,402,116. The net losses were £12,066,685, and the expenses of management, &c., were £8,640,838. Dividends, or amount to profit and loss account, come to £3,786,799, equivalent to half the total paid-up capital! The total funds of the tariff offices (exclusive of capital) amounted to £29,360,401. Will it be asserted that these funds have not been built up from the premiums paid by policy holders?

It is all very well for "Insurance Manager" to imitate the Tariff Reformer, and—pick a year. We know about San Francisco, Valparaiso, Jamaica, and the Canadian disasters. This was purely speculative business, and the British offices would do well if they confined their efforts to these islands, instead of going abroad for business which results on an average of 65 per cent. losses on the premiums received, leaving (after the expenses are paid) little, or nothing, as margin. The British policy-holders have to pay the piper, and are never considered by the companies. Indeed, the fire insurance business is very one-sided, the people receiving most benefit being the officials and the shareholders. Compare the £42,000 received as bonuses by the policy-holders, with the management expenses, and the dividends paid to shareholders! Here is a table of the present value of shares in eleven companies:—

| | Share. | Paid up. | Present price. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | £ | £ s. d. | £ s. d. |
| Atlas ... ... ... ... | 10 | 1 4 0 | 5 8 9 |
| Alliance ... ... ... ... | 20 | 2 4 0 | 11 15 0 |
| Commercial Union ... ... | 10 | 1 0 0 | 15 15 0 |
| Liverpool, London and Globe | 2 | 2 0 0 | 41 7 6 |
| London and Lancashire ... | 25 | 2 10 0 | 21 12 0 |
| London Assurance ... ... | 25 | 12 10 0 | 48 10 0 |
| North British ... ... ... | 25 | 6 5 0 | 38 17 6 |
| Norwich Union ... ... ... | 100 | 6 0 0 | 114 0 0 |
| Phœnix ... ... ... ... | 50 | 5 0 0 | 32 0 0 |
| Royal ... ... ... ... | 10 | 1 10 0 | 24 5 0 |
| Sun ... ... ... ... | 10 | 0 10 0 | 11 13 9 |

Comparisons are, indeed, odious, especially when comparing the Royal, which has been in existence sixty-four years, has swallowed up sundry companies, and takes a re-insurance risk of £4,000,000 from a single American company, with the Municipal Mutual, which transacts only one form of business, and has only been in existence a bare six years. This is really absurd. There are now over 200 authorities insuring with the Municipal Mutual, and at its present rate of progress it will not be long before the majority join hands, and something like £50,000,000 of fire risks be covered through its agency, especially as its fire loss is only 2·7 per cent. for the year, as compared with 50 per cent. of the insurance companies' premium income. I notice "Insurance Manager" has nothing to say re my other assertions. He is, indeed, in for a rude awakening.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. Brown.

June 16th, 1909.

THE DEFECTS OF THE LIBERAL PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—During the past month considerable correspondence has appeared in the columns of various Liberal journals upon the above subject. Those who have written on this topic have shown a singular unanimity upon two points. In the first place, their fears appear to be solely due to the obvious activity of the Tariff Reformers. In the second place, their letters show a remarkable lack of detailed information as to the character and extent of the work which is being done, either for or against Free Trade; and, a still more noticeable absence of practical proposals, which would tend either to extend or to improve the Free Trade propaganda.

The Free Trade Union, which is largely responsible for the organisation of the Free Trade forces on non-party lines throughout the country, will welcome any practical suggestion which may be made with the object of enlarging the field of its operations or rendering them more efficient. Nothing but good can come of a full and free consideration of any and every propaganda proposal put forward by experienced persons, who have the maintenance of Free Trade deeply at heart. I venture to suggest, however, that it is not the best form of tactics to disclose suggested plans of campaign in the sight of the enemy, or, on inadequate information, to extol their strength and proclaim our own comparative weakness. Such a process may encourage our opponents; it can scarcely cheer our friends. It is, indeed, hardly more conducive to the preparation of adequate fiscal armaments, than is a "Dreadnought" scare calculated to add to the real strength and efficiency of a navy.

Still, no capable organisation resents informed criticism; it welcomes it. In order to encourage and assist suggestions and criticisms from those who desire to see the cause of Free Trade more fully and successfully placed before the country, the Free Trade Union will be glad to give to any known Free Traders, who are prepared to help us in our work, a full statement of our operations during the past year, with particulars of our immediate and future plans.

Meanwhile, I would say to those Free Traders who are rightly concerned as to the safety of Free Trade, that there are two ways in which they can help us. Subscriptions to our funds will enable us to strengthen our existing agencies, while voluntary helpers in speaking, organising, and canvassing, will be welcomed, and given an immediate opportunity of rendering much-needed assistance to those who are already at work.—Yours, &c.,

G. Wallace Carter,
General Secretary, Free Trade Union.

8, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.

Poetry.

KNITTING.

E'en though her tongue may by its force
Leave me as helpless as a horse,
When barks a saucy pup at him—
I'll love her better for that whim.
No steady summer's love for me,
But let her still uncertain be;
Like spring, whose gusts, and frowns, and showers,
Do grow us fresher, lovelier flowers.
No substances on earth can make
The joy I from her shadow take;
When first I saw her face, I could
Not help draw near her where she stood;
I felt more joy than when a Bee
Sees in a garden a Plum-tree
All blossoms and no leaves, and he Leaps o'er the fence immediately.
I like to see her when she sits—
Not dreaming I look on—and knits;
To see her hands, with grace so light,
Stabbing the wool that's red or white,
With shining needles, sharp and long,
That never seem to go far wrong.
And that sight better pleases me
Than green hills in the Sun: to see
The beach, what time the Tide goes out
And leaves his gold spread all about.

William H. Davies.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. ROOSEVELT intends to write an account of his adventures during his present hunting expedition. We believe that Mr. Murray has made arrangements for the publication of the book in this country, and that it will be issued simultaneously with the American edition. It will not make its appearance until some time after Mr. Roosevelt has returned from Africa.

* * *

WE understand that Mr. John Galsworthy has nearly finished another play. It is to be called "The Eldest Son," and the scene is laid in an English country house. The announcement is sure to awaken the liveliest expectation among playgoers, for Mr. Galsworthy's growing popularity as a playwright is one of the most promising developments of the British drama.

* * *

THE present issue of THE NATION appears on the centenary of Lord Houghton's birth. Lord Houghton is, of course, chiefly remembered by his graceful and sympathetic "Life and Remains of John Keats," though a few of his own lyrics—"Strangers Yet" is one of the best known of them—retain a place in most English anthologies. One of the Cambridge "Apostles," he had an unbounded admiration for Tennyson, whom he recommended to Peel for a pension in 1845. It was also largely through his influence that five years later Tennyson was appointed Poet Laureate. To Houghton also belongs the credit of being one of the first to recognise Swinburne's genius. But catholicity of taste was his distinguishing feature. He had the faculty of bringing together men so widely disparate that Carlyle declared he ought to be "perpetual president of the heaven—and—hell amalgamation society." Disraeli painted him in "Tancred" as Mr. Vavasour. The impression that Houghton seems to have left on those who knew him best was that he was a man who might have reached high rank in any one direction if his intellectual interests had been steadier, and if he had kept them within narrower bounds. He was politician, traveller, after-dinner speaker, and philanthropist. He went up in a balloon and down in a diving-bell, in days when either feat was considered a most hazardous adventure, and he was the earliest Englishman who wrote with first-hand knowledge about the harems of the East.

* * *

AT his death, three years ago, Dr. Richard Garnett left an unfinished biography of W. J. Fox, M.P. for Oldham, Anti-Corn Law League agitator, and Radical reformer. W. J. Fox, who was perhaps the most celebrated orator of his day, and renowned for his popular addresses at South Place Chapel, the pastorate of which he held for thirty years, was a friend of John Stuart Mill and Harriet Martineau, and the discoverer of the youthful Robert Browning's talent. We understand that Dr. Garnett's biography, which has been concluded by his son, Mr. Edward Garnett, will contain some interesting Browning letters, and other documents of literary interest.

* * *

DURING the autumn Mr. Sidney Lee's lectures on "The French Renaissance in England" will be published by the Clarendon Press. Mr. Lee has made a careful study of the literary relations between England and France during the sixteenth century, and his lectures do for that period what the volumes of M. Joseph Texte and the late Professor Churton Collins do for the two succeeding centuries.

* * *

"THE ETERNAL VALUES" is the title of a book by Professor Münsterberg of Harvard, "written in the service of the search for a new philosophy," which Messrs. Constable will publish in a few weeks. Professor Münsterberg first wrote the work in German, and it appeared last year in Germany, where it had a great success. The English edition has been completely revised and contains much fresh matter.

* * *

"THE AMERICAN PEOPLE: A STUDY IN NATIONAL PSYCHOLOGY" is the title of a book by Mr. A. Maurice Low, which will be published in the early autumn. In his preface Mr. Low protests against the practice of the "literary journalist" who thinks that a flying visit to a foreign country gives him quite enough material to set up as an authority upon its people and customs. He has himself spent nine years upon his coming book, and thinks that to describe a foreign country without the proper qualifications "should be regarded as a violation of international comity."

* * *

UNDER the title of "Pauperism and Poverty" Mr. Thomas Jones is about to publish a summary and exposition of the results reached by the recent Poor Law Commission. Besides the two bulky reports already issued by the Commission, there are between thirty and forty volumes of appendices in course of publication. The vast bulk of this material makes it quite inaccessible to the average reader, but Mr. Jones is well qualified for his task of bringing it within reasonable dimensions, as, besides being lecturer on Social Economics at Glasgow University, he was one of the special investigators appointed by the Commission.

* * *

M. EUGENE FASQUELLE has just published the "Correspondence entre Victor Hugo et Paul Meurice." The letters, which have been brought together by Meurice's daughters and are preceded by an introduction from M. Jules Claretie, cover the period from December, 1851, when Hugo was exiled by Louis Napoleon, up to 1878, when he took possession of his house in the Avenue d'Eylau. They mostly deal with the performances of Hugo's plays and the political campaign against the Second Empire, which he carried on from Hauteville House, but there are many interesting references to his literary projects. Thus, on the 9th of June, 1873, he writes: "This morning at half-past twelve I wrote the last line of the book, 'Quatre-vingt-treize' with the pen which is writing to you now. This first work is the beginning of a great whole. Not knowing whether I shall have time to write the immense epic of which I see glimpses, I have desired to paint this first fresco. The remainder will follow, Deo volente." Hugo was convinced that the Franco-German War would end in the overthrow of Prussia, but he speaks of it as a "royal and imperial butchery" in which the French people had no concern. On the day that war was declared he planted an acorn which he called "The Oak of the United States of Europe."

* * *

WE have received the first number of the "inaugural issue" of the journal of the Poetry Recital Society. The founders of the new society hold that poetry is written for sound rather than sight, and has to be communicated by inflexion of voice, not by pantomime. This ought to be an obvious precept, but it has been widely forgotten, and any movement which promises to revive the almost lost art of reading aloud ought to be encouraged. The President of the Poetry Recital Society is Lady Margaret Sackville, its Director Mr. Galloway Kyle, and its Vice-Presidents Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Sir Frank Marzials, Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, and Mr. R. F. Benson. A number of excursions are being organised to those parts of Germany especially reminiscent of Goethe and Schiller, and to the Lake of Geneva, and scenes associated with Byron, Victor Hugo, Rousseau, and Mendelssohn.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Decoration and Furniture of English Mansions during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries." By Francis Lenygon. (Werner Laurie. 31s. 6d. net.)

"The Spirit of the Downs." By Arthur Beckett. (Methuen. 10s. 6d net.)

"Rasplata (The Reckoning)." By Commander Wladimir Semenoff. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Beginnings of the Teaching of Modern Subjects in England." By Foster Watson. (Pitman. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Fleet Street, and Other Poems." By John Davidson. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

"Tyrol and Its People." By Clive Holland. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"A Change in the Cabinet." By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 6s.)

"The Pools of Silence." By H. de Vere Stacpoole. (Unwin. 6s.)

"Le Socialisme et la Sociologie Réformiste." Par A. Fouillée. (Paris: Alcan. 7fr. 50.)

"Histoire Religieuse de la Révolution Française." Par Pierre de la Gorce. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7 fr. 50.)

"Les Soutiens de l'Ordre." Roman. Par Georges Le Cardonnel. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE PATRIOTISM OF VENICE.*

Mr. Horatio Brown's translation of the last two volumes of Molmenti's "History of Venice" is in one respect at least superior to his translation of the former volumes. It is not only a careful and scholarly translation, the former were that, it is also a complete translation. The reader who has no Italian is not exasperated by coming upon long extracts and quotations in the original. Every now and then, indeed, he is tripped up by an Italian passage, left for that purpose in the middle of the text, but this practical joke is played comparatively seldom, and does not try the temper to the breaking point. The book is one which everyone interested in Venice ought to possess. Signor Molmenti is himself a Venetian and writes of the Republic with the insight of a native. This, in the case of Venice, is a prime consideration. Between semi-Oriental Venice and the rest of Europe there existed from the first the misunderstanding which always reigns betwixt East and West. Venice has been much praised by the strangers within her gates, but she has been praised always as something exotic. She has been often feared, more often hated, almost always mistrusted, but never loved and never understood. Her Oriental manners and sympathies, her subtle Oriental diplomacy, were objects to the West of constant suspicion. She shared in no European ideals. The Western passion for liberty, the instinct for self-government and free citizenship, which was, as it were, the very root of Western civilisation and progress, never inspired her. A century before the Florentine Guilds crushed feudalism and took over the government of the city, Venice (1172) had accepted the dominion of a limited aristocracy. With a similar indifference she viewed the mental awakening of the Renaissance. None of the leaders in the great intellectual movement hail from Venice. The ferment that was shaking the rest of Italy never touched her. She listened to its eager hubbub and clamor as unconcernedly as an Eastern Rajah might listen to the chattering of a colony of monkeys among the tree tops.

And yet, for centuries after the other Italian States had forfeited their independence, Venice possessed hers. Political liberty she early threw away, if, indeed, she ever in any true sense possessed it; intellectual liberty she ignored, and these things are recognised in Europe as the very foundations of national existence. And yet, these being absent, the consciousness of her national identity and the intense pride and love of her children for their city preserved century after century the inviolability of the State. This is what, in Venetian history, is so incomprehensible. At the very moment when Venice, internally, was cowering under the rule of the Ten, she was, externally, withstanding single-handed the whole weight of the Moslem advance on Europe. Western writers sometimes fail in justice to Venice in this matter. They are fond of representing Venice in the seventeenth century as in a helpless and hopeless decadence. So, judged by all Western standards, she should have been. By the seventeenth century Venetian citizens had long been inured to political servitude. They were watched and overheard by the spies of a little band of autocrats whose will was law. In 1685 a visitor, supposed to be Goudar, burlesques, yet, allowing for the burlesque, describes, the situation. "A stranger," he says, "who comes to the Republic should leave his tongue at Fusina and reach Venice dumb. Silence is the emblem of this Government; all is secret and mysterious. Politics are enveloped in night. Talkers in Venice are buried alive in lead-covered dungeons. The man who has spoken once is condemned to eternal silence. There are some who for speaking a single word have been kept gagged these thirty years."

Moreover, accompanying this extinction of public spirit, there is apparent in Venetian life of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a passion for luxury and frivolity, and an increasing corruption of manners and morals which are supposed to be equally sure signs of national degeneration. The setting Venice was able to provide for her masques and pageants and perpetual festivals must have lent a peculiar fascination even to those scenes of "madness and folly" described by Evelyn and De la Haye. The magnificence of her architecture, with its strong admixture of color, the lit up canals and darting, graceful gondolas seemed to offer opportunities for pleasure and adventure which other cities could not afford. Even to this day as one follows the mysterious windings of her canals, for the most part now deserted and lonely, where the strokes of the broad-bladed oar set the echoes flapping between the palace fronts, even now it is easy to feel how unique and wonderful a background was provided by these romantic accessories for the orgy of self-indulgence into which the city threw herself.

Such marks of decadence are obvious and they have been presented by Western writers with a vigor which has left upon the general public the impression that the latter two or three centuries of Venice's career were centuries of graceful debauchery and nothing else. But this is far from being the case. It was during the seventeenth century, that century, according to Ruskin, of furious and wanton dissipation, when every impulse of faith and patriotism had long been dried up, that the spirit and energy of Venice rose to their highest. Not even against the early rivalry of the Genoese had the Venetians displayed such courage as they now displayed against the advance of the Turk. The four and twenty years' defence of Candia by the Republic, from 1645 to 1669, is the greatest event in all Venetian history. "The century to which it belongs," as Mr. Hazlitt well says, "has no episode to offer to our consideration more striking, more patriotic, more noble." The siege of the capital alone is said to have cost the Porte 108,000 men. Mocenigo and Morosini, the successive admirals of the Venetian fleets, by a happy admixture of genius and daring, succeeded in holding in check the unlimited yet unwieldy armaments of their formidable enemy. Thanks to the dissension among the Western nations, Venice was forced to face alone a peril common to Europe, and which Europe should in justice have combined to withstand. Yet she proved, at however great loss to herself, equal to the task. Ducat by ducat and drop by drop, she spent her treasure and blood in the unequal contest. She kept her fleets manned with a body of seamen whose devotion was constantly found equal to the desperate nature of the occasion, nor is it too much to say that the annals of naval warfare contain no more glorious records than those which tell how Venice, single-handed, withstood for years the weight and pressure of Turkish conquest. The act of the commandant of San Teodoro who blew the fortress, himself, and his assailants into the air rather than surrender was typical of the spirit with which Venice fought. The defence of Tommaso Mocenigo's galley against forty-five Turkish men-of-war and his own death in the moment of rescue and victory, recall the like action of Grenville and the "Revenge." The course of the war is marked throughout by similar incidents; and when it drew to a close, Venice had done her work. If she was crippled and exhausted, so, too, was the Porte. The success of the Turks was gained "at the price of sapping the foundations of their Empire." Their appetite for slaughter was glutted and their apparently inexhaustible supplies were exhausted when they had done with Venice. Henceforth Europe had nothing to fear from a Moslem invasion.

Such were the actions of Venice in the period of her so-called decadence. During those very years of frivolity, corruption, and political servitude her citizens were fighting, at long odds, with the courage of bulldogs, and were led, as Mr. Hazlitt points out, "by a succession of men of lofty capacity and dauntless spirit worthy of the Crusades." The incongruity between what, apparently, she was and what she was doing remains to this day inexplicable. The History of which Mr. Brown has now completed the translation does not solve that mystery. The task it sets itself is to analyse and describe the internal life of Venice rather than her external actions, and it tends, perhaps, in its later volumes, to emphasise our idea of the city's corruption rather than to recall to our minds what there was strenuous and noble in her conduct. Nevertheless, even in these intimate accounts of a life in the main extravagant, careless, and dissolute, there are to be found hints which tend to a solution of the mystery. That the Venetians were patriotic their deeds tell us, but, as we study Molmenti's pages, it becomes clear to us that Venetian patriotism was a thing by itself, was not what we in the West are accustomed to think of as patriotism. The Venetians' love of Venice was a feminine love. It was less a matter of intellect than sentiment. It did not depend on reason. It did not involve and postulate a society and a government fulfilling the needs and satisfying the ambitions of free citizenship. A Venetian did not love his city because it was the outward expression of his own free will, because of his own share in its maintenance, because he recognised it as his own handiwork. He loved it purely emotionally and for its own sake; not with understanding, but with passion. The love of a Florentine for Florence was less love of an actual place than of the ideas it incarnated. Take away the ideas, the liberty and freedom which had built Florence up, and the love would go too. But the Venetian's love was personal, direct. It made no conditions, asked no return. It idolised its object not for what she gave but for what she was. The peculiarity of the isolated life of the lagoons, the powerful concentration of all thoughts into so strict a compass, the extraordinary beauty and fascination of the city herself—these things acting on a race by temperament sensuous were well calculated to give birth to that blind, unquestioning idolatry which seems to have been the sentiment which her children entertained for Venice. She had in their eyes no rival. Abstract ideas and enthusiasms never touched them. Their only thought in presence of the religious fervor of the Crusaders was how to use that fervor for their city's aggrandisement. Venice herself was their religion. They would not fight for the Holy Sepulchre, but they would fight to the death for a yard of Venetian territory. Such a love is durable. As it is based on no rational considerations, so it survives all rational considerations. Freedom may go, but the love stays. A trifler, a reveller, a sot, a debauchee, the Venetian was still ready, as often as not, to die for Venice. This note of tigerish Oriental passion colors Venetian patriotism to the end. We are not to forget it; it did great things. Florentine patriotism is easier for us to understand than Venetian. Nevertheless it was not so stable. Emotional patriotism outlasted intellectual patriotism, and long after the Florentines had given up fighting for freedom the Venetians went on fighting for love.

* "Venice—The Decadence." By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. Murray. 2 vols. 21s. net.

---

THE FATHER OF MODERN PROTECTIONISM.*

All who want to understand the origins of modern tariff controversies ought to read this scholarly presentment of the career and works of Friedrich List, who, more than any other, deserves the title of "Father of Protectionism." For, though Tariff Reformers in this country could hardly be expected to acknowledge as their philosopher and friend one who avowed, "If I had been an Englishman, I should have been a Free Trader," much of their economic, and still more of their political, reasoning is based upon List's National System. Not a thinker of the first order, he had that capacity for audacious generalisation which, united with enthusiasm, industry, and real literary power, enables a man to play a considerable part in history. A theorist reacting against theories, appealing from an academic oligarchy to "the plain people," he wielded some of the same power and performed some of the same intellectual functions as Paine and Cobbett, except that his full influence, unlike theirs, matured after his death.

Born in Würtemberg in the momentous year 1789, he grew to manhood in an age of uncommon perturbation and disillusionment. At the close of the Napoleonic era, he saw Germany a cluster of weakened and divided States, each State, even each considerable city, with its tax barriers against its neighbours, and incapable of friendly co-operation with one another. The manufacturing industries which had struggled into being, to browse upon the artificially inflated prices of the war, were rapidly collapsing before the inroad of English goods produced by the new industrial methods. List began as a Free Trader, accepting the dominant cosmopolitan spirit of the time. Indeed, his early enthusiasm for a national Zollverein did not carry him far towards limitation of external trade. It was not until the political difficulties of his agitation resulted in his exile to America that the protective side of his policy became prominent. He found the United States a hotbed of political ideas and experiments. Groups of powerful manufacturers in the textile industries were beginning to rally behind the protectionist banner raised as far back as 1792 by Alexander Hamilton; internal Free Trade was not enough, they must have security and assistance for their infant industries against the unfair competition of Europe. In such an atmosphere the National System of Political Economy quickly ripened; men of profitable ideas who could express them so as to influence politics were in demand, and List soon attained a considerable position. His prophetic eye saw the immense significance of railways to national life, while the new transport was yet in its infancy, and returning in 1830 to Germany he spent much of his remaining years in urging on his slower-witted countrymen these iron bands of national unity. But his busy, versatile mind occupied itself with various schemes of national and intellectual import. Settled at Leipzig as journalist and politician he pleaded incessantly with voice and pen the causes of imperial Zollverein, developing the protective scheme which found its complete shape in his important book of 1841. Miss Hirst has gathered much new information about his busy life, and gives an interesting account of his visit to England in 1846, when he heard the excited debates upon the Corn Laws and talked with Mr. Cobden.

An excellent summary of List's economic doctrines is followed by judicious selections from his writings, which are sufficient to place readers in full possession of his two main theses, that of the three stages in the evolution of national industry, and the distinction between individual, political, and cosmopolitan economy. The former doctrine is thus summarised: "In the early development of a nation Free Trade is beneficial; the exchange of raw materials for manufactures stimulates agriculture and assures higher wants. When the country has begun to manufacture for itself, the State must provide a suitable system of Protection under which, shielded from the competition of stronger rivals, the industries can develop. When they have gained sufficient strength, the Protection must be withdrawn to admit the healthy influence of competition." Most tropical countries and backward countries in the temperate zone will fall in the first category, growing industrial nations like Germany and the United States in the second, while Great Britain alone has emerged into the independence of the final stage. This elaborated theory is, of course, in substance, nothing more than the "infant industries" argument. No patriotic Protectionist is ever found admitting that the infants of his country can dispense with swaddling clothes.

The second thesis rests upon the supposition that a freedom of exchange which is profitable for individuals and for mankind at large may be injurious for a particular nation; so that it is the business of a State to interfere with processes of exchange. "National economy teaches by what means a certain nation, in her particular situation, may direct and regulate the economy of individuals and restrict the economy of mankind, either to prevent foreign restrictions and foreign power, or to increase the productive powers within herself."

Neither List nor our new Protectionists, who accept this doctrine, appear clearly to distinguish the two bases of their policy. It is one thing to argue that tariffs may be employed to serve the non-economic interests of the nation for purposes of defence, as Adam Smith recognises in his famous sentence, quite another to argue that such measures can increase the national productiveness. If List or our Tariff Reformers argued that true national policy consists in maintaining artificially a variety of industries within the national area, in order to maintain a more various and a more self-sufficing national life, and that for this end it is worth while reducing the aggregate production of wealth, their position would be at least intelligible. But List, like other Protectionists, will not admit this sacrifice, holding that somehow tariff legislation can increase the net productivity of the national resources measured even in terms of marketable goods.

List's career and writings well illustrate the danger of building economic theory and policy upon national or imperial sentiment. For national economy as an inclusive policy his Pan-Germanism served him excellently well; but as an exclusive or protective policy it has prompted a fiscal career the full folly, futility, and cost of which are becoming apparent to all disinterested students of modern Germany.

* "Life of Friedrich List." By M. E. Hirst. Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.

THE HUSSITE MOVEMENT.*

The Reformation of the sixteenth century represented the average rather than the advanced standpoint; it stood for the opinion moyenne of the plain man. This was at once its strength and its weakness. The former, because one step must be taken at a time; we cannot realise to-day the ideas of to-morrow; the latter, because enthusiasts, of whom after all wisdom is justified, sit loose to a movement which loses sight of the ideal in the practical, and in its concentration on the part forgets the whole. A hundred years before Luther, Hus had been the spokesman of a larger Reformation idea—an idea which had taken up into itself the substance of the Waldensian, Franciscan, and Joachimist doctrines, which in Anabaptism was to be a ferment in the Reformed Churches, and which in the shape of Socialism is, not indeed as a system but as a tendency, a force in the Church of to-day.

Protestantism, as its name implies, was a protest—technically against a particular decree of the Diet of Speyer which made the foundation of Lutheran regional churches impossible; in fact, against the abuses of medieval Christianity. Had Rome met the first generation of Protestants half-way, there would have been no schism; the Confession of Augsburg took over the substance of the old theology; its compilers claimed to belong to the "ancient and visible Catholic Church." The earlier reformation movements were further reaching, and demanded not only the removal of abuses but the revision and reconstruction of ecclesiastical institutions and dogma. Their roots went far back. The echo of the Montanist protest against the suppression of charismatic by official religion had never died out; from time to time all down the middle ages, in spite of the vigorous and systematic repression which it encountered, it made itself heard. Immediate access to God through Christ, the universal priesthood of believers, the equality and brotherhood of Christian men, these were its notes. It is easy to see how inevitably they came into conflict with the fixed order which had been built up by the work of generations in Church and State. This is why heresy was esteemed the greatest of crimes; the parallel to the heretic of the middle ages is not the free thinker, but the anarchist of to-day. As such, he was an outlaw; no faith was to be kept with him; he was the enemy of his kind. This is the key to medieval sentiment and legislation on the subject; it was not faith only, or even chiefly, but property, the family, the whole social fabric that was at stake.

The Bohemian movement has been viewed by some as the precursor of the Lutheran reformation, by others as the last of the medieval uprisings in the direction of reform. It was, in fact, a link between the two. Bohemia had originally received Christianity from the East, and had been slow to assimilate or accept Latin usages. Though it had died out before the time of Hus, communion in both kinds was common up to the fourteenth century, and the celibacy of the clergy was enforced later than elsewhere. To these traditions was added the temper of a democracy singularly intolerant of privilege. The idea that the priest, as such, stood on a higher level than the layman was resented.

> "As in many cases the life of the layman was simpler, more moral, more virtuous than that of the priest, this assumption caused great animosity against the clergy. Claims such as that of receiving communion more frequently, and of partaking of the Sacrament in the two kinds—a favor not granted to laymen—were constantly brought forward. These pretensions, indeed, played a very great part in the Bohemian movement for church-reform; for the Bohemians considered them as indicating an ever-increasing endeavor on the part of the priests to raise new barriers between themselves and those who were not in holy orders. Thence sprang the fervent devotion of the Bohemians to the chalice, which has surprised many writers, and has exposed them to the ridicule both of ultramontanes and agnostics ever since the days of Hus. To the Hussites the chalice was an emblem signifying the equality of all true Christians."

As the differentia of Catholic as distinct from non-Catholic Christianity is the official priesthood, it is clear that the difference between the Bohemians and the Church was radical; it might be disguised; it could not be bridged. Of the Emperor and the Divines of Constance there can be but one opinion. "Sigismond s'était conduit comme un lâche," says M. Reinach, "et les Pères du concile comme des scélérats." But the instinct which led them to discern the incompatibility of all that they represented with the Hussite teaching was sound.

The violence of Czech and anti-Czech feeling makes it difficult to fix Hus's position in detail. He was not only a great ecclesiastic, but a great patriot—his countrymen, Catholic as well as Protestant, have taken a favorable, Germans, Protestant as well as Catholic, an unfavorable, view of his career. The merit of Count Lützow's book lies in its use of authorities not easy of access to students of another race; his account of the forerunners of Hus, Conrad Waldhauser, John Milic, Matthew of Janov, the layman Thomas of Stitny, and Jacobellus of Stribro, the father of Utraquism. covers what to the average English reader is new ground. He minimises, perhaps unduly, the connection between Hus and Wycliffe, and the divergence of the whole movement from the received teaching of the Church. Its leaders, it is true, protested their orthodoxy; but the position must be judged as a whole. Nor are positive declarations conclusive: tergiversation is the vice of oppressed minorities; injustice provokes and is met by equivocation and unconscious deceit. That the Hussite movement aimed at more than the restoration of communion in both kinds, that it was fundamentally subversive of civil and religious society as then constituted, can scarcely be questioned. It may be admitted that the transformation of this society at no distant date was inevitable, but its hour was not yet come. Nor was Europe ready for Hus's teaching. "Out of the confused mass of religious, social, national, apocalyptic, Joachimist, chiliast, and in particular Wycliffite and Waldensian tendencies, thoughts, hopes, and dreams, each man," says Harnack, "took what he would." Hence confusion and disorder. "Every shade of opinion was represented, from that of the fierce warriors of the Lord who executed judgment with fire and sword on the Church and the despisers of the law of God to that of the peaceful 'Brethren,' who, though their condemnation of the Church was as radical and their ideas of the reorganisation of society were as utopian, were quiet and bided their time." Nor must his significant warning, "When prophets appear and find hearing, forgery, and falsehood are at hand," be forgotten. Hus stood for the impracticable; with him, or at least with the movement he headed, the better was the enemy of the good. To us his standpoint appeals in many respects more than that of the later Reformers; to Germany for many generations his name was one of fear. When Luther, pressed by Eck at the Disputation of Leipzig, answered, "Dear Doctor, the Hussite opinions are not all wrong," Duke George of Saxony broke out, "The plague, God help us." In view of the bitter and prolonged strife of which the Bohemian movement was the source there was not a little to be said for this point of view.

* "The Life and Times of Master John Hus." By Count Lützow. Dent. 12s. 6d.

SOME EXCURSIONS IN POETRY.*

Poetry, it has been said, should occupy itself with glorifying the temporal beauty, and leave the eternal beauty to religion. But the attempt to limit the scope of poetry is always dangerous; and it must be doubted whether it is ever possible for a poet to fix his eyes on finite things without regarding them as a window to the infinite. Certainly there seems to be some tendency in modern poetry to deal explicitly

* "The Immortal Hour." By Fiona Macleod. Edinburgh: Foulis.
"Undine." By Whitworth Wynne. Kegan Paul. 4s. 6d. net.
"Lyrical and Other Poems." By John Drinkwater. The Samurai Press. 2s. 6d. net.
"Day Dreams of Greece." By Charles Wharton Stork. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.
"The Story of Amaryllis." By Viola Taylor. Sidgwick & Jackson. 3s. 6d. net.
"Shelley: A Dramatic Poem." By Claude Edward Foster. Ouseley. 2s. 6d.
"Towards the Uplands." By Lloyd Mifflin. Frowde. 5s. net. 5s. net.
"Experiences." By Katharine Tynan. A. H. Bullen.

with eternal matters; but, fortunately, poetry has not yet learnt how to deal with them except through temporal symbols and images. Fiona Macleod's last book, "The Immortal Hour" (if, indeed, it be the last), is a poem of great beauty and solemnity, though not perfectly comprehensible. The obscurity is in the substance, not in the matter, and was, no doubt, deliberate; for the intention seems to have been to produce an impression of vast shadowiness, against which impotent mortals and immortals alike act their parts, both conscious that they do not understand the significance of their parts. It is a singular and memorable drama, wherein the gods themselves "travel from one darkness to another," and, like the human kind, are "led by dreams and visions." The sense of profound, continuous, and unapproachable mystery is combined with considerable dramatic interest in a most remarkable manner. We seem to be moving on the precipitous verge of the finite world; as one of the characters says, in an image of daring actuality:—

> "We must be close upon the edge
> Of the green earth, there where the old tales say
> The bramble-bushes and the heather make
> A hollow tangle over the abyss;"

and through all the dark texture of the play is woven the presence of "that ancient dreadful Mother of the Gods, Whom men call Fear." These lines, perhaps, contain in essence the thought stuff of "The Immortal Hour":—

> "For I am son of Shadow, eldest god
> Who dreamed the passionate and terrible dreams
> We have called Fire and Light, Water and Wind,
> Air, Darkness, Death, Change, and Decay, and Birth,
> And all the infinite bitter range that is."

There you have the Celtic outlook on eternity. There are many passages, besides such visionary ones, of pure sensuous beauty, which admirably relieve the drama of too much shadowiness. The metre is, on the whole, good and well varied, but sometimes too loosely put together; there are some lyrics written with a not always successful freedom of rhythm, which, however, have occasionally a delicious movement, as here:—

> "I am a song
> In the Land of the Young,
> A sweet song;
> I am Love.
>
> "I am a bird
> With white wings
> And a breast of flame,
> Singing, singing."

We are not told when William Sharp wrote this exquisite play; but in spirit and in craftsmanship it is a wonderfully fitting conclusion to the works of Fiona Macleod.

We pass from these tremendous purposes and mysterious destinies to more earthly matters in Mr. Whitworth Wynne's four-act tragedy, "Undine," albeit the earthliness is embroidered somewhat heavily with supernatural affairs. The characters, however, are not imported from beyond the world; they are nothing more serious than Water Spirits and their King, together with sundry nymphs and mermen. The change, indeed, is something abrupt; it is like passing out of a moonless night into a magic-lantern show. Mr. Wynne's figures are prettily colored and move with some show of nature on the screen. But the tragedy will not do as poetry; it is far too much in the high poetic vein, and, for all that, far too close to undistinguished prose. Mr. John Drinkwater's "Lyrical and Other Poems" are much better work. It is easy to see that this is a poet who will not scamp the task his mistress has set him, but does it honestly and gravely, to the best of his ability; and that is no mean ability. Mr. Drinkwater finds much to dislike in his time, and has great loathing for "the spreading of the hideous town"; and this is natural, for he is one who perceives (in his own words) "joy's exceeding righteousness." Anyone who writes in the light of that perception is likely to serve the muse well. His "June Dance" is an extremely charming poem, full of delicate imagery; and there is much good in the interlude called "Graven Images." Possibly the best thing in this little volume is the poem on "Fear," in which the words are carried on quite a wind of emotional inspiration; one cannot help thinking of Collins' great ode, of course, but Mr. Drinkwater has his own say on the matter. The book is worth getting. Its author at any rate boldly faces the present, and makes a not unsuccessful attempt to turn both its good and its evil into music. Mr. Charles Wharton Stork, in "Day Dreams of Greece," is less courageous. He begins by addressing Zeus in a tolerable sonnet, the opening words of which are: "Ah, no, thou art not dead." Nevertheless, we fear that Zeus is dead; he died with Swinburne. Mr. Stork can make quite pleasing verse out of Greek mythology, but he has not enough poetry in him to make it alive. Indeed, we suspect that poetry is tired of such work; she favors now men like Mr. Drinkwater, who do not insist on her wearing antique garments. Mr. Stork, in his poems on Ganymede and Psyche, written in smooth blank verse, proves that his heart is set towards beauty; but he fails to deal adequately with such a profound human emotion as is required for "The Sculptor of Melos," which would have in any case a dangerous rival in "Porphyria's Lover."

There is much dainty and skilful writing in Miss Viola Taylor's "Story of Amaryllis." The best things in the book are the Ronsardesques about Amaryllis. Ronsard is a good poet to take as a model, and Miss Taylor makes exquisite use of him sometimes. In the main, her poetry is of the kind called light; it is certainly of the kind that makes the reader feel pleased, so deft is its workmanship both in metre and word-craft. Captain Claude Edward Foster is a serious person, however, and, as is too often the case with such persons, inclined to trust too much to seriousness and too little to labor. His dramatic poem, "Shelley," is a queer, rather confused production; the contrast between Shelley's own golden speech and the words Captain Foster puts into his mouth is extremely painful. There is some merit of earnestness and thought in the poem, but the poetry itself is slack, limping, and amateurish.

We have not read any of Mr. Lloyd Mifflin's previous books, but, judging from "Toward the Uplands," his is evidently a practised hand. It would appear that Mr. Mifflin is an American, probably of Boston; the stamp of Boston—culture and good taste—is on these poems. There is much to be said for culture and good taste, even when they call, as they do in this book, the Metropolitan Museum of Art an "immurmurous hall" and a "rich retreat." But a dozen pages or so of Mr. Mifflin's sonnetteering set one yearning for some flagrant solecism or fierce vulgarity; it is all too much of a Metropolitan Museum of Art. We have already been reminded of one of Collins' odes by Mr. Drinkwater; Mr. Mifflin has a still closer parallel to another of that fine poet's works. This is a little curious, as Collins, we had thought, is almost forgotten nowadays. Mr. Mifflin has a pleasant ode, "To the Spirit of Twilight," and, somewhat rashly, he has chosen for his medium the same unrhymed stanza that Collins invented for the "Ode to Evening," one of the most exquisite poems in the language. Comparison is unavoidable, and, needless to say, Mr. Mifflin does not come off very well. The museum-like stony atmosphere of his poems becomes in recollection more stony and more museum-like when we open Katharine Tynan's "Experiences," a book full of sweet, earthy, heart-felt lyrics. Here one can breathe deep, knowing well that the odors one will inhale are honey and flowers. We cannot describe Katharine Tynan's poetry better than by quoting two of her own verses:—

> "By the white clover we shall go,
> The very way the wild bee went;
> By honeysuckles all a-blow,
> Their horns of plenty spilling scent;
>
> "And by wild roses pink and pale,
> Campion and scabious and new hay:
> This is the way the nightingale
> Went some delicious night of May."

Yes, Katharine Tynan goes the way of the bee and the nightingale; Herrick and Keats have been in these English field-paths of hers. Her lyrical impulse is unquestionable; and the impulse is embodied in delicate fantasy, in metre that is not imposed on the matter from without, but is the true rhythmic expression of the matter, and in the preciousest of all a poet's gifts, a sense of the concealed meanings of words. We cannot, of course, say this of all the songs in "Experiences"; but the medieval naïvety of "The Servants," the beautiful and memorable conceit of "The Garden," a poem that Cowley would have delighted in, and the faith-made-music of "Planting Bulbs"—we should destine these for the anthologies.

A FACTORY OF SHODDY.*

THE appearance of "Little Devil Doubt" is a good sign. Two recent plays, "The Earth" and "What the Public Wants," have presented and analysed the character of big newspaper proprietors who, in pursuit of money and power, pander to the public's taste for shoddy. The deluge, of course, still rolls triumphantly on its course, but Mr. Onion's novel is a fresh indication that the high water mark has been reached, and that, inch by inch, the muddy volume may go down. Public protest is now taking the shape of a critical exposure. Mr. Onions takes a wider survey of the phenomenon than Mr. Fagan or Mr. Bennett, and deals in a cool and amusing fashion with the social origin and mental outlook of the departmental staff of "The Billion," "Chiykes," "Sunny Sundays," "Love in Idleness," "The Non-Such Novels," &c., the popular periodicals by which the firm of Battye & Battye minister to the masses.

The hero, Georgie, is introduced to us as a lad of twelve, one of the hundred odd employees who "work without enthusiasm" at Mason's, a lithographic, general printers, and bookbinders in the factory town of Burlborough. Of Burlborough, a Lancashire town, we are told that "of the wedding of Trade and Technical Education had come a progeny of profits that had made Burlborough prodigiously rich." The story opens in the late 'eighties, when the leading citizens of Burlborough, such as Samuel Huddlestone, the altruistic President of several Debating Societies, a visitor of the School Board, a reader of papers to Young Men's Associations, and unpaid official of half-a-dozen Reading Circles and "Lend-a-Hand Societies," have organised popular lectures, reading unions, libraries, and a scholarship system, not without a suspicion of "a sidelong eye on the material successes of the Technical Educationalists." When Georgie leaves the Higher Grade School, his schoolmaster presents him with a little book—"Fortunate Men and How They Made Their Money," the pith of which is contained in Mr. Huddlestone's advice to the lad: "Begin at the bottom of the ladder, always work hard, and always remember that there is plenty of room at the top." And Georgie, who has a real talent for drawing and is always sketching the workpeople and the workshops at Mason's, lightens the mechanical drudgery of his days by attending the evening class of the Burlborough Art School. The workgirls at Mason's with their day-dreams modelled on the romantic department of their favorite characters in "Bailey Bells" novelettes, are cleverly hit off. A leading figure is the handsome brunette, Miss Kate Crowther, who finds time during her duties of gluing and pasting together card-board boxes, to attract to her side many masculine admirers, such as the facetious foreman, Mr. Tyers. The sketch of the factory hands' outlook, though it does not show deep intimacy, is true in its democratic tone, and one realises that the life at Mason's, which is typical of tens of thousands of factories and workshops in the big English towns, is breeding the anæmic, shallow, and cheap types of our population for which Messrs. Battye and "The Billion" cater. The disease, indeed, bred in the national bone, will out in the Press, and the merit of "Little Devil Doubt" is that the author shows us that the gospel of Messrs. Battye is only a logical extension of the commercial spirit of Burlborough. Georgie wins a National Scholarship of sixty pounds a year, and a paternal Government undertakes his training at South Kensington to fit him for the career of artist, a trade with no openings, though with an abundance of waste products. Georgie comes in contact with many types of art students, and black-and-white artists, modellers, sculptors, all, even to his inexperienced eye, seem to be working without that inner enthusiasm and belief in their future which is vital to good work. Commercialism and the competitive system between them discount the artist and destroy the basis of his power, his true function in the community. Instead of teaching the public, he has to adapt himself, like any tradesman, to its vulgar ideals, and he soon goes the way of Old Joyce, the shelved wood engraver. But Georgie, in his sublime ignorance, feeds himself on hope. "In London, of course," he argues, "there were some thousands of men—editors, readers, publishers, critics, advisers, whose sole function it was to seek out merit wherever it might be hidden, and bring it to light. What other reason for being had the vast fabric of Scholarships, Committees, Boards, Lords of the Council, Professors, Inspectors, Governors?" And the irony of Georgie's situation is that at the end of his art training at Bentwick Bridge he finds that there is only one plank between him and the degradation of drawing the noblemen and heroines of the serials in the "Non-Such" novels, and the other periodicals of Messrs. Battye, and this plank, the celebrated "Buchan's Magazine," is on the point of being extinguished by the competition of "The Billion's" proprietors. Mr. Pardoe, the editor and proprietor of "Buchan's," put the case in a nutshell when, in engaging Georgie as a draughtsman, he explains the inner significance of "The Billion's" success.

> "To-day the half-taught are despots. True knowledge is humble, and so is the ignorance of a child; but the half-taught are tyrants. They are unteachable, for nobody can consent to be taught until he knows he is ignorant. The last thing they dream of is that they are ignorant. . . . It is the only true provincialism—the ignorance that anything better than itself exists—the spirit of the village pump. Has it ever struck you that, in the sense I indicate, London is the most provincial place in England? When you have been longer in London you will find that it thinks of nothing but itself. It has its clever men; at the same time it is the home of the half-taught, and is therefore provincial. . . . You are one of us. I have fought my fight; it is almost over, and I am not defeated yet. Nobody who has ever written or drawn for 'Buchan's' will ever be asked: 'Was that in the palmy days, or at the end?' The end will be as the rest has been; that has been my fight. But I, my boy, belong to a class that is no longer effective to-day. Many of us retire from public life altogether rather than be put, cheek-by-jowl, with the class that is now dominant. I personally do not do that, but I recognise that our day is over."

Mr. Pardoe is right. "Buchan's" goes under, and after a short, sharp struggle with the indifference of Fleet Street, Georgie is forced to enter the service of the all-powerful Battye & Battye. The office life of the pushful young spirits who edit "The Billion," "Chiykes," "Sunny Sundays," "Love in Idleness," and other preposterous publications, is very cleverly drawn. The tone and spirit that prevail in these editorial sanctums, as in the "art department," nick-named the Dam, in which Georgie works, are practically on a par with the tone and spirit that prevailed in the Burlborough factory. The mental outlook is inconceivably cheap and petty, and wholly commercial. Nothing in the shape of art or literature that is true, beautiful, or original, has the slightest chance of winning favor at Battye's. The enterprising son of the real proprietor, Jack Huddlestone, engages only pushing young men, who "develop quickly," and strike out ingenious auxiliary schemes for booming the periodicals. Thus with the "Nonsuch Novels" goes the "Nonsuch Bassinette," and the "Nonsuch Free Week at Westcliffe." Readers of "Chiykes" are pledged to exchange the "Billion" grip, and this involves the purchase of the "Billion" Electric Dumb Bell. The satire is by no means overdone by Mr. Onions. It is difficult, indeed, to invent a parallel to the meretricious tricks which have floated "Sunny Sundays" and their like into vast circulations. One of the neatest effects in the novel is sprung upon us when we discover that the omnipotent Miss Carruthers, the imposingly handsome lady who is the right hand of the Editor in Chief, and manages the Society columns in the Battye publications, is none other than the irrepressible Miss Kate Crowther, late of Mason's! The chapter on "Social Reform," wherein we see the "Billion" proprietors booming a new Darkest England movement, buying a slum outright, and building "Homes for the Humble," "Cosy Corner Crèches," and "Nonsuch Nests," in order to show the Socialists and the Labor men that they have not got a monopoly of reform, is also excellent in its irony, and at this stage of Messrs. Battye's career, when prosperity is developing in them a sense of their duty to the nation at large, we may leave the novel. The proprietor of "The Billion," Sir Samuel, is, of course, raised to the peerage.

* "Little Devil Doubt." By Oliver Onions. Murray. 6s.

DUCKWORTH'S BOOK NEWS

ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH

Mr. PRICE COLLIER'S candid criticisms and appreciations are actuated by friendliness and are in no way hostile. The attention which his papers received when appearing serially has caused them to be eagerly looked for in book form. Their moderation and sincerity must make them widely popular. The reviews are in every case lengthy, and emphasise the importance and general interest of the writer's opinions.

"Mr. Collier's book on English life is more thoughtful and better expressed than anything on similar lines that we have read."
—SPECTATOR.

"It is over half a century since Emerson published his 'English Traits,' but since then we have not had such a volume of criticism and compliment as this."—Daily Telegraph.

H. W. NEVINSON'S NEW BOOK.

ESSAYS IN FREEDOM

"The author is one of our best prose writers with a magnificent nervous force and reserve, a true and natural stylist. In each one of these thumbnail impressions the man is reflected. That, in itself, is a great charm. It is life, not fictitious romance, which attracts Mr. Nevinson. He has travelled much; witnessed many things, seen men and life in a thousand different aspects. What he says is not fiction... ..Brilliant, scholarly impressions..... Clothed in a true literary mind, it must appeal—at once through heart and brain—to all who like the good English word written by a man who is, in soul and blood, a true Elizabethan."
—Observer.

"A book which places its author in the front rank of fiction writers."—GLOBE.

Mrs. R. S. GARNETT'S

THE INFAMOUS JOHN FRIEND

"A story of really remarkable excellence."—Daily Telegraph.
"There is passion in this story and humour. A romance of most uncommon sincerity."—Sketch.
"This history of the career of John Friend, a spy in the pay of Napoleon, is a powerful one. Finely pictured. Strong and written with conspicuous ability."—Academy.
"Its descriptions of Brighton society when Mrs. Fitzherbert asserted her influence are in the nature of vivid reminiscences. So far the year has given us no novel more soundly brilliant."
—Dundee Advertiser.
"The author deserves hearty congratulation. The book can hardly fail to make its mark. The story is of the time of Pitt and Nelson and of the dreaded Napoleonic invasion. The social atmosphere is very happily indicated. . . . There seems something almost miraculous in this achievement of Mrs. Garnett's."
—Manchester Guardian.
"A clever, ingenious, and convincing study of two curious persons; of a strong man noble in impulse and destitute of general controlling principles, and a woman bound to a man who had touched her at a thousand points in the long alliance of marriage."
—Daily News.

THE BOOK EVERY ONE IS READING.

ELIZABETH VISITS AMERICA

Mrs. Elinor Glyn's new book has all the sparkle and vivacity of her early work. Elizabeth is older, but is not a whit more decorous, and her tantalising personality is as effective as ever.
Her impressions of Americans are original, and set down fearlessly and without conventional expression.
With Pen-and-Ink Sketches by the Author and a Photogravure Frontispiece.

THE BEST NEW ESSAYS.

FAITH ... ... ... R. B. Cunninghame Graham. 6s.
ESSAYS IN FREEDOM ... ... ... H. W. Nevinson. 6s. net.
ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH ... Price Collier. 7s. 6d. net.

THE BEST NEW NOVELS.

ELIZABETH VISITS AMERICA ... ... ... Elinor Glyn. 6s.
(Second Impression.)
THE INFAMOUS JOHN FRIEND ... Mrs. R. S. Garnett. 6s.
(Second Impression.)
THE HEART OF A GIPSY ... ... Rosamond Napier. 6s.
(Second Impression.)

DUCKWORTH & Co., Covent Garden, London.

Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS.

Miss KAYE-SMITH'S New Sussex Story.

Cloth, 6s.

STARBRACE.

By SHEILA KAYE-SMITH.

"A novel which ranks among the best books of the season, and assures for the author a place among the few novelists who can make the dead past live."—Westminster Gazette.

"A very strong and arresting study in human cross-strains .....in every way worthy of the author of 'The Tramping Methodist.'"—Glasgow Herald.

"One of the most vivid and imaginative stories which we have come across for many months."—Country Life.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.—Cloth, 6s.

THE TRAMPING METHODIST.

"A story of the early Methodist days in Southern England, written with admirable vigour and insight. . . . The delineation of religious fervour and human passions is done with real skill, and there is an engrossing love story at the heart of it all. . . A story of exceptional merit."—British Weekly.

JUST PUBLISHED.—F'cap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON'S LURE.

An Anthology of Prose and Verse Passages bearing on London. By HELEN and LEWIS MELVILLE. With Title-page, Binding, and End-papers designed by M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

"Altogether this is a delightful book; in its pages you see London with the eyes of those who have felt its enduring fascination, and have sought to give expression to its inexhaustible variety."—Daily Telegraph.

NOW READY.—Imperial 8vo, 15s. net.

MODERN HOMES.

Selected Examples of Dwelling Houses. Described and Illustrated by T. RAFFLES DAVISON, Hon. A.R.I.B.A. With a Foreword by Sir ASTON WEBB, R.A., and nearly 300 Illustrations, chiefly from Pen-Drawings by the Author.

VOL. I. NOW READY.—8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE HANOVERIAN QUEENS OF ENGLAND.

By ALICE GREENWOOD. With 2 Photogravure Plates and a Map.

This work is a continuation of Strickland's "Queens," which ends with Queen Anne. The first volume deals with Sophia Dorothea (wife of George I.) and Caroline of Ansbach (Queen of George II.). The second volume, which treats of Charlotte (Queen of George III.), Caroline of Brunswick (Queen of George IV.), and Adelaide (Queen of William IV.), is in active preparation.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE.

Newly Translated, with Introduction and Notes, by E. E. C. GOMME, B.A.

An entirely new and literal translation, chiefly from the Parker MS., but extracts have been made from the other MSS., wherever the difference of phraseology or fact justified their insertion. A very elaborate index is a special feature of this edition.

BELL'S CATHEDRAL SERIES.

Crown 8vo, profusely illustrated, 1s. 6d. net each.

"The series bids fair to become an indispensable companion to the Cathedral tourist in England."—Times.

Volumes on London Cathedrals and Churches.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. By the Rev. ARTHUR DIMOCK, M.A.
ST. SAVIOUR'S, SOUTHWARK. By GEORGE WORLEY.
WESTMINSTER ABBEY. By CHARLES HIATT.
THE TEMPLE CHURCH. By GEORGE WORLEY.
ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S CHURCH, SMITHFIELD. By GEORGE WORLEY.
A Full List of the Series will be sent on application.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
YORK HOUSE, PORTUGAL STREET, W.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Dr. Paget Toynbee's bulky work, "Dante in English Literature from Chaucer to Cary" (Methuen, 2 vols., 21s. net), is rather an ordered collection of documents pour servir than an attempt to set in proper perspective the history of Dante's influence in England. Dr. Toynbee's plan has been to reprint in chronological order the references to Dante in writers great and small during the period he has chosen. The labor and research required by this method may be judged from the fact that the authors represented number between five and six hundred and that considerably over a thousand separate works are quoted. After each author's name there follows a short biographical note giving the main facts of his life and a list of his works. A critical survey of the whole period is furnished in the introduction, which we may note, is a reprint in slightly extended form of an article contributed by Dr. Toynbee to the "Edinburgh Review." There can be nothing but praise for the thoroughness with which Dr. Toynbee has performed his task, though one cannot but feel that he has put himself to much unnecessary labor. What, for instance, from the point of view of Dante scholarship, is the value of recording that Thomas Hood, jesting upon the "Inferno," suggested the following titles for the library door at Chatsworth: "On the Lung Arno in Consumption, By D. Cline," and "Dante's Inferno; or Description of Van Demon's Land"? Or why bother about an anonymous contributor to the "Retrospective Review" for 1820 who, writing on Sidney's "Arcadia," tells us that "His (Sidney's) province was not to pourtray the dark and horrible in nature, or the dark and horrible in man. His was not the gloomy coloring of Dante or Salvator Rosa"? And we are compelled to say that many of the extracts are of no greater value or significance than those we have quoted. Dr. Toynbee could urge in reply that he has been particularly anxious to show the degree in which Dante's influence had permeated popular thought. But we are confident that this aim would be better reached if he had left out a large portion of the extracts and made his introductory essay much longer. As it is, he has recorded everything of the slightest importance that Englishmen have had to say about Dante during the period he has covered. The fact that a scholar of Dr. Toynbee's standing has thought this worth doing is in itself no small tribute to Dante's influence.

* * *

M. Joseph Turquan's compilation which, under the title of "The Love Affairs of Napoleon" (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. J. Lewis May has translated for English readers, is an unedifying chronicle of scandals that might well have been allowed to rest in oblivion. There is evidently a public for this type of book, though we are convinced that the impression left upon the minds of most readers will be one of mixed boredom and disgust. The volume will certainly do nothing to raise our opinion of Napoleon. M. Turquan lays stress upon Josephine's infidelity and its effect upon Napoleon's attitude toward women, but when all is said, his prevailing coarseness and brutality stand out unpleasantly from his working life. A long list is paraded of women who, sometimes on very slight evidence, are supposed to have been Napoleon's mistresses. M. Turquan has searched the memoirs of the time in the endeavor to give color to his narrative, but with little success. There is hardly a gleam of romance in the whole series of sordid episodes which not even the glamor that surrounds Napoleon's career is able to redeem from tedium. There is nothing of any value in the book which was not already known, and we can discover no adequate ground for its existence, and still less for its translation into English.

* * *

Another translation from the French, "The Exile of St. Helena: The Last Phase in Fact and Fiction" (Heinemann, 10s. net), by M. Philippe Gonnard, is very different both in scope and value from M. Turquan's volume. M. Gonnard's purpose has been to determine Napoleon's share in the formation of the "Napoleonic legend," and he means by the phrase, not the facts of Napoleon's career, but its principles and motives. The conception of Bonapartism created in part by Thiers, Béranger, and Victor Hugo, and, in part, by Napoleon's own utterances at St. Helena, has had an enormous influence upon French politics, but whether it represented the Emperor's real purpose and intentions is more than doubtful. As Queen Hortense said, "He arranged his life, his defence, and his glory with the infinite care of a dramatic author, who takes great pains with his fifth act and attends to all the details for the sake of the final apotheosis." The determination to do this when practical action was denied him is characteristic of Napoleon's devouring energy and far-reaching ambition. His success was as great as he could have desired. "There is probably not one of Napoleon's declarations, when at St. Helena," says M. Gonnard, "which has not proved useful in its time and which has not served as a pretext for some political party to consider itself as upholding the principles of Napoleon." Liberals, Catholics, bourgeoisie, and militarists have all believed that they were but carrying out these principles. He understood the French mind, and, above all, the mind of the Revolution, its patriotism, its thirst for glory, and its high ideals of domestic reform. "The conclusion to which one comes," says M. Gonnard, at the close of his fresh and inspiring study, "is that the man of St. Helena equalled the man of Austerlitz. He realised there the political mistakes he had made and, so far as it was in his power, he endeavored to make up for them. The lesson he had learned from certain events was not lost upon him, and he endeavored to transform the enemies who had overthrown him into the champions of his son."

* * *

Many English students of Velasquez will remember the brilliant work on that master by the Spanish critic, Aureliano de Beruete, a translation of which, by Mr. Hugh Poynter, was published in 1906. "The School of Madrid" (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net) is a commentary on and a continuation of that work, and is translated by Mrs. Steuart Erskine from the original MSS. of its author, Señor A. de Beruete y Moret, who is the above-named writer's son. The school in question owed its efflorescence largely to the patronage of Philip IV., before whose time it can hardly be said to have existed, though we are reminded in these pages that there were Spanish primitives who were not mere imitators of their Italian, Flemish, and German contemporaries, as is very commonly supposed; and that in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the two great provinces of Aragon and Castile furnished artists who, profoundly influenced as they were by the art of their neighbors—the first by Italian and the second by Flemish and German—were instrumental in preparing the way for the seventeenth-century Madrid painters who followed them. The most conspicuous figure among these painters, Velasquez himself, is very briefly dealt with here, and what is said by the writer is mainly a summary of his father's conclusions. Mazo, however, Velasquez's son-in-law and disciple, receives considerable attention, and we are inclined to think that the chapters bearing on his art form the most important section of the book. This artist copied Velasquez's technique with so much success that until quite recently several of his pictures were attributed to the greater artist. The elder de Beruete, it will be remembered, considered the National Gallery Admiral Pulido Pareja to be by Mazo, notwithstanding Palomino's circumstantial legend as to the history of the picture, and drastically revised the remaining list of Velasquez's authentic works. The present writer carries the process of apportionment to Mazo further, and, in vindication of Mazo's capacity for being original, brings out his undoubted talent as a landscape painter. His account of the rest of the Madrid School resolves itself into a dictionary of artists, only a very few of whom are dealt with at any length. Pereda, who found his forte in portraiture; the brothers Rizi; Carreno, who, in defending the dignity of art, performed a not invaluable service for a school that was essentially a school of court painters, who was himself a fine portraitist after Velasquez's death, and who helped much to develop fresco painting in Spain; Antolinez; and Claudio Coello, the last of those who fought for the Spanish art tradition before it was overwhelmed by the pernicious influence of the Italian, Luca Giordano. These are the principal names. The book, which contains reproductions of several pictures not known in this country, increases the interest of a school which too many people believe to have begun and ended with Velasquez; and the

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

VOL. IV. CONCLUDING THE WORK. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Cambridge Natural History. Fully Illustrated. In Ten Volumes. 8vo. Price 17s. net each.

Volume IV.—Crustacea. By GEOFFREY SMITH, M.A., and the late W. F. R. WELDON, M.A. Trilobites. By HENRY WOODS, M.A. Introduction to Arachnida and King-Crabs. By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.R.S. Eurypterida. By HENRY WOODS, M.A. Scorpions, Spiders, Mites, Ticks etc. By CECIL WARBURTON, M.A. Tardigrada (Water-Bears). By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A. F.R.S. Pentastomida. By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.R.S. Pycnogonida. By D'ARCY W. THOMPSON, C.B., M.A.

 Complete Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, post free on application.

1909 ISSUE NOW READY.

The Statesman's Year Book. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World for the year 1909. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Oxford Lectures on Poetry. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Litt.D., formerly Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. 8vo, 10s. net.

FIRST AND SECOND SERIES. Complete in 1 vol.

The Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language. Selected and arranged by F. T. PALGRAVE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Greek Architecture. By ALLAN MARQUAND, Ph.D., L.H.D., Professor of Art and Archæology in Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. net. [Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities.

Australian Socialism. An Historical Sketch of its Origin and Developments. By A. ST. LEDGER, Senator for the State of Queensland in the Commonwealth Parliament. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Tuesday

Notes from a Knapsack. By GEORGE WHERRY, M.A., M.C.(Cantab.), F.R.C.S., Member of the Alpine Club. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Buy The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because
- it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
- of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
- of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
- of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
- it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
- it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free. Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

By GEOFFREY DRAGE, Author of "Russian Affairs." With Maps, medium 8vo, 21s. net.

This work, which corresponds to Mr. Drage's book on Russia, is the first attempt made by any writer to describe the economic condition of the whole of the dual monarchy at the present day. The work is divided into three parts, and deals with Austrian Agriculture, Industry, Commerce and Finance, with Hungarian Agriculture, Industry, Commerce and Finance, including a chapter on Croatia, Slavonia, and, lastly, with the common affairs of the monarchy. It is a very complete book on an urgently important subject.

RASPLATA (The Reckoning).

By Commander VLADIMIR SEMENOFF, Imperial Russian Navy. His Diary during the Blockade of Port Arthur and the Voyage of Admiral Rojdestvensky's Fleet. With Maps, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

NELSON AND OTHER NAVAL STUDIES.

By JAMES R. THURSFIELD, Joint Author of "The Navy and the Nation." With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

Contents.—The Anniversary of Trafalgar. Trafalgar and the Nelson Touch. The Life of Nelson. The Secret of Nelson. Duncan. Paul Jones. The Dogger Bank and its Lessons. The Higher Policy of Defence. The Strategy of Position. The Attack and Defence of Commerce.

The Life of MAJOR GENERAL SIR CHARLES W. WILSON, Royal Engineers.

By Col. Sir CHARLES M. WATSON, K.C.M.G., C.B., late Royal Engineers. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

KUROPATKIN'S REVELATIONS.

Suppressed by the Russian Government, entitled THE RUSSIAN ARMY AND THE JAPANESE WAR. Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 28s. net.

LUCRETIUS: Epicurean and Poet.

Completing Volume. By JOHN MASSON, LL.D. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

This is the supplementary volume promised by Dr. Masson last year. It deals with such subjects as the Borgian life of Lucretius, the relation of Lucretius's atom to the Daltonian atom and to the electron, the origin of Leucippus's atomic theory from earlier speculations, the central Epicurean doctrine of atomic declination, criticising the presentment of it by Guyau and Giussani, the evolution of the Epicurean conception of pleasure from that of the Cyrenaic school; also with the revival of Epicureanism by Gassendi, and other questions.

GIUSEPPE BARETTI.

With an Account of his Literary Friendships and Feuds in Italy and in England in the Days of Dr. Johnson. By LACY COLLINSON-MORLEY. With an Introduction by the late F. MARION CRAWFORD. With Photogravure Portrait. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION.

A ROMANCE OF THE NURSERY.

By Mrs. L. ALLEN HARKER, Author of "Miss Esperance and Mr. Wycherly," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

JAPANESE EDUCATION.

By Baron DAIROKU KIKUCHI. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle-street, W.

writing loses nothing by being free from the dogmatism that is the bane of so much Continental criticism.

* * *

Mr. David Grayson's "Adventures in Contentment" (Melrose, 5s. net) might be described as an essay on some intellectual excitements of the Simple Life. The author is an American who, after a youth spent in the turmoil of a great city, took to farming as a means of livelihood, and found therein not merely the increase of bodily vigor, but the stimulus to mental activity that had before been wanting. Briefly, the argument of the book is the old and general one—that man is not as much the slave of circumstances as he thinks, and the more particular one that the occupation of a farmer specially induces the development of one's intellectual self between the periods of hard manual labor—that tilling the fields is often responsible for crops of the mind. A few character studies of his neighbors, including a farmer, a professor of botany, a book agent, a Scotch preacher, a millionaire, and a country doctor, are woven into Mr. Grayson's philosophic thread; and these are hardly enough to warm the reader's heart towards the more abstract discursions and speculations contained herein. There is, too, a touch of genius in the tale of the tramp who had grown afraid of life, because a too poignant imagination compelled him to live through events before they happened, with the result that they found him insensitive when they did. On analysis such a being becomes quite humanly possible. The style, while perhaps a trifle mannered, is not devoid of charm, and certain literary enthusiasms expressed in the chapter "An Evening at Home" possess the virtues of good taste and simple sincerity. It is not meant to be a book for the materialistic farmer; but its good commonsense, its fair measure of wit, and its spontaneous appreciation of what is really fine in man and the universe, should commend it to those followers of the plough who have a thought beyond the clods at their feet, and a vision beyond the end of their furrow, and to a very much larger class besides.

* * *

Dr. Dykes, until recently the Principal of Westminster College, Cambridge, is to be congratulated on the publication of his volume, "The Christian Minister and His Duties" (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark, price 6s.). It is the ripe product of a ministry of more than fifty years, and the wise counsels scattered up and down its pages are evidently the fruits of Dr. Dykes's own experience in the ministerial office. The book opens with several chapters on the personal character of the modern minister and the attitude which he ought to adopt in all the varied and complicated relationships of modern life. What attitude ought he, for example, to adopt towards political parties? Ought he to keep entirely aloof from party conflict on the public platform, or ought he to take his share in guiding political opinion like any other citizen? On this difficult point Dr. Dykes arrives at the conclusion that there is room for both classes of ministers. But on the whole he inclines to the belief that it is wiser to be content with laying down the principles on which all political action should be based than to enter into the actual turmoil of party strife. At the same time he insists that the clergy should make themselves acquainted with the social conditions of the population and should study the methods which have been advocated for remedying the adverse social circumstances of so many of the people. As he truly points out, the Christian faith is a religion for this world and for daily life, and must take account of the social circumstances of the age. The Christian teacher has to meet an intellectual, as well as a social, problem. He has to preach Christian truth and yet he has to preach it in a way which will not bring him into conflict with the assured results of scientific knowledge and historical inquiry. This is the most difficult of all the tasks which confront the modern preacher. The defect of most modern sermons is that they are based upon too many unverified assumptions. The mind of the listener is alienated almost as soon as the preacher has opened his mouth. Dr. Dykes's book would have gained in value if he had dealt more fully with the intellectual difficulties before the modern preacher, and the way in which these difficulties must be overcome.

The Week in the City.

The check to speculation has immediately been reflected in the money market, where rates have grown distinctly easier. Unfortunately there does not seem to be much evidence of an industrial revival, at least so far as one can judge from the money market, and except for the prospect of an autumn demand there is nothing at present to support either money or discount rates. The foreign demand for gold is apparently passing off, and the Bank is finding very little competition for the incoming metal, while the country is still returning specie to London, and the stock of coin in the Bank has increased by over 1½ millions in one week. What is likely to happen on the Stock Exchange is much debated, and travelling round the City one gathers very different opinions. One experienced dealer tells me that he sees no reason why Kaffirs should stay at their present height, and another assures me that the big houses are certain to keep things going for some time. His argument is that these houses undoubtedly mean to use the boom for bringing about new amalgamations, new issues, &c., and that they are very unlikely to let it fizzle away before they have fulfilled their purpose. It seems quite clear that they have been selling freely in the past month, and it probably would not need much support to give the market another upward turn. For the moment, however, public interest has subsided, and unless some insider starts a fresh movement, prices are not likely to go higher. With the fall in mines, some other markets have been coming by their own and with that inconsistency which is a never-ending wonder to the critic, financial people are beginning to talk quite cheerfully about home rails. Profits made in the recent speculation are being turned into the home railway market, and the next reports due in July and August are expected to be quite good. But we must not look for the full results of the economies until the end of the year. The new issues are still pouring out, and in spite of the perpetual intrigue that surrounds these Oriental contracts, the Chinese railway loan was an instantaneous success.

The American Market.

Americans have been flat this week, and steels have fallen from the record figures that caused so much surprise a fortnight ago. When a market is in the condition that Yankees are in at present one is tempted to hail every small decline as the beginning of an inevitable slump; but Wall Street can do almost anything it likes with prices, and, given cheap money, we need not be surprised if the market soon begins to move upwards again. The points on which speculation have turned this week are the listing of Steel Trust stocks in Paris and President Taft's message to Congress. On the first point, statement and contradiction have followed one another hour by hour, and people have been equally emphatic in asserting and denying that the Steel magnates have agreed to the stamp money required by the Government, while others are quite as certain that the stamp money has nothing to do with the case. However that may be, the uncertainty has been too much for steels, and the ordinary stock has fallen quite sharply. The second point is more important, for if Mr. Taft can really carry his scheme of a two per cent. tax on corporation incomes, he will have worked a revolution in American finance and possibly have turned the flank of the "stand-patter" protectionists. If an income-tax is imposed, the revenue case for the tariff goes, but when we remember the course of American tariff reform during the last twelve months, it is difficult to believe in the possibility of any form of income-tax. But it is most significant to find a Republican leader once more dressing himself in Democratic clothes. Governor Hughes' Committee has presented a very moderate report on the reform of the Stock Exchange, and Wall Street, whether it likes the proposed changes or not, will probably be wise to agree with its adversary while it is in the way with him.

BENGER'S

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

THE LEGAL Insurance Company, LTD.

Capital, £1,000,000. Subscribed Capital, £500,000.

Trustees: The Hon. Mr. Justice Channell, The Hon. Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, The Hon. Alfred E. Gathorne-Hardy.

Chairman - J. FIELD BEALE, Solicitor.

Head Office: 231-232, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

FIRE: The Perfect System of Fire Insurance—Special Profit-Sharing Policy.

ACCIDENT: All Branches of Accident Insurance and General Contingency.

PROFITS: Loss of Net Profit and Standing Charges due to the interruption of Business by Fire or Boiler Explosion.

Write for particulars. HENRY M. LOW, General Manager

BOOKSELLERS.

6/- FOR 2/- POST FREE

2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF THE

TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK:

Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes, and a Commentary upon the Psalter, By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo, Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges. 6s. for 2s.; 6 for 10s. 9d.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£17 17s. NORWEGIAN and NORTH CAPE CRUISE.
£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—June 26, July 17, July 31.
£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, STOCKHOLM, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, etc., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary.
5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W. | 84, Piccadilly, W.
82, Strand, W.C. | 25, Cannon Street, E.C.

HIGHEST QUALITY

TURKISH TOWELS

AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE CITY OF LONDON COLLEGE, White Street, Moorfields.

The Governing Body require for the Day School TWO TEACHERS (men or women), one to teach FRENCH AND GERMAN, the other ENGLISH and MODERN HISTORY. Preference will be given to Candidates possessing a University Degree or its equivalent.

The language-teacher must possess a proper knowledge of the spoken and written languages and of modern methods of teaching them. Candidates must be prepared to give their whole time to the work of the School.

Commencing salary, £150 a year. Applications must reach the undersigned on or before Thursday, July 1st, 1909.

DAVID SAVAGE,
Secretary.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The NEXT EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on JULY 8th, and the two following days. Applications should be made at once to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE. BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE, STAFFORDSHIRE.

Charmingly situated on the borders of Shropshire.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY. SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

ST. HELENS, CLIFTON, GLOS.

SCHOOL for a limited number of Girls of good social position. Thorough education on modern lines. Healthy outdoor life, with due attention to Games and Physical Exercise. Principals: Miss WINGATE, M.A. Dublin (Math. Trip. Cambs.), and Miss POTTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

HOTEL CAFE CONTINENTAL, 207, Lord St., French and English Confectioners, Dinners, Teas and Suppers. Parties catered for

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational
13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.
52 , ... ... 6d. ,,

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

Novels of Distinction.

PRISCILLA AND CHARYBDIS. By F. FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."

"This most entertaining social comedy."—Times.
"For good, festive, but not facetious novels, it would be hard to beat him."—Observer.
"A remarkably original and pleasant novel."—Yorkshire Post.
"An exceedingly bright, clever, and readable book."—British Weekly.

THE PERJURER. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Square Peg."

"There is not a dull page in the book."—Country Life.
"An interesting story."—Athenæum.
"Moves well from start to finish."—Academy.

THE ACTRESS. By LOUISE CLOSSER HALE.

A novel of stage life, set for the most part in London, and written by the actress herself.

THE KING IN YELLOW. By R W. CHAMBERS, Author of "Cardigan," &c.

An illustrated edition of this Author's earliest and most characteristic work.

DRAGON'S BLOOD. By H. M. RIDEOUT.
A thrilling story of adventure in China. [Shortly.

General Literature.

Dedicated by gracious permission to HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

THE STORY OF THE HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY, 1661—1902. By Capt. Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart., late Second Life Guards. With Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, including 6 Coloured Plates. Two volumes, super-royal 8vo. Edition de luxe, limited to 40 copies, £10 10s. net. Ordinary Edition, £3 13s. 6d. net.

"The story of the Households, alike in peace and war, was worth telling; and in Sir George Arthur the corps has found an excellent historian—competent, concise, and conscientious. There is no attempt at fine writing, but justice is done to all the more stirring and dramatic episodes in this interesting chapter of history. The book is nobly printed and adorned with illustrations which are both artistically beautiful and historically appropriate."—Standard.

CONTEMPORARY FRANCE. By GABRIEL HANOTAUX. Volume IV. 1877—1882. Translated from the French. Demy 8vo. With Portraits, 15s. net.

This volume completes the monumental work of M. Gabriel Hanotaux, the whole work covering the period from 1870-1900.

PLAYS, ACTING AND MUSIC. A Book of Theory, by Arthur Symons. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

This volume forms part of Mr. Symons attempt to give concrete expression to a theory or system of æsthetics, of all the arts, and deals mainly with the stage, and secondarily with music.

THE ROMANCE AND MYSTERY OF "WIRELESS" EXPLAINED.

RADIO-TELEGRAPHY. By C. C. F. MONCKTON, M.I.E.E. With 173 Diagrams and Illustrations. Ex. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"A very interesting and valuable book."—Nature.

STATE INSURANCE. A Social and Industrial Need. By FRANK W. LEWIS. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"His book deals generally, and ably, with the subject—specially with Germany, America, Great Britain, and her Colonies."—Times.

SOME ACROSTIC SIGNATURES OF FRANCIS BACON, Baron Verulam of Verulam, Viscount St. Alban, together with some others, all of which are now for the first time deciphered and published by WILLIAM STONE BOOTH. Illustrated with Facsimiles and Acrostic Figures. Large 4to, 25s. net.

ENGLISH HERALDIC BOOK STAMPS. Figured and described by CYRIL DAVENPORT, F.S.A. Super-royal 8vo, Illustrations, 25s net.

The first book on this subject in English, with about 300 illustrations.

FAMOUS WOMEN OF FLORENCE. By EDGCUMBE STALEY. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The careers and characters of some of the famous ladies of Florence whose stories illustrate the Renaissance period.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A SILVER FOX. By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

"A romance of the realist kind, and the fascinating lore of the woods is accompanied by the most delightful picture of foxes great and small. It makes better reading than many novels of human affairs."—Observer

GEORGE MEREDITH'S WORKS

LIBRARY EDITION. Crown 8vo, each with a Photogravure Frontispiece. Cloth, 6s. per volume. Pocket Edition, Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net each volume.

THE ORDEAL OF RICHARD FEVEREL.
BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER.
SANDRA BELLONI.
VITTORIA.
THE EGOIST.
EVAN HARRINGTON.
ONE OF OUR CONQUERORS.
LORD ORMONT AND HIS AMINTA.
THE AMAZING MARRIAGE.
DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS.
THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY RICHMOND.
RHODA FLEMING.
THE SHAVING OF SHAGPAT.
THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS.
SHORT STORIES, containing the Tale of Chloe; The House on the Beach; Farina; The Case of General Ople and Lady Camper.
AN ESSAY ON COMEDY.
POEMS. In two volumes.

NATURE POEMS. With 16 full-page plates in Photogravure by William Hyde. Royal 8vo, full cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.

SELECTED POEMS. Crown 8vo buckram, 6s. net; 16mo, half parchment or limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THE MEREDITH POCKET-BOOK. Selections from the Prose Writings, compiled and arranged by G. M. T. 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

A few copies of the Edition de Luxe of the

COMPLETE WORKS OF GEORGE MEREDITH.

In 32 Vols. Sold in sets only, £21 net.

THE BEST INTERPRETATION OF MEREDITH'S POETRY.

THE POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY OF GEORGE MEREDITH. By G. M. Trevelyan. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Second Impression.

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD. 10 Orange Street London W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 13.] SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE

Diary of the Week ... ... 441

Politics and Affairs:—
A "Revolution" Indeed ... 444
The Moderation of the Budget 445
The Coming Reality of Politics 446
The Congo and the Concert ... 448

An Exposition. How the Land Scheme of the Budget Works 450

Life and Letters:—
"The Alarm of Motherhood" 452
"Damnable" Iteration ... ... 453
Butterflies ... ... ... ... 454

Short Studies:—
Shaun. By Padraic Colum ... 455

Drama:—
Two Problem Plays. By William Archer ... ... 456

Communications:—
The Attitude of the German People. By the Rev. W. D. Morrison ... ... ... ... 458
"Triangular" Cricket. By Lancastrian... ... ... ... 459

Letters to the Editor:—
Religion and Conduct. By John Drinkwater, J. Allanson Picton, V.P., F. S. Montagu Powell, and Joseph Fletcher 459
The Fight for the Budget. By the Rev. Th. Hill ... ... 461
The Services of Miss Colenso. By A. Werner ... ... ... 461
Esperanto. By J. Gourlay ... 461

PAGE

"The Destruction of Dialect." By Neal Green, R. W. J., and David Wilson ... ... ... 462
"The Feud." By Edward Garnett ... ... ... ... 462
"The Intellects of Men and Women." By E. Sykes and Mrs. F. Travers... ... ... 463
Feminist Arguments. By E. Belfort Bax ... ... ... 463
Fire Brigades and Fire Insurance. By Insurance Manager 463
The Incorrigible Censor. By C. E. Maurice ... ... ... 464
The Alleged "Cave." By the Right Hon. Thomas Lough, M.P. ... ... ... 464

Poetry:—
Victoria Street. By Lucy Lyttelton ... ... ... ... 464

The World of Books ... ... 465
Books to be read ... ... ... 465

Reviews:—
The Genius of Methodism ... 466
Things as they are ... ... 467
A Gentle Life ... ... ... 468
A Political Satire ... ... ... 468
Aristotle's Metaphysics... ... 469

Books in Brief:—
The Inns of Court ... ... 470
Lola Montez ... ... ... 470
Sixty Years in the Wilderness 470
Carotti's History of Art ... 470

The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... 472

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The Honors List, which, we are glad to see, contains no peers, is not without distinction. It is pleasant to see the names of Sir William Butler and Mr. Merriman coupled together as Privy Councillors, for great political services to the Empire, remembering, as we do, the time when both were the subjects of insult and derision. Original powers of thought are honored in the person of Mr. Francis Galton, and a most attractive and suggestive historical method in Mr. Samuel Dill, whose writing, like that of Mr. Edwin Pears, has often delighted the readers of The Nation. The stage is doubly honored in the persons of Mr. Pinero and Mr. Tree, who may be regarded as the two most favored exponents of modern English drama. Journalism has an exceptionally generous share of the King's favors. "Toby, M.P.," is a household word, and we are glad to see singular competence, steadfastness, and strength in the advocacy of Liberal opinion recognised in the person of Mr. Carlaw Martin, the editor of the "Dundee Advertiser." But we shall take leave to say that a special propriety attaches to the inclusion in the list of the name of Mr. Edwin Pears, the Constantinople correspondent of the "Daily News." Mr. Pears's work for humanity and civilisation in the Near East represents a contribution to the progress of the world, now visibly embodied in the triumph of the reform party in Turkey. Mr. Pears is a scholar of note; but his service to his times has been essentially that of a good soldier of humanity, stoutly holding an outpost of its march.

* * *

The House of Commons has passed into Committee on the Budget, and has spent the whole week in discussing the increment tax. On Tuesday, after an ample discussion, the Chancellor moved the adoption of the first three lines of the first clause, and the Chairman properly accepted this moderate proposal, thus disposing of many trivial amendments, but giving Mr. Hardy the right to move an amendment of substance. This invitation he declined, and the closure was carried. The proceeding thus adopted was admirable, for, unlike the guillotine, it ensures a fair discussion of all points of material value, together with the censorship by the Chairman of frivolous or time-wasting motions. The method is also strictly within precedent. Mr. Courtney set up the practice of discrimination under the Coercion Bill of 1887, and his decision was not challenged by the Liberal leader, Sir William Harcourt. Mr. Lowther applied it to the Agricultural Rates Bill of 1896, and both Sir William Harcourt and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman accepted his ruling. A third precedent was established over the Tithes Bill, and both parties are equally committed to this fair and workable method. The Opposition raised a violent and foolishly theatrical scene, no echo of which was heard on the following morning. The Chairman behaved with great dignity and firmness.

* * *

Meanwhile, the Chancellor has already foreshadowed a series of concessions to the landed interests. He has promised that the increment tax shall be divided equally between local and Imperial purposes. This is not only fair in itself, but will bring to the Budget an immense body of support from the municipalities, great and small, who have long pleaded for such a means of revenue. A second concession, of a more delicate character, was a promise to save agricultural land from taxation upon added values due not to a growing population or a demand for building land, but to the natural fluctuations of the market. These concessions did not placate either the Tories, who took, with Mr. Balfour, the ultra-Socialist line that the increase of all values, and not merely those of land, depended on the community, or the small Whig "Cave," which mustered twenty-three votes in favor of Mr. Pretyman's amendment exempting agricultural land from the increment tax. The Government majority thus fell to 105. The names of the twenty-three are as follows:—

| | |
|---|---|
| Agar-Robartes, T. C. | Napier, Dr. |
| Beck, A. Cecil. | O'Donnell, C. J. |
| Chance, F. W. | Paulton, J. M. |
| Cory, Sir Clifford. | Pearson, W. H. |
| Dalmeny, Lord. | Raphael, H. H. |
| Davies, David. | Ridsdale, E. A. |
| Dickson-Poynder, Sir J. | Tennant, Sir E. |
| Edwards, Clement. | Waring, Walter. |
| Ferguson, Munro. | Whitbread, H. |
| Freeman-Thomas, F. | White, Sir Luke. |
| Hobart, Sir R. | Wodehouse, Lord. |
| Mason, A. E. W. | |

It will be seen that they consist mainly of members drawn from the small Imperialist or Liberal League wing, or from the sons or representatives of great landowners.

* * *

On Wednesday an anti-Budget meeting was held by a number of City bankers and merchants, nominally non-partisan, but really consisting exclusively of Unionists and Tories. Men like Lord Avebury and Sir Felix Schuster belong to the first denomination, Lord Rothschild, who is the shining star of these gatherings of the super-rich, to both. The meeting developed no counter-suggestions, and proved to be merely a meeting of rich men who "won't pay." The speakers, whilst protesting their nominal willingness to pay for "Dreadnoughts," objected to every tax in the Budget which puts this patriotic zeal into practical shape—the licence duties, the income-tax, the super-tax, the death duties, and, of course, the land taxes. Sir J. Alexander Henderson, we notice, illustrated one of the many "hard cases" (his own?) under the Budget, that of a man of sixty who had acquired a "modest fortune" of £150,000, and whose income would be reduced from £6,000 to a pittance of £4,600. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at the Holborn Restaurant on Thursday, said, with truth and wit, of these airs of a big financier, that the nation was having "too much Rothschild"—a gentleman, it should be remembered, whose ancestor came as an alien Jew to these shores, and who, with his family, has since made many millions out of the British people.

> We are not to have temperance reform in this country. Why (said the Chancellor)? Because Lord Rothschild has sent a circular to the Peers to say so. We must have more "Dreadnoughts." Why? Because Lord Rothschild has told us so at a meeting in the City. We must not pay for them when we have got them. Why? Because Lord Rothschild says so. You must not have an estate duty and a super-tax. Why? Because Lord Rothschild has sent a protest on behalf of the bankers to say he won't stand it. You must not have a tax on reversions. Why? Because Lord Rothschild, as chairman of an insurance company, said he wouldn't stand it. You must not have a tax on undeveloped land. Why? Because Lord Rothschild is chairman of an industrial housing company. You ought not to have old age pensions. Why? Because Lord Rothschild was a member of a committee that said it could not be done. Are we really to have all ways of social and financial reform blocked by a notice-board, "No thoroughfare. By order, Nathaniel Rothschild"?

* * *

Lord Rosebery, who can never stay long out of the limelight, has written a melodramatic letter on the Budget, which he calls "a social and political revolution of the first magnitude," to be carried over the heads of the people, who will have no more control over it than if they were "Tartars or Lapps." He suggested that this situation showed "vast flaws in the Constitution," and that here was matter for a referendum. This means, we suppose, that Lord Rosebery would call for a Referendum on the Budget, but his letter is obviously a summons, not to the nation, but to the House of Lords. With much less emphasis, and probably without serious intention, Mr. Balfour has used a similar telegraphic code. On Monday he warned the Government that if they persisted in the land taxes the Bill would end in nothing but disaster. Generally, the note of the Tory Press is to incite the Peers to separate the land taxes from the rest of the Budget. This, as we point out elsewhere, would be a direct violation of the Constitution, and the beginning of the greatest and most turbulent political agitation since the Reform Bill. But it could not produce a General Election unless and until the Budget had been sent back to the Peers intact, to the last comma, and, if necessary, sent back again, and until the King had been appealed to in vain to maintain the British Constitution—in our opinion, an unthinkable contingency.

Meanwhile, the Government have decided, not a moment too soon, to send out the fiery cross. A "Budget League" has been formed, under Mr. Churchill's active direction, with an Executive Committee in the House of Commons, and the whole country is to be mapped out into centres of speech and work. On Wednesday Sir Edward Grey, speaking at the National Liberal Club, threw over Lord Rosebery, declared that he saw nothing "revolutionary" in the Budget, and that the taxation of unearned increment had long been a Liberal "commonplace," for which even Tory members had voted, and argued that all the three land taxes and the Budget as a whole stood the test of the sound principle that taxation should spring from superfluities and luxuries rather than from necessaries. On the following day the Prime Minister, speaking with the greatest force, weight, and moderation, also repudiated Lord Rosebery's description as an abuse of the English vocabulary, and pointedly reminded him that he himself had supported the taxation of land values fifteen years ago. The Prime Minister was received with the greatest warmth by a very representative gathering, under Sir John Brunner's presidency, whose spirit and fire fitly heralded the coming crusade. He claimed that the Budget held the field, and called for unanimity and enthusiasm in its defence.

* * *

We understand that during the visit of the deputation of British clergy to Germany—a visit marked by lavish hospitality and close friendliness of speech—Admiral Von Tirpitz expressed the pain he had felt that the British Government should not have accepted his explicit personal assurances, tendered this spring, that there had been no acceleration of the German naval programme. We are sure that there has been a misunderstanding on this point, and we hope the time has come when Mr. McKenna will clear it up.

* * *

Our Foreign Office has clearly decided to take no note, or the smallest possible note, of the "Woodburn" incident. The wounded fireman has been offered £20 by the Russian Government, but we did not gather from Mr. Wood's answer if they have offered an apology for firing with live shell on a British ship acting innocently under a Russian pilot's orders. The Foreign Office does not yet seem to know whether the incident occurred in territorial waters, where the Russian regulations would apply, or on the high seas, where they would not. We are glad that the incident has been taken so calmly, but we are afraid that if the offender had been German instead of Russian, the country by this time would have been ablaze.

* * *

On Saturday the German Conservative-Centre coalition permitted the Government's new taxes to go to the Finance Reform Committee, but on the same day it displayed its power by carrying in the Reichstag the second reading of its own scheme as drafted by a rump Finance Reform Committee. On Tuesday it pressed its advantage further by refusing the Government's inheritance tax in Committee, and by securing in the Reichstag the second reading of its own tax on the unearned increment of securities. On Thursday the Government's tax was thrown out on second reading by 194 votes to 186. The Socialists joined with the Liberals and Radicals in supporting Prince Bülow against the victorious Junkers. The two taxes are the crux of the situation. On the one hand, the Government regards an inheritance tax as inevitable; on the other, it is strongly opposed to the agrarian tax on securities, which is naturally condemned by bankers and financiers. In forcing their will against the Government the Agrarians and Clericals have, therefore, taken a very decided step, which, if it is persisted in, may prove fatal to Prince Bülow and Herr von Sydow.

* * *

In the interchange of toasts at Björkö the Tsar assured the Kaiser that he cherished "the sincere and unchanging wish ever to maintain the traditional relations of hearty friendship and mutual trust which have always united our two houses, and the cultivation of which I strongly desire, not merely as a pledge of good relations between our two countries, but also of general peace." In reply the Kaiser described the meeting as "a new and valuable confirmation of the close and sincere friendship which unites our persons and our houses" and of "the traditional relations of cordial friendship and confidence which exist between our Governments." In a speech at Hamburg on Wednesday the Kaiser gave German commerce the assurance that "the Tsar and I agreed that our meeting is to be regarded as a vigorous reinforcement of the cause of peace. We feel ourselves as monarchs responsible to our God for the joys and sorrows of our peoples, whom we desire to lead forward as far as possible in the path of peace. We will therefore continually endeavor, as far as lies in our power, to work with God's help for the furtherance and maintenance of peace." Putting these declarations together with the semi-official comments, the conclusion seems to be that while the Björkö meeting leaves Russia's treaties and ententes untouched, it has stopped Russia from entering an anti-German alliance.

* * *

The great Powers have decided to keep the letter, if not the spirit, of their engagement to Crete. The protecting troops are to be withdrawn, but the nominal Turkish suzerainty is to be sustained, as we hinted the other week, by a guardship, or guardships, whose function will be to protect the red flag that flies over a rock in Suda Bay. To this agreement all the parties, including the Turkish Government, will probably give a nominal assent. But the difficulty will come when the Cretans send delegates to Athens, and Greece will have to decide whether or no she will receive them.

* * *

Three hundred Russian soldiers have returned from Tabriz to the Caucasus, but, on the other hand, another sotnia of Cossacks is reported to have been sent to Reshed. This reduction of the force at Tabriz is said to be the beginning of a gradual but complete withdrawal from that city, in accordance with an agreement with England; but there is no official announcement of such an agreement, and the troops at Tabriz are carrying things with so high a hand that sniping by Persians has already commenced. The new electoral law is expected to be promulgated immediately. On the other hand the Bakhtiari, after many false starts, do seem really to have begun to move against Teheran. A thousand mounted riflemen, under the Sardar-as-Sad, are on the march, and the intervention of the British and Russian Consuls General would appear not to have dissuaded them from their enterprise. The whole situation is complicated and disturbing.

* * *

The American Senate, not excluding the Democratic members, is still busy running up the rates. Among other resolutions, it was decided to limit the amount of rice, sugar, and tobacco that may come from the Philippines free, though all American produce enters the islands free. Mr. Taft is said to threaten to veto the Bill unless all reductions are maintained and no increases rise above the Dingley level, but he has made no public announcement. On the other hand, he has sent a message to Congress urging that an income-tax of 2 per cent. on Corporations should be imposed, and that a constitutional amendment should be introduced to permit a general income-tax without apportionment among the States according to population. The first of these he thinks constitutional under the Inter-State Commerce clause, and he expects more than £5,000,000 from such a tax. Many people think that a general Federal income-tax is constitutional. When one was set up by the Wilson Tariff, the Judges, by five to four, condemned it, but a similar tax imposed during the Civil War was pronounced constitutional. Inasmuch as an amendment to the Constitution must be approved by a two-thirds majority of Congress and by three-fourths of the States, it is generally thought that Mr. Taft has chosen the slowest and the less sure way of establishing his point.

* * *

On Saturday M. de Martens, the famous international lawyer, died on his way home to Livonia. Born at Pernao, in what was once a Swedish province, in 1845, he became Professor of International Law at St. Petersburg in 1873, and in the following year entered the service of the Foreign Office as its pamphleteer and its expert advocate and adviser. He secured a wide reputation by a series of treatises on international law, which were translated into German, French, and English, and by the publication of a vast collection of treaties and conventions concluded by Russia with foreign Powers. His writings were skilful, though his doctrines were colored by the necessity of putting forward the official view, and on the strength of his reputation he was frequently chosen to arbitrate in international disputes, among others in the disputes between Mexico and the United States and between France and England in 1891. He played a prominent part in negotiating the peace with Japan, and in arranging the first and second Hague Conference. At the latter he acted as President of the Committee on International Law, though with no special distinction. He rarely expressed any opinion on domestic politics, and his most notable intervention was a letter recommending the dissolution of the Second Duma. A learned, supple mind, he was a highly competent servant, lacking in fruitful originality.

* * *

We are glad to note the brilliant success of the Church Pageant, which closes to-day. Its peculiar interest derives in some respect from the fact that the Anglican Church represents a continuous thread—or at least a thread with only one break in it—in the life of the English people. This long and dramatic story has been illustrated in its most thrilling episodes with delightful and at the same time most instructive art. No stage manager in London could contrive anything touching the poetic intention and dramatic power of the closing scene in the Pageant, when the army of historic personages and symbols faded, with the instant extinction of thousands of torches and to the music of Watts's great hymn of life, into the darkness which has long covered their originals. Thus the generations pass: while great entities like the State or the Church, which embody their labors, remain.

Politics and Affairs.

A "REVOLUTION" INDEED.

"ALL aids and supplies and aids to his Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons, and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords."—(Resolution of the House of Commons, July 3rd, 1678.)

"The Commons have claimed that such measures (those of supply and taxation) should be simply affirmed by the Lords, and should not be amended by that House in the slightest particular. The Lords have practically acquiesced in this restriction, although they have never formally consented to it."—(Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England.")

"There is no distinction between the right of the Lords to reject a Bill imposing a tax and one repealing a tax. The control of the public finance by the House of Commons is a constitutional right."—(The same.)

"The Lords have no voice in the question of expenditure, save that of formally assenting to the Appropriation Acts. They are excluded from it by the spirit and the forms of the Constitution."—(Erskine May's "Constitutional History of England.")

"The House of Commons claims as within its exclusive jurisdiction all questions of finance: with the initiation of all such questions and with all their details this House exclusively deals. The House of Lords on these Bills, like the Crown on these and all other Bills, retains the general power of assent or rejection only, but not of amendment."—(Hearn's "Government of England.")

"The House of Commons has not only the absolute mastery over the necessary annual taxes; it has practically an absolute mastery over all questions of taxation, unless the House of Lords is prepared to throw the taxing machinery of the country out of gear."—(Lord Courtney's "Working Constitution of the United Kingdom.")

"The suggestion has been made in words, if not entertained as a near possibility, that the House of Commons should stop supplies. Such a threat was heard before the great Reform Bill of 1832. No one, however, can remember a suggestion that the House of Lords should refuse to assent to supplies. The power is not dead. It cannot be called living."—(The same.)

"The exclusive and conclusive authority of the House of Commons over expenditure has long been practically established."—(The same.)

"It is perfectly obvious that this house, in point of fact, has not for many years interfered by amendment with the finance of the year. The reason why this House cannot do so is that it has not the power of changing the Executive Government, and to reject a Finance Bill and leave the Executive Government in its place means TO CREATE A DEADLOCK FROM WHICH THERE IS NO ESCAPE."—(Lord Salisbury, on the Third Reading of Sir William Harcourt's Budget, July 30th, 1894.)

WE feel that we owe an apology to our readers for even discussing, on the motion of a handful of sensational journalists, so established a matter as the "exclusive and conclusive authority" of the House of Commons over taxation. We argued the question in brief a fortnight ago, and, if we recur to it, it is not because we believe that the House of Lords either can or will tamper with the Budget, but because it is desirable to check a delusion which, if it obtains any credence, can only confuse and enfeeble the main controversy. Towards Lord Rosebery's intervention, it is hardly necessary to observe even this measure of intellectual respect. If Lord Rosebery were any longer in the habit of addressing his mind seriously and with regularity to political issues, he would know that, whatever may be the uses of a referendum, no advocate of that constitutional method ever dreamed of applying it to an elaborate scheme of taxes. It may be a suitable means of obtaining the verdict of a democracy on a simple, clear issue of principle, separable from details. But every modern State has its fixed method of taxation by representative bodies, and to call for a plébiscite on taxes is to bring all considered methods of government into ridicule. Equally futile is Lord Rosebery's sensational echo of the statement of the Tory Press, that the Budget is a "revolution." By this Lord Rosebery refers, we suppose, to the taxes which affect his estates, with the four or five palaces attached to them, and to the method of valuation. It is enough to say that for every one of these taxes a precedent exists in modern legislation, notably in the legislation of our own Colonies. The assessment of site value, the plan which the Budget suggests, has long been in operation in this country, and, to take a salient foreign example, in New York City, whose practice has often been quoted by British supporters of site valuation as a capital example of its practicability. The principle of this revolutionary proposal has twice been approved by a Conservative House of Commons, and notably by two statesmen who have made a common, though not equally rapid, passage from Liberalism to Toryism, namely, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and Lord Rosebery. The former declared in 1883 that "the expense of making towns habitable for the toilers who dwell in them must be thrown on the land which their toil makes valuable, and that without any effort on the part of the owners." Fifteen years ago the latter spoke with equal emphasis in favor of the taxation of land values, at a time when the people had done much for Lord Rosebery, and looked, as it happens in vain, for some slight service of gratitude in return.

This, then, is the "revolution" which the Budget proposes; what is the revolution which the landlords' friends propose? Only the abolition of the British Constitution and the wiping out of five hundred years of English history. Only that, and nothing more. We observe that the "Spectator," which makes this modest demand, constructs, out of its own imagination, a theory of the relative powers of the two Houses in regard to taxation. We give the passage as a measure of the licence of the advocates of the right of landed interest to upturn the Constitution in order to escape a set of taxes personal to themselves:—

> A word must be said as to the alleged Constitutional inability of the Peers to amend the Budget by dividing the Finance Bill into two parts, and passing one while rejecting the other. The alleged unconstitutionalism of such an act is, we believe, based upon a mistake. The principle which governs the power of the Lords in the matter of finance is a very simple one. It is > that the Peers have no right to impose any burden upon the taxpayers of this country. The taxpayers tax themselves through the representatives they have commissioned for that purpose. But the Lords are not commissioned by the taxpayers. Therefore they cannot impose even a farthing's-worth of taxation upon the people. To extend this principle, however, so as to make it run that the Lords cannot relieve the taxpayers of this country of burdens proposed to be laid upon them by the Commons is utterly preposterous. The Lords have a clear right, and, what is more, in certain circumstances a clear duty, to reject burdens which the other House seeks to lay upon the taxpayer.

It is not too much to say that every sentence in this passage is a figment. The peers, as the quotation we give from Todd's famous work shows, have no more right to reject a tax than to impose one. If they had, the language of the resolution of 1678 would be meaningless, and the resulting Constitutional action of no effect. They could have dislocated every Budget to which they took an objection. Why have they never ventured on such a course? The answer is obvious. They would have been met with an insuperable obstacle—the historic privileges of the House of Commons—the historic right of the people of England to be taxed only by and through their elected representatives, and the sole right and custom of those representatives to initiate taxes, to appropriate taxes, to impose as well as to remit taxes. Suppose the Lords "divide" the Budget—i.e., reject the land clauses—what will happen? Not, it is unnecessary to say, the General Election which the Protectionists pretend they want, for no Government would be mad enough to make the British Constitution the subject of a plébiscite. Some very obvious and well-known Parliamentary facts will at once come into operation. The Speaker, a loyal servant of the House, will declare the action of the peers to be a gross breach of the privileges of the Commons of England. The Bill will be sent back to the Lords. Will they repeat their lawless action? The Bill will be again remitted to them, or "tacked" to the Appropriation Bill. Will they persist? Then—the Ministry adhering to the land taxes—the whole machinery of finance will be thrown out of gear. Already millions of taxes will have been virtually legalised by the action of the Commons in regard to the annual taxes. Imposts like the income-tax and the tea duties come into operation by mere resolution of the Commons, and on the faith of it the business of collection is fully set up. How can this be retraced? How can the public recover the sums they have already been charged on their tobacco and whisky if the Lords destroy the scheme of the Budget? These are not unreal difficulties, and if they were, the Lords, with their hatred of democracy, would long ago have broken through them. It is of course true that they possess the power to reject a Budget. But this power is reduced to nothingness by the fact that finance is completely out of their sphere, and that, in their state of powerlessness, rejection, nominally allowed, means direct chaos, while amendment, constitutionally forbidden, implies a deadlock, leading to chaos. If chaos is risked, because the Lords of England deny the people of England the right to ascertain the value of the land, it can only be because the landlords think that the ancient Monarchy of England can be dragged into the position of assenting to and furthering a break-up of our ancient laws and understandings.

The moral position of the House of Lords in this controversy is equally weak with the constitutional pretensions which, after centuries of rest, are being revived in their interest. The House of Lords are, in this respect, as Bagehot pointed out long ago, "biassed revisers." They are a House of rich men, but more especially of rich and great landlords. It is a hypocritical pretence to say that they are interested in the small landowners. The small landowner is unhappily a very small class in England, and this Budget will barely touch him. On the other hand, a simple adding up of the ninety odd noble families whose reputable or disreputable origin is set forth in Mr. Howard Evans's "Our Old Nobility" reveals the fact that these gentlemen, who represent about that number of votes in the House of Lords, held, when our last "Domesday Book" was issued, namely, in 1873, 7,867,918 acres of land in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. Mr. Snowden calculates, we suppose from the same source, that the total holding of members of the House of Lords is seventeen million acres, to which we may add the ownership of some of the richest industrial centres in the country, and the regular collection of "unearned increment" on their toil. What shadow of moral force attaches to the claim of such a class to divert all taxation from that part of their wealth which comes to them, as Mill said, in their sleep? We quite appreciate a process of "bluff" set up for the intimidation of the Government, and the abstraction of the pith of the land clauses. But we can promise the Lords that if they try and break the law and custom of the Constitution in such a cause, the news will bring hundreds of thousands of men into London streets in protest, and, sooner or later, millions to the ballot boxes to vote their destruction.

---

THE MODERATION OF THE BUDGET.

Inspired by those two masters of word-fencing—Mr. Balfour and Mr. Harold Cox—the Opposition is doing its best to fight the land clauses with dialectics. But dialectics, even in the hands of the most skilful, is a two-edged weapon, and the House of Commons has been amused by the spectacle of a Conservative leader and an individualist champion announcing principles which would call a blush to the cheek of the mere Socialist. At one moment we are gravely told that the State must not tax the unearned increment unless it is prepared to make good decrements of value arising from social change. The implication is that it is the function of the State to act as a kind of philanthropic banker to industry in general. If these principles were sound all the risks of industry should fall on the community. There ought to be a kind of inverted or negative income tax, a State subvention making good to all people whose incomes are declining a certain proportion of that loss in compensation for the tax that has been taken from them in good years. If the State charges a stamp duty on the transfer of securities against those who gain by such a transaction, it ought on this view to make an equivalent present to anyone who can show that he has lost on the exchange. How the same theory would be applied to customs-duties, and how the Government would in fact acquire any revenue on the balance are details which dialecticians of Mr. Balfour's stamp do not stay to inquire. It is enough for the simple-minded squires who follow him that a concatenation of words having on the surface a meaning has been put together, for to put together any words at all in the state of incoherent emotion to which the Budget has reduced them seems to them no mean feat. Cooler minds may reflect that in transferring the burden of taxation to those whose wealth is increasing by no effort of their own, the Government is, in fact, giving the only alleviation in its power to those who are less fortunate. It is relieving them of some of the taxation which would otherwise fall on them. If, in particular, it is assigning a portion of the increment tax in relief of rural rates it is sensibly diminishing the burden which now falls equally on the poorest and richest land. It is transferring the tax from those who have gained nothing, and perhaps have lost something, by the shifting of population and the general economic changes of the time to those who have lost nothing and gained much. In this way the taxation of unearned increment does go, as far as fiscal measures ought to go, in relief of unearned decrement.

Other dialectics come in plenty, and with not less disastrous effect to those who use them. Mr. Cox repeats at every favorable opportunity, and to the unfailing delight of the Opposition, his single speech, and Mr. Balfour takes up and expands the notion that all wealth is alike in being due to the efforts of society as a whole. Mr. Balfour's Socialism belongs to a palaeolithic period. The modern Socialist is quite aware that there is a social element in all values, but he has at least reached the point at which he can clearly recognise an element due to individual effort as well. If Mr. Balfour would attend some of the easier Fabian lectures, or would invest in some leaflets of the Independent Labor Party, he would find simple reasons set forth which would moderate his ardor. The element of individual industry, ingenuity, and foresight is not to be despised, although the co-operation of society is not to be overlooked. The object of wise taxation is to reduce the burdens on individual effort to a minimum, while absorbing for State purposes as much as is necessary of the surplus created by social progress. To confuse these two factors in idea is the object of the dialectician. To separate them in practice is the object of the statesman. In the case of land the separation is easier than in other cases, because it has long been grossly palpable that a large proportion of urban rents is in no sense due to any effort on the part of landowners, but arises from the growth of towns and the expenditure of the ratepayers. The method of effecting the distinction is by valuation, and when valuation is proposed once again the only weapon of defence is dialectics. If a Valuation Bill is passed and sent up to the chamber of landowners for consideration, the reply is that valuation cannot be accepted until the taxation to which it is to lead is known. If valuation and taxation are put forward together, as in the present Budget, the argument is that they are different proposals, and ought to be separated. Is it seriously supposed that all these verbal ingenuities are going to stand against a simple demand for fiscal justice?

A more genuine plea was put forward on behalf of agricultural land. It is urged that agricultural values have been declining since the 'seventies, that they have touched bottom, and are now showing signs of gradual recovery. It is contended that this is hardly the moment for setting the increment tax to work. Existing owners have been hard hit, and it is thought harsh to deprive them of a substantial part of the recoupment which they might now expect. The argument, better set forth, perhaps, in a recent letter of Lord St. Aldwyn in the "Westminster Gazette" than by any speaker in Tuesday's debate, has apparently impressed Mr. Lloyd George, and we do not deny that it is worthy of consideration. But we have no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will very carefully weigh what has to be said on the other side before committing himself to any definite concession. In the first place the values of the 'seventies were highly inflated. Rents went up and up with the general prosperity, and it may be questioned whether the decline of the intervening years has done more than bring them back to the point at which they stood two generations ago. In the second place, all the transactions of sale and purchase which have taken place in the last quarter of a century have been based on the lower prices, and on the anticipation that they would rule in permanence. Further, the provisions already made in the Budget would seem to us sufficiently to meet the point that enhanced agricultural values are more largely due to personal effort than the corresponding urban values, for all such demands of value are to be ruled out in making a valuation, and, lastly, when Mr. Lloyd George speaks of a distinction between temporary fluctuations and a permanent rise, and hints at an exclusion of the former from taxation, we hope that he will bear in mind the fluctuations that might arise from a change in the fiscal system. If the rents of agricultural land were to be sent up to their old figure by the imposition of a duty on foreign wheat, it would be eminently just that the increment so accruing should be made an object of heavy taxation. Indeed, we may say that a sufficient tax on unearned increment would be one of the best safeguards against a change in our fiscal system. On the whole, we must consider that any special relief to agriculture beyond that already provided with no unsparing hand is of the nature of charity, and we are not sure that the methods of Mr. Loch's famous society are not needed in order to deal with petitioners for doles of this kind. If there is a danger it is that the agricultural landowner should be spoiled, not that he should be despoiled.

Mr. George's promise that half of the produce of the land taxes should go in relief of rates will add to the strength of the Budget in the country, but is also in large measure an indirect relief of the landowning class. The ordinary occupier feels the rates in the first instance, and so far as they are levied on buildings and improvements he probably pays them in the end. But so far as they fall on land values they already come in the main out of the pockets of owners in the shape of a reduction of rents. If this is so a large part of the new taxes by reducing the rates will find their way back into the pockets of landowners. We confess that we look forward to a reform of local taxation which the present valuation proposals will render possible, and which will transfer at least a portion of the burden of the rates from buildings to sites. We regard such a reform as the natural pendant to the present Budget, as an application to local finance of the principles here set forth in the sphere of national finance. The unearned increment of land is quite fairly taxable for national purposes. Site values, which include not merely future increment but the swollen values that have already accumulated, are the natural basis of local revenue. The concession which Mr. Lloyd George foreshadows on this point is but another proof of the extreme moderation with which the hotly denounced land clauses apply the democratic principles they embody.

THE COMING REALITY OF POLITICS.

Lord Rosebery trembles before a vision of judgment, and in characteristic fashion confides his tremors to the Press. He has read the handwriting on the wall, and shrilly warns his wealthy friends—not, indeed, to flee the wrath to come, not even to avert it, but to howl. Someone seems to have put into his hands a book in which he has read of a certain rich man and what befel him, explaining how the divine law of compensation might operate even in this world. So Lord Rosebery calls upon the rocks to cover him, a rigid Constitution with a solidly plutocratic Second Chamber such as protects Mr. Rockefeller, a bureaucracy entrenched behind a class franchise as in Germany, even an appeal to the popular vote, any sort of shelter against the storm. There is something half pathetic, half contemptible, in his cry for a Constitution to safeguard property against a "revolution." For the readjustment of the rights and duties of property that is taking place in different ways and at different paces in every modern civilised country is strictly constitutional. Indeed, a half recognition of the fact probably inspires the new fear of Lord Rosebery and his friends, who are sufficiently intelligent to see that in this country at any rate revolutionary Socialism is foredoomed to failure. The days of popular risings and the barricades are past for Western Europe: any attack upon vested interests and property that is really formidable must come through the ballot and the parliamentary lobby, and must have behind it the army and the police. It is not revolution, but constitutional development, that exposes Lord Rosebery naked to his enemies, as the quondam trustee of popular aspirations now plainly regards the people. For his feigned conviction that a plébiscite would reject this Budget, the people preferring to pay out of their poverty rather than tamper with the "rights of property," is hardly more than a rhetorical device. Why should the voter at the poll be more tender of property than the supporters of the Government in the House of Commons, many of whom are wealthy men?

But the alarms of Lord Rosebery are chiefly interesting in so far as he may be looked upon as a vocal representative of the growing timidity of wealth exposed to the tide of the modern political-economic movements. The timidity is natural enough. For the accumulation of large masses of wealth and the secure enjoyment of profuse luxury by numbers of private citizens has been a unique phenomenon of the last few generations in a few favored lands. Nothing in the earlier history of the evolution of property appeared to lead up to an era of land-ownership divorced from social obligations, which should put half this country in the possession of two thousand five hundred mainly absentee owners, or an extension of joint-stock capitalism by which a third of the entire output of wealth should pass to "sleeping partners," or a development of high finance by which a few little groups of manipulators of paper can make or unmake the history of whole provinces, carrying the happiness or misery of millions in the hollow of their hands. This immense irresponsible power is not of the essence of the institution of property; it is an abuse and a menace of a transition period for which it is the main mission of democracy to find a remedy. Democracy is not the enemy of property; she comes not to destroy, but to fulfil. In every modern industrial country the same slowly dawning consciousness of the nature of this process is perceived, the insistence that property has obligations, and that the performance of these obligations must be determined and enforced by popular government. Democracy has been very slow to face this task; she is not even yet clear-eyed in her confrontment. For the propertied classes had fenced themselves about not only with laws, but with the obfuscating arts of snobbery and mammon-worship and an ethic of personality which pretended that industry and character were the high-road to property. By the exercise of these arts they occupied two generations of the enfranchised people in minor necessary reforms that kept them "out of mischief," heading off any gathering force of deeper moment by the distractions of Imperial and foreign exploits.

The inner meaning of this procrastinating policy was to postpone the day of reckoning with property. Revolutionary Socialism and anarchism, frightful spectres on their first appearance, were soon recognised by the most intelligent defenders of privilege, not as the real enemy, but as weapons enabling them to strengthen their legal supports, and to disperse the ordered forces of constitutional democracy. So it has taken a long generation of education in non-political movements before people begin to realise the chief work which representative government has before it—viz., to reorganise and rectify the institution of property and the methods of acquiring and using it. With the arts of political evasion, conservative instincts of defence have woven various devices of definitely economic concession into the instructive subtleties of which it is impossible here to enter. To these belong a variety of more or less well-meant schemes of business philanthropy, profit-sharing, co-partnership, and the like, designed, consciously or unconsciously, to break the solidarity of working-class organisation, and to blur the deeper issue of modern industry. The gospel of "Carnegieism" belongs to the same order; its historical significance lies in an attempt to divert the general mind from scrutiny into origins of wealth and methods of industrial control by the specious virtue of munificent expenditure. If riches can be regarded as a "trust" voluntarily executed by the rich for the commonwealth, what need of legal interference with money-making processes, or of the awkward and wasteful imposition of taxation? How much better for public-spirited millionaires to improve the condition of the people, abolish slums, provide education, recreation, religion, and all the higher needs of society! A whole sociology and ethics of benevolence have been evolved in order to support this defence of property.

But the insufficiency of this joint policy of evasion and concession is becoming apparent, and it is this recognition that alarms Lord Rosebery and the timid rich. An instructed politician is the more alarmed because he sees the new spirit of democratic policy gathering force in other countries as well as here. Though he still talks on platforms about frightening capital out of this country, he knows he cannot take it anywhere where it will be "safe." It is true that constitutional defences exist in the United States and Germany which are lacking here, but he has a feeling that these will be but flimsy barriers against the spring-tide of popular power. It is not only the mere human reluctance to pay a few millions for "Dreadnoughts," or even for pensions, out of their own pockets, that is astir in the breasts of the rich. It is the perception of a new realism in politics. It is not a century since great families were ruining themselves with the expenses of contested elections as an aristocratic sport, and politics have always retained the dominant aspect of a game among most of those engaged in them. This is only another way of saying that politics have been kept from any serious interference with business and with the acquisition and preservation of wealth. Though many minor encroachments have been made, there has been nothing that could be deemed an organised attack. The significance even of the Budget does not consist in the magnitude of the burdens it imposes, but in the new social doctrine which it directly and consciously applies to property. To impose taxation upon certain incomes and properties, upon the express ground that Society, and not their individual recipients, has "earned" them, to use taxes to compel private owners to develop and use their possessions for the public good, to assert that the State has a general "right" to a substantial share in all large incomes and properties, and that the enforcement of such a right will stimulate, not injure, national industry —it is this current of new political doctrine, passing for the first time clearly from theory into practice, that frightens the rich by making politics "real."

To Lord Rosebery and his friends "anarchy" lies near ahead. They see a predatory government taking from the rich to give to the poor, and, what is worse, having the Army and the police with them as their legal instruments. But what is actually happening is a necessary process of repair and development to the institution of property, reasserting the essential meaning of the term, securing for each what "belongs to" each, and conversely removing what does not belong either by production or by use. This repair and development proceed along two lines, according as the unearned or surplus wealth taken in taxation is applied to the better equipment of individuals for the equal opportunity of acquiring property, or as it is applied to direct purposes of a fuller, richer, nobler, public life. The first course, commonly designated "equality of opportunities," applied so as to enable "every one to secure a man's share of all that goes on in life," so far from sapping private property, will extend and strengthen it by associating it closely and obviously with individual effort. The other course, the direct application of socially earned income to the enrichment of civic and national life by well-apportioned public expenditure, restores to modern industrial society that ennobling sense of commonwealth which thrived in many ancient states, and which has only suffered a temporary eclipse during an age of industrial change which has required time to discover and to assert new forms of social control and co-operation. It is not a triumph of Socialism that lies before us, but a fresh re-adjustment of the relations between individual and society in respect of property and modern industry.

---

THE CONGO AND THE CONCERT.

The ability of any group of men to decide the questions which arise among them solely on their merits is, perhaps, as fair a test as any which a sociologist could invent of their progress in civilisation. Where clan feuds defeat civil justice, where party spirit ruins political debate, where Imperial jealousies obscure the settlement of international issues, the work of creating a reasonable and orderly society is still incomplete. The fears and divisions, which make for disunion and anarchy, may reveal themselves as clearly when some wrong is lightly condoned as when it is exaggerated by passion.

Three international police incidents have in recent years furnished a test of the real condition of Europe. The outrage on the Hull fishing fleet by Admiral Rojdestvensky's squadron, grave though it was, was aggravated unduly by the tension caused by the Japanese War. The Casablanca incident, in which French soldiers assailed, but did not injure, a Moor in German service, was magnified insanely, and all but led to war. The "Woodburn" case of last week was, on the contrary, passed over by the British Press with a quite excessive regard for Russian susceptibilities. It was, on a small scale, a repetition of the North Sea incident. The pilot who was guiding this English vessel past the Tsar's yacht may be charged with an innocent ignorance of a quite arbitrary regulation, but if he was slow to alter his course at the word of command given in an unknown tongue, the Russians, who fired live shell after allowing him some ten seconds to alter his course, were guilty of a savage or panic-stricken abuse of force. One man only was wounded, but a shell fired directly into a merchant ship at close quarters might reasonably have been expected to kill or wound several of the crew. Yet, with few exceptions, our newspapers were either silent or abstained from censure. There has been no hint of any demand for an apology, still less for the censure or punishment of the officer who was to blame, while from the Russian side comes only a stiff assertion of the official view, coupled with a noble Imperial largess of £20 to the wounded sailor. When one recollects the national fury caused by the Hull incident, this unanimity in meekness is decidedly startling. A certain measure of stiffness, a tempered expression of indignation, was proper in both cases. Russian naval officers are clearly prone to a peculiar form of hysterical violence, and only by resenting it in due measure can we fulfil our duty to protect the lives of our fellow-subjects at sea. When we see the same whole nation in the first affair calling for war, and in the second quietly turning the other cheek, we can only conclude either that it has, in the interval, been converted to primitive Christianity, or else that it has very potent reasons for controlling its temper. There has been much less indignation in our Press at this wounding of a British sailor than there was at the truculence of the German officials in Casablanca, when no lives were endangered, and nothing had been injured save the dignity of a French officer, whose own conduct was by no means free from blame. Yet over Casablanca, if the "Temps" is well informed, not only France but this country also was prepared to go to war. The inference would seem to be that we are as ready as ever to be angry, but our anger obeys a careful calculation of interests. Russia may fire a shell, but Germany must not shake a fist. We condone a Russian offence, for the simple reason that our whole policy abroad is now subordinated to the one object of consolidating the Triple Entente against the German Alliance. It is the same order of motives which moves the "Times" to announce that it "reveres" the Tsar, and causes us to acquiesce in a prolonged occupation of Persia by a Russian army. We know that any plain speaking would have the result of driving the Russian Court into the German camp.

A document issued this week by the Congo Reform Association has directed public attention to another and more disquieting phase of our absorption in the Anglo-German rivalry. Mr. Morel has now reached the conviction that his movement has nothing further to hope from Sir Edward Grey, and he records his disappointment in an unusually outspoken attack upon the recent conduct of the Foreign Office. Sir Edward Grey, who has, like his predecessor in the Foreign Office, spoken almost as strongly as Mr. Morel himself in denunciation of King Leopold's barbarities on the Congo, now shrinks, if his speech correctly renders his thoughts, from any action which might end them, from a fear that action might light a European conflagration. To the particular suggestions which Mr. Morel favors we should not care to commit ourselves rashly. Naval intervention might, indeed, force Belgium to a diplomatic surrender, but it would discredit the Reform Party and incense the rulers of the Congo, on whose good faith we should still have to rely for the execution of any paper reforms which we might be able to impose. It might be preferable to promote an appeal to the Hague on the legality of the various monopolies which our Foreign Office declares to be a violation of treaty rights. But whatever differences of opinion there may be on methods and means, unofficial opinion in this country will be unanimous in thinking that it would be intolerable that a national campaign to end the peculiarly savage system of slavery on the Congo should end in a mere declaration of our impotence in the face of a divided Europe. How sharp these divisions are cannot be fully known to those outside the Foreign Office. Its apologists suggest that Germany would back King Leopold, as she used to back Abdul Hamid. It is much more serious that we cannot in this question reckon upon any support from France. French foreign policy is mainly controlled by finance, and French financiers are deeply implicated in King Leopold's combinations. There, rather than in any mere dread of Germany, lies the obstacle. The Triple Entente is an instrument which may be used for certain ends, but not for others. It will ensure the penetration of Morocco and the virtual partition of Persia, but it fails us when our purpose is to employ an influence in any humane service, as it failed us when we sought to advocate a reduction of armaments at the Hague.

The consequences of the struggle for predominance in Europe, in which these two groups of Powers are now engaged, are beginning at length to force themselves on the notice even of those who rarely trouble to follow the game of high politics. It compels us to weaken our initiative on behalf of Congo Reform. It renders untimely any effort to press for a standstill in the war of armaments. It makes us at least the passive spectators of a plot against Persian freedom. And all the while the combination on which we are staking our policy is fluid and uncertain. We have no security that our complacence to the Tsar, our readiness to lend money, our self-repression in Persia, will in the end assure the steadiness of the Russian alliance. Outside these diplomatic and financial combinations, the traditional confidence between the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg persists. It is impossible to know whether Russia is in or out of the alliance, because it is impossible to know at what point the personal policy of the Tsar will overrule that of his Ministers. We are therefore for ever pursuing a balance of power which is never attained, and opposing a fleeting combination, strong at sea, but weak on land, to a firm alliance which is all-powerful on land. There is by this method no rest or peace or finality to be found.

It is the method itself which is at fault. Two principles are at issue. We claimed the right in Morocco and Persia to dispose of certain spheres of influence by a bargain among our allies. The Kaiser replied in a terse phrase that nothing must happen in the world "without Germany." The manœuvre of encircling and penning in is an effort to attain freedom to act "without Germany." The answering manœuvres to break the pen are an attempt on Germany's side to vindicate her claim to be a party to every bargain among the Powers. However brutal the methods which Germany has chosen, the claim itself is not improper. In a world which commerce has internationalised, there are now few purely local questions. The only answer to Germany's claim that nothing in the world shall happen without her participation is to generalise it, and to assert in all world questions, as we did in the Bosnian affair, that nothing must happen without the assent of the whole European Concert. It is on those lines alone that we can look for a hopeful solution of the Congo difficulty. But to the ideal of a Concert the policy of groups is a flat contradiction. While the groups exist a Conference may with difficulty be summoned or the machinery of the Hague set in motion. But the Powers would come together at present only once more to fight out their larger antagonisms on a new battle-ground. Public opinion, which is content to watch the general march of foreign policy inactive, rouses itself on occasion to demand firm action on such a seemingly isolated issue as the Congo. It meets with the answer that we are enmeshed as much by our friendships as by our enmities. It has to realise that in the present state of Europe not even this question can be considered on its merits. To achieve the smaller end it must be prepared to envisage the greater. To abandon the conscious struggle for continental predominance, and to assert the Concert against its groups, is the first step towards any fruitful use of our influence in the world.

---

AN EXPOSITION.

HOW THE LAND SCHEME OF THE BUDGET WORKS.

THERE is much talk of the Land Taxes of the present Budget. Strictly speaking, the Budget is proposing no land taxes. It is proposing taxes, not upon land, but upon that increased value of land which is created by the energies of the people, and the expenditure and security of the State. It is proposing only to tax that part of the increment which is unearned by the present possessor, carefully exempting from the operation of the taxes all the increase which is attributable to his own activity or enterprise. And in the case of the most important of the three taxes—the "Increment tax"—the only increment which will come to the State is increment which may come to any piece of the land in the future, which to-day is unexpected and unforeseen. In all the taxes one principle prevails—where there is no "unearned" increment—to-day or to-morrow—there will be no tax.

The value from which these taxes start is the value of the land of this country on the 30th April, 1909.

As soon as possible after the passing of the Bill, all the owners of land in Great Britain are required to send in estimates of the value of their land on that date. These estimates will in each case be double. The first will be the estimate of the total value of each piece of land, i.e., the selling value of the land itself, with any buildings or houses upon it. The other will be the estimate of the site value of each piece of land, i.e., the value of the land as calculated without the buildings on it, and in the case of agricultural land, without the trees and growing crops.

Such estimates—of land separate from buildings, of growing things on the surface apart from the land underneath—are the products of ordinary valuation, and their reckoning presents no real difficulty to experts. Site value is estimated every day in business transactions. The value of agricultural land, apart from buildings, has been reckoned in this country since 1896, for the purposes of the Agricultural Rates Act. The value of growing things on the land, apart from the land, is estimated to-day for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act. In America, in Australia and New Zealand, in Ireland to-day—both rural and urban—site value is estimated and registered in the normal machinery of Government.

Ireland being already officially valued, no returns are required from owners there: though they may send in returns differing from the official valuation if they please.

From these estimates, however, the owners will be allowed to deduct two important items, which will not be charged against them in estimating increment duty. The first is that part of the site value which is attributable to permanent works executed on the land for the purpose of fitting the land as building land, or for any business, trade, or industry other than agriculture. That increment is reckoned as "earned," it is the result of expenditure or ingenuity on the part of the owner, and consequently is not part of the increment subject to the tax. A second deduction is allowed for the expense of removal of any buildings or trees, or other things necessarily removable, if the full site value is to be realised. Thus, if building land is covered with trees near a town, it is evident that its full building value cannot be realised until the trees are removed. If land near the centre of a town is covered with slum tenements, its "site value" would be greater if those slum tenements were removed. It would fetch in the market a greater value if cleared than if covered. In that case the owner is allowed to deduct cost of clearance, in order that this necessary cost shall not be charged against him in reckoning "unearned" increment.

These "owners' estimates" are only preliminary. They will form the raw material of the State valuation. They will be used as the standard from which to reckon the taxes if the taxes fall due before the State valuation is completed. But if—when that valuation is completed—in the transition time—it is found that they are incorrect, and in any case the owner has paid too much or too little, there will be later adjustments—arrears will be collected or money refunded.

But these first owners' figures will be submitted to the expert staff of valuers acting under the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. If they agree with the owners, the valuation will stand. If they disagree with the owners, these owners may appeal to independent "referees"—skilled valuers—appointed by the Crown. Their decision will be final.

The result of this process will be a completely established official record of the total value and site value of every piece of ground in separate occupation, or in smaller sub-divisions if the Commissioners or the landlord desire, built upon or unbuilt upon, calculated as on the 30th April this year.

This is the standard from which proceed the increment tax and the undeveloped land tax.

THE INCREMENT TAX.

The increment tax will be paid when any piece of the land is sold, when a lease is granted for more than seven years, or when the owner dies. In the case of Corporations—which do not die—it will be paid every fifteen years. On these occasions the site value of the land will be again ascertained. It will be ascertained by deducting from the total selling price of the land: (1) Value attributable to buildings on the land; (2) Value attributable to goodwill or other matter personal to the occupier or any other person interested in the land; (3) Deductions as originally made for any expenditure on development or any expenditure required to realise full site value; and (4) in the case of purely agricultural land, the value of all improvements which have been made in the land.

These deductions having been made from the selling value of the land at the time of taking the increment, there may remain an increase in value over the original registered site value of last April. That increase is, in the strictest definition, "unearned." It must be due to some cause independent of the exertions of the owner. The State then takes one-fifth of it, giving half of this one-fifth for local expenditure and half for national expenditure. For both local causes in municipal enterprise and national causes in security of defences, increase of population and social reforms which have raised the standard of life of the people, have contributed to create this "increment" in land.

There are a few further exceptions to the general tax. Land which is occupied and used by charities and hospitals and institutions of public advantage will be exempt from paying increment so long as the land is so occupied and used. Thus St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the City will pay no increment tax upon the future increase of the value of the site of the hospital so long as it remains there. If it sells its site and migrates elsewhere, it will pay increment tax.

The same condition appears to have been promised to railways and docks holding land under statutory limitations, and to such institutions as the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge.

The Chancellor has also promised amendments which will practically exempt purely agricultural land from this increment tax until it has recovered from the great fall in value of the past thirty years. Already in the Bill there are two special provisions to protect present losers. One declares that if land has been bought during the past twenty years at higher value than it stands to-day, the site value at the time of purchase, instead of the site value to-day, shall be taken as the standard from which increment is calculated. The other, by allowing deduction for all permanent improvement—fences, roads, drains, ditches—from the selling value when the increment is to be taken, while including these improvements in the original site values, means that purely agricultural land must rise above the full value of these improvements before any increment becomes due. That allows for a rise in normal agricultural land of thirty to forty per cent. of its present value before its increase begins to fall under the increment tax.

Lastly, no increment will ever be charged twice on the same land. Having been once paid, at, say, £500, the land may sink in value, rise again, again sink, for twenty or fifty years, and it will be free from all tax or increment. Only when and if, in the courses of time, it rises above this £500, say, to £600, increment will be paid on one-fifth of the unearned portion of this increase. And so on for all future time. The estimate of the future must be uncertain. If population and wealth diminishes, the increment tax may become worthless. If here, at the heart of the Empire, the cities continue to increase, manufactures expand, more and more visitors settle within our borders, prosperity will all be reflected in an increase in the value of land, and the results in half a century may run to incalculable dimensions.

Undeveloped Land Tax.

The same standard of value is taken for undeveloped land tax as for increment tax—the site value on April 30th, 1909.

The tax will be a halfpenny in the pound levied on the amount by which the capital value of any land which has no buildings upon it or is not used for trade or industry exceeds its value for purely agricultural purposes.

Land whose site value is less than £50 an acre is exempt.

This tax aims at obtaining contributions for local and national purposes from values which at present escape altogether from such obligations. An owner may hold land near a town which is receiving continual increase owing to the spreading of the town in the direction of his land. He may have bought it at £50 an acre. He sells it at £500 an acre. He has paid no income tax, on this increase, to the State. He has paid practically no rates to the municipality whose improvements and expenditures have largely helped to increase the value of his land.

The case for such a contribution is overwhelming. It has been recommended by Royal Commissions and Committees, by Conservative and Liberal statesmen. Bills embodying its provisions have been passed in a Conservative House of Commons. The municipalities are solid in its favor.

There are important exemptions from the undeveloped land tax:—

1. The same deductions hold generally in site value as for increment; i.e., the owner can deduct all that value which is due to his own expenditure in preparing the land for building.
2. Each dwelling house is allowed an acre of garden exempt.
3. Parks, gardens, open spaces open to the public as of right, are exempt.
4. Parks, gardens, open spaces in private ownership to which reasonable access is granted to the public, contributing to the amenity of the district, are exempt.
5. Land used for games and recreations beneficial to the public or the inhabitants of the locality are exempt; provided that the agreement originally made to keep these lands for games is for not less than five years.

Thus:— A garden suburb is directly encouraged by the exemption of its gardens and open spaces from the tax. All the cricket and football grounds round London and the cities are exempt wherever the owner has given or will give five years' security. An owner of a park will be exempt if, as many owners do to-day, he will throw that park open to the public upon reasonable conditions "to let the people breathe." An owner of a park will not be exempt if the public are sedulously excluded.

The Temple Gardens, with the children of the crowded streets in Soho playing there every afternoon, will receive reward of such generous benefaction in exemption from the duty. Similar gardens which the public are only allowed to survey from the top of a motor 'bus or from the outside of high locked gates will not be exempt.

Few taxes have ever been devised which combine so happily the work of the collection of revenue with the introduction of automatic pressure for the increase of public amenity.

Reversion Tax.

This in principle is the simplest of all the taxes. An owner lets land on a building lease for a period longer than twenty-one years. The selling value of the land and buildings which are to return to him at the end is calculated at the termination of the lease. From this is deducted the capitalised value of the consideration for the original grant of the lease. The difference represents unearned increment—the value of buildings not erected by the ground landlord, and increase in site value for which the ground landlord is not responsible. One-tenth of such increase is taken by the State and equally divided between the local and national exchequers. This tax is retrospective; i.e., part of the past increment is taken on any lease ending after April 30th, 1909. But in order to provide for cases where these reversions have been bought for almost their full present value by those who did not anticipate this tax, no levy will be made on reversions purchased within the past thirty years.

Conclusions.

Such, in outline, are the proposed taxes on the unearned increment of land. They are necessarily complicated in dealing with the land system of an old, settled, and complex civilisation. But that system will not get less complicated with time, and it is better to face these complications to-day rather than to-morrow. They are following out a broad principle already acknowledged in most civilised communities—in America, in Germany, in New Zealand, in Australia. That principle is that some proportion of the value which is heaped upon land, due to its monopoly rights and limitation of quantity, and which is altogether independent of the owner's industry and exertion, may rightly be invited to contribute a share to necessary public expenditure.

In the present proposals this broad principle is adjusted to meet every possible hardship due to the sudden imposition of a tax.

1. The money is only demanded by the State when it is actually in the hands of the owner or can be realised by him in sale. And the money demanded is strictly proportional to the amount thus realised or realisable.
2. Elaborate provisions are devised for protecting from the taxes all that value in the land which can be interpreted as "earned" by the owner.
3. Rebates and exemptions provide that at the time of commencement of the tax those who have lost money or who had purchased land recently without expectation of the tax, shall not be mulcted on recovery, or lose by a transaction made in genuine ignorance of coming changes in taxation.
4. Land contributing to general welfare as playgrounds, parks, and open spaces receives generous treatment, and public charities and philanthropies are recognised as requiring particular exemptions.

The Land Taxes are not (as is wildly asserted) the carrying out of the doctrine of Henry George. They realise the teaching of practically the unanimous body of political economists, from Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill (with his doctrine of "increment") to Professor Marshall (with his doctrine of "public values"). So far from being premature, they have been long overdue. They are welcomed in this country by all but the representatives of that landlord interest who, here and elsewhere, are demanding that taxes shall be laid on industry and commerce, or on the necessities of the life of the people, rather than on the unearned increase which the labor of the community has heaped on the value of land.

Life and Letters.

"THE ALARM OF MOTHERHOOD."

The worst injury inflicted by a wrong is that it disposes the sufferer to seek wrong remedies. The history of revolt is full of examples, and certain extremities of the woman's movement afford a recent illustration. The passionate reaction against masculine repression, and the denial of fair opportunities for individual development, have led a certain section of feminists to a repudiation and disparagement of maternal and domestic life. No one familiar with the utterances of these extreme advocates can fail to recognise that their main object is to reduce to a minimum the claims of maternity as regards the rearing and education of children, and, by entrusting to outside specialism almost the whole of what are known as domestic duties, to secure for women, married or unmarried, the liberty to take an equal part with men in every form of external activity. The fullest avowal of this policy, expressed in the writings of so outspoken a champion as Mrs. Gilman, would virtually reduce the sexual contribution of woman to the single and rare act of bearing a child, which should at once be removed from her unskilled and amateur care, and passed through various processes of nurture and education carried on by skilled specialists. Against the excessive and perverse rationalism of such appeals the mere instinct of conservatism is impotent. But we are glad to recognise inside the ranks of feminism itself a growing voice of protest. The rising study of Eugenics may restore a salutary order to the march of feminism, by the stress it lays upon the peculiar and dominating contribution to Nature's work which she requires from women.

Without acceding to the extreme demands which Dr. Saleeby makes for Eugenics as the science of human progress, in his new book, "Parenthood and Race Culture" (Cassell & Co.), we strongly favor the powerful plea which it contains for a sane interpretation of maternity. He holds, as most Eugenists do, that the greatest perils in modern civilisation are due to the refusal to face the necessity of replacing the crude and cruel forms of natural selection by rational selection, working by law or intelligent opinion. Though wide differences exist as to the possibility of applying directly Eugenic tests of parentage, thoughtful men and women are coming to an earnest agreement as to the importance of discouraging manifestly unfit unions, and, if possible, encouraging marriage and parentage of the highest types. No sophistical quibbling about standards of fitness can shake the urgency of this social policy. Now the Eugenist rightly insists that in this supreme reform woman is destined to play a more important part than man, and that the chief and avowed aim of true feminism should be to secure the best possible conditions for maternity and for the home as the nursery of racial progress. Though certain Eugenists, unduly weighted by biology, have imparted an air of mere animalism to their proposals, Dr. Saleeby liberates his art from such an imputation. He insists on the spiritual significance and values which belong to good parentage and the education of a happily-ordered home. Needless to say, these demands of Eugenics are not opposed to the truly liberative movement. Eugenics implies, and, indeed, demands, for women a freedom of choice for marriage involving important changes in their economic and social condition. Economic independence is essential in order that there may be no forced motherhood, and that the children of the next generation may be the fruit of unions to which both parties are drawn by natural affinity, not unions motived, to a large extent, by economic necessity. But such freedom involves for women an alternative mode of life and livelihood. Thus it requires for them the fullest educational and social opportunities to enter every sphere of industrial and professional work for which they can equip themselves. History teaches us that this full industrial equality is not obtainable for any race, class, or sex deprived of equal political and civil rights. Thus the claims of Eugenics but strongly reinforce all the rational claims of the emancipation movement.

At the same time it is important clearly to recognise the limitations set by Eugenics upon the extreme interpretation of women's rights. This doctrine looks to an ideal of society in which sex duties are reduced to a negligible quantity, and men and women in equal numbers are to compete and co-operate in every sort of productive activity under identical conditions. Assigning, as he does, a more central place to woman than to man, both in parentage itself and in the arts of an ideal home, the Eugenist recognises that important differences in methods of education and of industry must follow this sex specialisation. The refusal of many feminists to recognise this truth is seen in their persistent opposition to the legal limitations which every civilised State sets upon certain conditions of women's industry. This is not sex oppression, as masculine monopoly of legislation inclines them to pretend, but merely a safeguarding of maternity. So also, in the sphere of education, if it be true that the strain of severe intellectualism involves heavier risks to women than to men, Eugenics will defend a similar sex discrimination, which will be no offence against equality, but a defence of the great creative work of woman in the world. It is interesting to find that advanced women themselves are coming to face clearly this at first unpalatable truth. So the Swedish feminist, Miss Ellen Key, in her now translated work, "The Century of the Child" (Putnam), boldly states and defends the proposition that women must admit that the larger part which nature gives them in the work of racial progress implies some sacrifice of individual development in education and the intellectual life. The half perception of this opposition between the affirmation of the individual self and the perpetuation and progress of the race is, according to this writer, responsible for a growing "alarm of motherhood"—"a fear which to-day has taken possession of so many strenuous and creative women." "It is as if a secret voice in the depths of their nature was telling these women that, by paying their tribute to their sex, they would lose that power, brilliancy, and sharpness of intellect by which they have elevated themselves above their sex."

This insistence that the creative power of woman must ever be so largely absorbed in maternity and its related duties as to preclude the likelihood of women competing successfully with the larger reserves of masculine creative energy in the arts and sciences or in most skilled industries, will not, perhaps, be easily accepted by women filled with the fierce spirit of that individual self-assertion which has been over-emphasised by recent Western civilisation. But may we not trust Nature herself in the last resort to administer the necessary corrective to that crude individualism? Of this, indeed, sexual selection will itself take care, by securing that those types of women who feel her deeper and more sacred charge shall prevail, and so moulding the type of future motherhood, and securing the well-being and the progress of the race.

"DAMNABLE ITERATION."

He who has heard the ochingufu will comprehend the methods of a political scare. For the ochingufu of Central Africa is a drum hewn out of a solid block of wood, four foot high by three foot long, and shaped like a half-open carpet bag. To its repeated throb, dark and naked tribes are now dancing all night long beneath the moon. They stamp the earth with horny feet, they clap their hands in rhythm, now and again they raise their voices in a savage and monotonous chant. But all the while the hollow drum continues its throbbing note, blow succeeding blow, and drummer succeeding drummer, from hour to hour, without pause or break; and with each hour the souls of the dancers become more exhilarated, and their enthusiasm more akin to demoniacal possession. They writhe their backbones like snakes, they leap into the air, they utter frantic yells. Sober morning finds them prostrate with ecstasy.

As in our demoniacal panics at home, it is repetition that does it. There is no emotion in a single blow upon a drum, but let a hundred be struck, and the heart begins to vibrate in unison. Let drummer succeed drummer, let "statesman" follow "statesman" in foreboding peace, let newspaper follow newspaper in prophesying invasion, and the blood mounts, the brain is distorted from reason, the whole nature becomes possessed. All because to one sound the same sound succeeds at quick and regular intervals! If drum-taps sounded only once an hour, or papers appeared only once a month, or statesmen spoke only once a year ,no matter how monotonous their utterances, where would be the pleasure, where the intoxication of the soul? It is only repetition that does it. In journalism it is an old rule that in every leading article you ought to say the same thing three times. Let us assume that twenty newspapers utter the same note of panic every morning in England, each three times, and each with an average circulation of 200,000. We have the same note repeated twelve million times throughout the country every morning often for a week together, and even the Central African night does not vibrate to so many beats of the ochingufu as that—not by several millions.

"What I tell you three times is true," said the Bellman, and think of the amount of truth he could have impressed upon the country if he had told it twelve million times! No wonder people tremble in their beds and hate the Germans. "Wolf! wolf!" cried the little boy, and after running a time or two for hatchets, neighbors heeded him no more. But if only he had gone on crying "wolf!" to this day, we should be throwing babies out of windows to the ravening herds of our imagination. For repetition induces a kind of hypnotism, credulous of the lie, and many courtiers besides himself believed that George IV. had fought at Waterloo.

Similarly in art, it is not only the drum that beats a music out by a recurrent "da capo." Men have been elevated by the clang of a churchgoing bell, and of all the bugle calls there is none, except the cease-fire, so brief in repetition as the charge. Some take a pleasure in the repeated crash and gulp of waves, and musicians will watch for a returning phrase in opera as cats for mice. The beat of hoofs upon a frosty road is cheerful as the morning, the bumping of the locomotive sings a tune, and the blacksmith who lies buried at Little Stanmore was not more harmonious than all who strike the anvil. At the sound of repeated strokes on wires or skins we feel the Walkyrie riding down the ranks of doom, and the father gallops late through storm and wind, though Walkyrie never lived and the Erlkönig is a legend. Consider the power of the chorus in songs, how one race will maunder through a winter's night over "Auld Lang Syne," and to another it seems the height of bliss to repeat "John Peel" for hours together though they have never seen a hound, and to a third the Government forbade the singing of "Tarara" on account of the ecstatic frenzy it aroused. Hear how our own citizens love to sing a hundred times, "I'm afraid to go home in the dark," though they have never seen the dark or felt afraid of going home, when sober.

In the days of libraries our fathers delighted in a repetition of the same calf binding, and their volumes stood along the shelves like regiments dressed by the right. In the days of worship the repetition of Doric column and round or pointed arch inspired a sense of beauty or religious awe. When, even in our time, the dons restore their college, they surround the quadrangle with an unvarying battlement, though they have no desire to shoot at the undergraduates from behind it. But in architecture, as in lectures, they know the value of repetition; and so do children when from their buckets they turn out their long rows of moulded sand, and so did the builders of Bloomsbury when they turned out their long rows of bricks. Even in repeated action men find unwearied delight: the Dervish spins, the reader of the Koran sways, the Russian peasant prostrates himself incessantly, the oarsman performs the same rhythmic movements over a four-mile course, the child whom you toss to the ceiling implores you to do it again for ever, and lovers shake hands more than once.

In language the power of repetition and refrain is well known, and the Psalmist did not think it too much to repeat "His mercy endureth for ever" twenty-seven times in a hymn of twenty-seven verses. "Hear Thou in heaven thy dwelling place" was repeated by Solomon in his dedication of the temple with ever-increasing dignity, and the words of the Preacher, that "this also is vanity and vexation of spirit" recur like the sighing of mankind. "And I only am escaped alone to tell thee," cried each messenger of disaster to Job in turn, and the poet knew well that the repetition of the words redoubled the successive blows. Congregations of miserable sinners may weary of kneeling through the Litany, but saints tell us that its repetitions touch the depths of prayer. "Raise the cry, the cry of woe, but let the good prevail," said the priest once and again in the "Agamemnon" chorus, and by the repetition the poet sounds the foreboding of doom. "O charms, bring Daphnis from the city home," the Sicilian girl chanted at each weary minute of the night, and Sister Helen's recurrent burden multiplies the mystery and horror of her waxen man. There was a time when the repeated insertion of some such line as "Red rose leaves in the wan water" sufficed to give a medieval beauty to a ballad, and both Wordsworth and the maker of the "Dowie Houms" were sore put to it to secure the sorrowful repetition of Yarrow's sound. The exquisite effect of Rose Aylmer's beautiful names repeated in two successive lines has ensured for her an immortality of forty words. What perfection of sincerity in art lies in Cowper's repetition:

> "Partakers of thy sad decline,
> Thy hands their little force resign;
> Yet, gently pressed, press gently mine,
> My Mary!"

And when Milton writes:—

> "Though fall'n on evil days,
> On evil days though fall'n, and evil tongues," it is almost comforting to escape from that proud sorrow to the criticism of culture's devotee who remarked to his lecturer, "I think that is the first time we have found Milton committing the error of repeating himself."

Children love to hear the same tale a score of times, and if a word is altered they insist on the correction. "I am a lost dog," repeated without further words by Mr. Galsworthy's beggar, secures more pity than all the investigations of the Charity Organisation Society into a most deserving case. Generations of our youth have derived an inexplicable pleasure from repeating words of no apparent meaning, such as, "Wo, Emma!" "Now we shan't be long!" "There's 'air!" "Won't you go home, Bill Bailie?" "What ho! she bumps!" and, at this present moment, "Are you well?" with a break in the voice like a milkman's or a Tyrolese peasant's. It is strange, and all the stranger because on the other side we are brought face to face with the Greek philosopher's downright assertion that "Twice is impossible." All artists know it to be true; they can never do anything twice. Driven by their own reputation and by the common belief that a man who has done one thing well should go on doing it for ever, they may try the same theme a hundred time but never recapture the splendor of that first fine venture. The curse that broods over a good teacher is that he can never teach the same lesson twice, and if it comes to sermons, the very sexton sleeps at the second time of preaching, though he may not remember a single sentence of the first.

Twice is impossible. The repetition of a lap-dog's yap, of a kitten's mew, a baby's yell, or a drawing-room song seldom redoubles our joy. Love music as we may, the fourth time that the man next door turns on the Moonlight Sonata upon his pianola, we are fit to wring his neck. Regularity in meals is all very well, but go to the same restaurant day after day, and you sicken like a sheep stale on its pasture. Fashion is a fickle jade, but dress a girl always the same and her soul turns drab as an industrial school. Children may like an old, old story, but a tale that is told is a proverb of tedium; if anyone now begins upon the cabman and the chauffeur, we flee, and many dining tables should be made of another kind of wood than mahogany. "Let the sun rise twice," said the poet, "and no one looks at him again." Philosophers talk of the uniformity of nature, as though she were a dowdy woman; but we know that she abhors repetition as much as a vacuum. No two leaves of her innumerable forests are the same, and among her innumerable sinners she distinguishes each by the marking of his thumb. It is abhorrence of repetition that makes artists turn away from machine-made goods, as all of us turn away from machine-made men, and, if we listen to lovers, undying love itself is never the same two hours together, nor can it repeat a second of its life.

Somehow, then, we are landed in a queer contradiction. We know the powers of repetition, and the beauty of habit; we know that nearly all mankind ask only for what they know already. And yet we are confronted with man's abhorrence of doing or hearing or seeing the same thing twice, and all our theories of repetition are cut across by the spirit that can do nothing a second time, that slits the threads of custom, and at the corners of all our streets is now uttering the vulgar cry, "If I hear that again, I'll shriek!" If the philosophers have found us no solution in human nature to so obvious a contradiction, it is not the only occasion on which they have failed to explain the soul.

---

BUTTERFLIES.

THE ordinary person is not disposed to take the butterfly seriously. We do not even take the trouble to keep its name pure, for one day no doubt it was boffle or baffle or bother fly, a flyer that seems to have no definite aim, but is blown hither and thither, much as a dead leaf is baffled by the wind. If that is the origin of the name, it is so thoroughly lost that now no dictionary even mentions it. So much does the insect resemble a caterpillar with wings that the ancients decided that first came the butterfly, which then shed its wings and became a caterpillar. The ancients made ludicrous mistakes about other creatures, but none quite so contemptuous as this.

There are, we know, butterflies with character—peacocks that will come again and again to the flower we would drive them from, emperors that guard the upper regions of air like eagles, Camberwell beauties that wrestle on high like gladiators, and sweep from point to point without a superfluous wing-stroke. But they always astonish us as abnormalities. They do not suffice to alter our opinion of the average butterfly as a senseless, meandering, scarcely self-conscious thing.

The painted butterfly! Far less often do we speak of the painted bird. The butterfly, we imagine, is thought to have "just growed" painted, as Topsy falsely alleged was the fact concerning herself. He is a bold man who will maintain that the beauty of the butterfly is the result of infinite selection on the part of the wooers and the wooed. On the other hand, except in a few, though well-known, instances their gaudy colors cannot be attributed to natural selection, because they are not founded on utility. Natural selection has determined the shape and color of many remarkably inconspicuous caterpillars, and has taught the butterfly to keep its bright colors on one side of the wing, its neutral tints and leaf-like markings on the other. But has it made some butterflies bright blue, some yellow, some coppery red, some white, others black, and many brilliantly chequered?

A caterpillar common on stinging nettles just now is an indistinct mottle of yellowish brown and black, and is covered with make-believe prickles almost as deterrent as the stings of its food-plant. In a week, it will throw off its prickly armour and become a soft green, legless creature, no longer with the constitution of a caterpillar, every particle and atom, as well as every cell, in a state of flux resembling annihilation. Then the material of the disintegrated caterpillar re-crystalises into a radically different being—no grub, but a flying rainbow, every grain of murky color changed for a radiant jewel, the soft trash of the skinned caterpillar moulded into new and more wonderful hairs, armour, a coiled trunk that is a marvel of construction, two great eyes, each composed of thousands of facets.

We all change, of course. Every cell in the human body will have been changed for another cell within a certain number of years. But that is nothing comparable with the changing of every cell simultaneously into something as widely different as the mandible of a caterpillar and the proboscis of a butterfly. Memory, as we conceive it, would be powerless to bridge such a revolution as that. Has the butterfly, then, forgotten that it was ever a caterpillar? Of course. Then how is it that, having sated its new-found appetite for nectar, the most delicate product of nature's alchemy, it repairs to the nectarless, repellant nettle, and there lays the eggs that shall become other caterpillars of its kind? And how, if it happens to be of so slightly varied a coloring that none but a trained naturalist can formulate the difference, it takes its eggs not to the nettle but to the elm?

These and other biological problems are too heavy for the hot summer days when the butterflies are gambolling. In the wood the fritillaries tower upward, gyrating till three of them seem to be certainly four, while four fill the whole sky with revolving pearl and amber. On the hillside, where blue-and-purple viper's bugloss is beginning to blossom, still bluer and still more purple butterflies open and tumble, then close and become triangles of silver exquisitely pencilled with tiny circles in many quiet colors. The meadow browns display rosy cheeks on their wings, with sparkling eyes set therein that we can never persuade ourselves cannot see us as we creep up to them. How many butterflies there are in our short British list whose color has run to eyes. The peacock that has them in the same brilliant design as the bird, his namesake, is perhaps the most remarkable, while his congeners, the tortoiseshells, the red admiral, and others, seem to have been interrupted when they had no more than sketched out the same adornment. Then the wood argus, the wall, the large and small heaths, the yellows, the whites, the swallow-tail, some more and some less, are also marked with sham eyes. Perhaps this is the one useful marking that natural selection has fixed upon in the case of the butterflies. Nothing is more disconcerting to a bird, for example, than to see an eye suddenly glaring from an unexpected place. The boldest bird hesitates long before it will go to its nest under the stare of a photographic lens. Possibly the same bird would flee in dismay should a contemplated morsel open two shining eyes, even at the corners of its wings. One or two of the moths have eyes also, but usually, like the eyed hawk, on the hind wings. Defenceless caterpillardom may sometimes be saved by the same device. Our favorite of all these grubs is that of the puss moth, and we think that nothing in its triple armoury of terrifying appearance is so powerful as the two spots above its red-bordered face, that look just like very malignant eyes.

Their threat of unknown, unlimited hurt is well given in the painting of the species in Miss Janet Harvey Kelman's "Butterflies and Moths Shown to the Children," just issued by Messrs. Jack. We have seen very respectable rings of rustics and people of greater book learning drawn round a puss moth caterpillar that may have fallen in autumn from some poplar tree. The adventurous stranger who takes it up drops it hurriedly when it turns those sightless eyes towards him and shoots out from its twin tails long red threads that might hold all the poison of snakedom.

But the butterfly is entirely delightful. It has no need of safety other than its wings. The "eye" of a meadow brown has no terrors, at any rate for the child, and causes no anxiety but lest it should see the captor approaching and convey the prize out of reach. The chase of the butterfly is a rural pursuit that never palls, though its excitements are far outdone when some forlorn cabbage white strays from Covent Garden market into the dim courts of Drury Lane. Then is every small bonnet doffed, thin legs are agitated, feeble lungs raise the view halloo, and the hunt goes streaming down the street headed by the flapping, bothering fly that, seeming to be quite unaware of its danger, yet manages to top some wall just before the leading huntsman would grab it.

The white butterfly is usually one's first prize. Those that are colored imaginative youth calls "French." It is long before we discover that both white and colored are of several sorts. We have said that the pursuit of the butterfly never palls. As the schoolboy grows up he learns other methods of bringing down the same quarry. A chip-box is as good as a butterfly net on a dull day. Chrysalids can be picked up that will yield perfect specimens of uncatchable insects. The breeding from caterpillars unravels, or rather reveals, some of the mysteries of butterfly life. But, last as well as first, the ideal way of coming by a rare and coveted specimen is to run it down in fair chase. We say it who have experienced it. But now we prefer to watch the towering fritillaries and wonder whether they are really three or four.

---

Short Studies.

SHAUN.

I.

A YOUNG crow perched on a branch outside, barked insistently into a human habitation. Perhaps the internal conditions aroused the young crow's indignation. There were damp places on the floor, where the rain came through the thatch; in one corner there was a bed with a ragged, miscellaneous covering. The room was filled with smoke, and the occupant was eating his breakfast off the top of a chest. He was seated on a box. After a while the articulation of the crow took his interest, and he turned on the bird an eye that was remarkably like its own—a small, blue, penetrating eye. He finished his breakfast, put a cap on, and for a while surveyed the world from his doorway.

Before him were the lifeless grazing tracks of the County Meath. Formerly there had been a garden before the house, and a cherry tree still growing showed that the place had once its grace and its cultivation. But the garden had gone back to the wild, and the house was an unsightly ruin. The man at the door was short of figure, and ragged of garb. His gaze was restless, and his quick, ever-moving glances reminded one of the looks of nature's smaller creatures, the rabbits and the squirrels. The man's mind also had gone back from discipline. He looked rather ruffianly, but there was humor in his face, quick judgment, and some practical wisdom. His face was of a type seen often in the County Cavan. The cheek-bones were high, and the forehead projected. The type shows a strong imagination, joined to an active and sanguine temperament.

The tumble-down house was solitary. Once the district was inhabited, but the place had been cleared of men and women, and had been given over to store-cattle. The man at the door was a survival. He was known by the name of Shaun, and he had employment on one of the grazing ranches. Shaun closed the door, and went off on the day's mission. Near his path a shoot of briar raised itself in the air. It was fresh, slender, and green. Shaun regarded it, and spoke out of his constant meditation. "The young girl is like the shoot of the briar," he said. "For a while she's free and lightsome, and in another while she's without freshness and near enough to the ground." He picked up his stick and rambled away.

II.

He worked to strengthen a fence, and then he brought a crowd of young cattle into a far pasture. Steadily they went through the grass while the pageant of sun, cloud, and shadow crossed the fields. Shaun lay on the ground and gave his mind to a familiar romance.

Far away there was a rocky rise with some structure upon it. The legend of the place was part of Shaun's dream. The walls were raised for the pleasure of a woman. A man had sworn that his bride would have a turret out of which she could watch the ships on the seas of Ireland. The ravens built in the tower now, but Shaun did not moralise on this. His delight was the splendor and success of Farnie's career. No woman who kissed his mouth could ever take the kiss of another man. Farnie was born without an estate, but he had the spirit and the manner of the noble. He could win any woman, for he had "a diplume for coorting." First there came to him a woman who had two-score town-lands. Then Farnie had blood horses under him, and hounds to follow and his own lands to ride across. The wife who had brought him the riches died, but Farnie was not left long to himself. A woman took his fancy and she had Cromwell's spoils for her dower. Her brother would shut Farnie out, but he brought his horse under her window at night and the woman came down to him and they rode away together. And he got five-score town-lands with this woman. Now Farnie had seven-score town-lands, and all that he willed he could do, and all that he longed for he could possess. This second woman died, and Farnie's fancy was taken by a girl. She had no riches, but she had a beauty like the beauty that went out of Ireland when the foreigners came in. It was for her delight that Farnie built the castle with the tower above. He mixed the mortar with bullock's blood and new milk, so that the walls might stand for ever. But the woman never climbed the stair, and the couple never slept inside the walls.

III.

The cattle grazed in the direction of the slope of Tara. He knew it was connected with the royalty of his country, but the place brought no romance to Shaun's mind. His master's cattle might feed within the ridges that marked the Banqueting House of the King, and Shaun would not remember that here the chiefs of the Fianna and the nobles of the Royal House feasted to the espousals of Grania, the King's daughter, with Fionn, the great captain. Grania drugged the ale, and while the elders slept she offered herself as a wife to each of the young men who were most spoken of—to Oscar, to Cavilte, and at last to the most expert and the most handsome, Dermott O'Duibhne. They went away together, and for long the wild and waste places of Ireland hid them from the wrath of Fionn. And the ground might hold the memory of another love story. A King of Ireland, riding through the wood, found a woman who had forgotten her state, but who was of the Immortal People. He made her his bride and his queen, and they lived happily until a stranger played a game of chess with the King, and claimed the Queen as the spoil of the game. Afterwards the stranger stood before the Queen, and reminded her of the beauty and delight of their own country, and he drew her away.

IV.

Over the fields was the sadness of the vanishing light. Shaun stole away from the farmhouse where he had his meal. He liked to draw away from the silence and the shadow. He took the road to the town, his soul lonely for some colored and wonderful experience. Near the town he encountered part of a returning hunt. He saw a few silent people on horseback, and then he was surrounded by a silent-footed pack. He shrank from the dogs, and the silent, stealthy forms slipping through the evening gave him the impression of some terror.

Outside the town there were men in groups, and Shaun went and stood amongst them. When he was in the town before he caught sight of a beauty, and he felt that the men might have some tidings of her. But they were unenlightened. After a while one of them produced a pack of cards, and they began to play. In order to preserve his secret, Shaun watched the game. When it was finished he went to the chapel.

There were few people in the chapel, and the candles on the altar were not yet lighted. He remained near the door, and kept his eyes on the organ loft. Last Sunday he heard a voice singing up there, and he saw a face and figure between the lighted candles. There was a young girl there with hair brighter and softer than the flame of the candles.

The rosary began and went on to the Litany, but there was no music to-night. The candles on the altar were quenched, and the people began to leave. The tolling of the bell made Shaun restless. He went out into the street. He shifted through the town, shy and curious. He watched a red-coated soldier go into a house where there was a dance, and then he waited to speak with a ballad-singer, who had "The Lament for Hugh Reynolds."

"By the loving of a maid,
One Catherine McCabe,
My life it was betrayed; she's a dear maid to me.

"And now my glass is run,
And my hour it is come,
And I must die for love and the height of loyalty.
I thought it was no harm
To embrace her in my arms,
And take her from her parents; she's a dear maid to me."

He was being drawn to a place of friendliness, but for a long time the wild shyness of his nature kept him abroad. At last he found himself at the place; a trim house at the outskirts of the town. Within, someone was playing on the violin. Shaun waited, and when the music stopped he knocked at the door. The door was opened readily, as though a visitor were expected, and Miss Nora Kavanagh, the friendly personage to whom Shaun was drawn, stood there. Nora was surprised to see the odd little figure, but she said, "Shaun, come in." She was not one of Shaun's admirations, but her friendly spirit made him devoted to her. He wanted to meet with some friendliness to-night, but he had to say, "Miss Nora, I'm ashamed to go into your nice house." "You must come in, Shaun," she said, "I'm expecting someone else, but there's no one with me yet." She brought him into the parlour and made him sit down. Nora was neat and precise, rather like one of the friendly, witty nuns one often meets in an Irish convent. She was friends with the strange creatures about the place; their sayings and doings were, for her, life's comedy.

"I found a plant with a grand flower to it," said Shaun, "and I'd have brought it to you only I thought you'd like to see it growing." His gaze roved about the room. He saw the violin that Nora had left down, and he brought his eyes to her face. "I'll bring it to you, root and all," he said, "and maybe you'll play a tune for me." She took up the violin and began to play. The music brought back the loneliness of the empty fields. There was no stir in the music at all. Yes, somebody was playing for a dance. No one could dance to that; the music was calling people out of the rath. They came out of the darkness mounted on fine horses, the Fairy Riders, and she was amongst them, the girl of the chapel. Her face was pale like a star in a lake, and her beautiful hair swept about her. The tune ended suddenly; a quick knock came to the door, and Nora went outside. Shaun, as it were, gathered himself in from the wide, silent fields.

Nora brought her companion in. She was the girl of the vision, and Shaun only recovered his sense of actuality when she turned away. She was different from the full-blown beauties that Farnie had gathered. Maybe Farnie's lost love was like her, a slender girl with the life in her face. The girl leaned forward in her chair and regarded the dreamer with friendly interest. He became shy and uneasy, because he saw himself an unkempt creature. He rose up and sidled to the door. He refused to eat, and Nora knew that he would not be pressed. "I saw you before, miss," he said to Maureen, as he was going. "I saw you before," he said, "but you were always far away." She came back to the room with Nora, feeling somehow lonely after the little creature. He went along the darkened side of the road in a state that was half satisfaction, half bewilderment. Woman had ceased to be the abstract creature, the ornament of the story, the spoil of the strong hand. Between himself and the beautiful growing girl he felt the hundred ties of race. He was the clansman who drove the swine into the woods, and she was the daughter of a prince, but still they were related, and her beauty was part of his dream and his glory.

V.

He heard the music as he crossed the fields, and then a voice that called "Shaun, Shaun!" He was under an enchantment, and the fields showed no mark nor boundary. Then a sudden wind rustled in the grass. Shaun crouched down, and a company of riders drew towards him. The heads of the riders were bare, and there was a thin band of gold across their brows. The one who rode in front had the green mantle of a King. A rider turned his face to Shaun and cried out in a clear voice: "He has seen her, the man in the grass has seen her." But the clear voice that Shaun heard did not arouse the other. With bowed head the King rode on. He took up a handful of grass and threw it across his shoulder. Then he saw the landmarks, and the way through the night to his house. Shaun crossed the silent field.

PADRAIC COLUM.

The Drama.

TWO PROBLEM PLAYS.

THE custom of giving plays an alternative second title has long fallen into disuse; else might Mr. Hugh de Sélincourt have aptly supplemented the name he has chosen for his very clever comedy, produced last Monday at the Court Theatre. He might have called it

"Loyalty: or, News from Nowhere." The second title, to be sure, has been used by William Morris for a Utopian romance; but that is just where its appropriateness would come in. It would somewhat break the shock of surprise with which the audience learns in the third act that the scene of the play, nominally London and its environs, is in reality a young man's Utopia. Morris's Utopia was that of a middle-aged man, who therefore recognised that even in an otherwise beautiful, and just, and rational world, there would still remain "the pangs of despised love," and perhaps an occasional crime of passion. Of course, we must not deduce from Mr. de Sélincourt's one example that he thinks all affairs of the heart without exception would straighten themselves out if people would only get over certain wholly unreasonable prejudices; but if his play means anything it means that a very large class of painful, if not tragic, complications of sentiment are in reality much ado about nothing. He goes one better than Mr. Hamilton Fyfe, whose "Modern Aspasia" was a plea for polygamy: Mr. de Sélincourt's plea is for polyandry. In Mr. Fyfe's play, moreover, the official wife had never been a real wife; whereas in Mr. de Sélincourt's play the husband who is henceforth (at his own suggestion) to be an official husband only, has been a real husband, to whom his wife has borne a child. The audience gasped with astonishment when it realised what was to be the solution of this "light domestic comedy." The sudden plunge into Utopia took its breath away. But it presently realised that it was all "news from nowhere," and laughed, not unkindly, at the ingenuous idealism of a young man sowing his literary wild oats.

Julius Verity is a man of fifty who has married a girl of half his age, fresh from Somerville and "Greats." When the play opens, Sarah is deeply attached to her husband and to her four-year-old child; but she is in the habit of picking strawberries of a morning with her husband's godson and secretary, Stephen Mann, a youth two years her junior, who talks and writes poetry to her. All is very happy and idyllic, until the intervention of a meddlesome woman of the world causes the young people to look into their own hearts, and find there—love. What are they to do? If Stephen goes away they will both be limitlessly wretched; and besides, his prospects in life depend on Mr. Verity. Sarah suggests that they should simply go on as before, on a footing of intimate comradeship; but Stephen replies, rather finely, that she might as well say to a blind man suddenly endowed with sight, "My friend, go on as if nothing had happened." They are too loyal to drift into a clandestine intrigue; and even if pecuniary conditions enabled them to run away together, the prospect has small attraction for Sarah, who clearly realises that her love for Stephen does not prevent her from loving her husband as well. "I suppose," she says, "that anything so simple as that the world calls subtle!" Stephen, on his part, is equally exasperated at the world's stupidity. "Oh," he cries, "if men were more like Prometheus, and did not cringe before opinion!" At last Sarah sees that, come what may, there is nothing for it but to tell Mr. Verity the whole truth. He takes the revelation without turning a hair, and—in a scene that strongly recalls "Divorçons!" though its issue is so different—he enrages her by ironically discussing the inconveniences of divorce and the improbability of his leaving her a widow within any reasonable time. At last, however, she understands, with an amazement only surpassed by that of the audience, that while he neither proposes to divorce her nor to hasten his arrangements for dying, he is quite sincerely adopting the "Bless you, my children" attitude, and resigning her in fact, though not in name, to his younger rival. She sends for Stephen, who has been in a paroxysm of anxiety in the next room, and, pointing to the sage and benign Verity, says, "Here is your Prometheus!" Our rude forefathers would have used another term.

There is a charming candor in the conception of this play, and a great deal of ability, not unmixed with pedantry, in the writing. But Mr. de Sélincourt must forgive me if I anticipate the smile with which he will one day look back upon it in reviewing his "œuvres de jeunesse." For it is not only "News from Nowhere," but news of very doubtful authenticity. The world will never be so sage and benign as Mr. Julius Verity; nor is it desirable that it should. Observe that, no more than "A Modern Aspasia," is "Loyalty" a plea for a humaner and more rational law of divorce. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Verity seriously complains of the King's Proctor or the other obstacles in the way of the quiet cancelling of their marriage contract. They do not want to divorce: that is the Promethean element in their case. What Julius proposes, and Sarah joyfully accepts, is a matrimonium in matrimonio, to be facilitated, if I understood aright, by arrangements for a more or less separate residence. So long as there is any legal bond between man and woman, and so long as the idea of the family retains any hold upon the minds of men, Mr. de Sélincourt's solution of this imbroglio will be no solution at all, either here or in Utopia. Of course, a Utopia may be imagined in which the idea of the family is exploded; but there the imbroglio would scarcely arise. As for the notion that, in this English environment of ours, the Verity solution is in any way consonant with common sense and human nature—on that point let Mr. de Sélincourt consult his own Lady Maxwell-Clark. She would tell him (in more rotund language) that when you have got over your own prejudices you have still to encounter those of the surrounding world, which are merely inflamed by any openly Promethean doings. She would hint that the trio, or rather quartette (for young Master Verity must not be forgotten) had better retire to a desert island, and there Prometheanise at leisure. So long as the world remains what it is, it is impossible for any one, by a mere act of will, at once to stay in the tangle and to lift himself out of it.

The question whether a man has the right, by an act of will, to lift himself out of it once for all, is discussed in Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's "Modern Morality Play" at the Lyric Theatre. Less neatly, but quite as accurately, "The Fires of Fate" might have been described as a problem-melodrama. Assuredly it is a problem-play if ever there was one. It poses in good set form a question of conduct, and presents the answer in the shape of a special intervention of Providence—thus qualifying to be called a miracle-play as well. It is vigorous, interesting, picturesque, sincere, and well deserves the success which it is pretty sure to attain. The first act, in the doctor's consulting-room, is exceedingly well put together and well written. The third act, in which a picnic party in the Egyptian desert is attacked by dervishes, is quite the best scene of its kind I ever saw on the stage, presenting with ingenious and well-thought-out realism the probable incidents of such a situation. I shall undoubtedly incur the contempt of all my friends for praising a mere piece of popular drama like this. But I have never seen why, when a thing is excellent in its kind, one should be afraid to say so.

Colonel Cyril Egerton, D.S.O., having just learnt from Dr. James Roden that he is attacked by an obscure spinal complaint, and has, at most, some eighteen months to live, expresses his intention of anticipating the term, and thus avoiding the slow process of decay, painful alike to himself and to others. Dr. Roden has personally no fixed principles on the subject of suicide; but his brother, the Rev. Samuel Roden, who happens to be at hand, is very strong on the point, and appeals to the Colonel, if not as a Christian, at least as a soldier, not to turn tail and desert his post. The Rev. Samuel's discourse is, in fact, a paraphrase of that noble passage in Dryden's "Don Sebastian":—

> "Brutus and Cato might discharge their souls
> And give 'em furlough for another world;
> But we, like sentries, are obliged to stand
> In starless nights, and wait the appointed hour."

Had the gallant Colonel been a logician, he might have replied that if there is any "appointed hour," he will assuredly quit his post at that hour and at no other.

But he is not a logician; he is only a simple-minded soldier, endowed with that amalgam of bravery and cowardice which keeps most of us going so long as there is any go left in us. He accordingly promises the Padre to see what life may yet have in store for him, and, in the first place, to join the brothers Roden in a pleasure-trip up the Nile. What is, in fact, in store for him is a meeting with a beautiful American girl, an encounter with wild dervishes (the date is 1894), and a blow on the head which somehow counteracts the spinal mischief and restores him to health, life, and love. As this ending is clearly foreshadowed in the first act, where the doctor cites a case in which a railway accident cured a man attacked by the Colonel's disease, the intellectual interest cannot be said to be absorbing. A miracle is no argument, for a rational theory of conduct can only be based on the normal cases in which no miracle happens. From the point of view of pure reason, it would have been much better to assume that Dr. Roden's diagnosis was mistaken. Such cases are on record—indeed, they are a good deal commoner than cases of rescue by railway accident. But neither as a doctor nor as a dramatist could Sir Arthur Doyle be expected to enforce his moral thus tamely and ineffectively. Moreover, the merit of a dramatic argument of this sort lies not in demonstration, but in suggestion. The moral of "The Fires of Fate" is good, inasmuch as it bids the over-hasty suicide hold his hand, and remember the indubitable truth that things are seldom quite so black as they seem. In so far as the argument is sophistical it will do no harm, for utter misery will easily see through it; in so far as it is sound, it can only do good. By a tragic coincidence, on the very day (if I am not mistaken) when one playwright was stating the problem from the point of view of hope, another was solving it at the prompting of despair. Had St. John Hankin seen "The Fires of Fate," he would doubtless have despised it as a work of art; but who knows but that, in spite of himself, it might have disposed him to give life another chance? Would that it had been so!

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As I happened to be one of the deputation of clergy and laity who have just returned from visiting Germany, I should like to give the readers of THE NATION a few of the impressions which that visit has left upon my mind. In the first place I should like to say that, wherever we went, we were received with the utmost cordiality; that we were entertained both in public and private with a kind and generous hospitality, and that all sections of the German people, from the Kaiser downwards, treated us in the most friendly manner. When the visit came to an end, and we were able to compare notes with one another on board the steamer which brought us back to England, we were all of opinion that the kindness we had received during our stay in the German empire proceeded from a sincere spirit of friendliness and goodwill. The first town we visited on our arrival in Germany was the old city of Hamburg, which is connected with England by so many commercial and other associations. Here we were publicly entertained by the citizens, and the Burgermeister, Dr. Burchard, speaking in excellent English, assured us that he was expressing the sentiments of the German nation, of the Reichstag, and of the Emperor himself when he said that it was the sincere desire of all to live on the best of terms with England. Wherever we went afterwards, whether in public or in private, this assurance was repeated, and it was impossible to resist the conclusion that it was heartfelt and genuine.

While the Germans are evidently anxious to be friendly with England, one was able to gather that they regarded our foreign policy with a certain amount of suspicion. As one of them said to me, Russia and France are regarded in Germany with considerable dread. It is true that Russia for the moment is helpless and that France is just now the most pacific Power in Europe. But Russia with her vast population will ultimately recover, and France will never forget the loss of her two provinces. Germany may one day have to meet them on the field of battle, and she is afraid of the attitude of England, owing to our recent understandings with these two Powers. The Germans do not realise that these understandings of ours were made in the general interests of peace, and in no spirit of antagonism to Germany. Our statesmen have made public declarations to this effect, but the Germans are still suspicious, and it would be a step forward if we could convince them that they have nothing to fear from the growth of our good relations with other Powers. They are aware that they have the most exposed frontier in Europe. In the past they have suffered severely from invasion and foreign domination, and they are genuinely afraid of the formation of any combinations which would leave them isolated. A not uncommon feeling among them is that England has been trying to hem them in, and while they express great admiration for the King they think that he has been playing a principal part in this process. It is difficult to get them to understand the part which the King plays in our constitutional system: they attribute all his movements abroad to the highest motives of State, and I am afraid that certain sections of our own Press have accentuated this belief on the Continent.

As far as regards the increase of the German Fleet the feeling is practically universal that Germany must have a great navy. All sections of the German people appear to be at one upon this point, and we must be prepared to accept it as a fundamental part of German policy for the future. An inquiry as to the reasons for increasing the fleet always produced the reply that Germany must be in a position to protect her interests over the seas. Her population is growing at the rate of about a million a year, and the internal prosperity of Germany is becoming more and more dependent upon foreign trade. Every year Germany increases her commercial interests all over the world, and German citizens are to be found in every quarter of the globe. Germans feel that they need a powerful fleet to protect themselves and their interests wherever they may be and we must not look for any slackening of their efforts in this direction. As far as one can gather it is not their intention to have a fleet equal to our own. What they are aiming at is to have a fleet sufficiently powerful to enable them to have a voice in the decision of international questions all over the world. Many of them complain that when these questions have arisen outside Europe they have not been sufficiently consulted or not consulted at all. It is a mortification to them to feel that they are so powerful on the European continent and so comparatively powerless outside. But a world policy such as Germany now contemplates involves a vast expenditure and some Germans are beginning to say that the financial burden of a great army and a great fleet is a strain which the country will not ultimately consent to bear. All of them realise that a vast army is essential to their existence as a nation; they are in the position of having three fronts to defend; but a fleet is not essential to their existence, and it is probable that financial considerations will compel them to set a strict limit to their naval ambitions. The growth of these ambitions unfortunately has the effect of imposing fresh burdens upon us, and is undoubtedly a difficulty in the way of good relationships between the two countries.

As Professor Harnack said, we want a new political ethic in order to put the peace of the world upon an enduring foundation. It will take time, probably a long time, to create this higher order of ideas. But mutual intercourse of the friendly and intimate character which has taken place between the churches of England and Germany is bound to produce a good effect upon both nations and to create that foundation of mutual esteem and good will on which such an ethic may be based.—Yours, &c.,

W. D. MORRISON.

June 24th, 1909.

"TRIANGULAR" CRICKET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—So, if all goes well, we are to have "triangular cricket contests" in 1912. The South Africans alone should have come to England then, but they will be asked to forego the privilege, and to fight out a series of "test" matches in which Australia and England will be the other combatants. "If all goes well"—but is that quite the right phrase, after all? Of course, there is something to be said for Mr. Abe Bailey's "Imperial" scheme. Good as it is to see an Australian or a South African team in this country showing us new points in the game, new developments in bowling thought out by the alert Colonial mind to meet the peculiar conditions of Colonial playing pitches, the old grit in up-hill fights, and the old keenness in the field, it would be even better to see both teams here together; it would be a fairer test of the relative skill of the three countries than can be given simply by the dual combat; it would be a rare pleasure to the expert player and spectator to see, for instance, the Australians pitted on English soil against the South African "googlie"; we should get the measure of ourselves more accurately, and appreciate even more clearly than we do at present the fine athletic gifts and enterprise of the newer civilisations of our blood. Still, "if all goes well"? Is there not another side to the account?

Cricket is the national game, but it is not played by the great masses of the nation. Urbanisation means spectators but not players, large "gates" but not universal games. The growth of the big clubs—the professional organisations in football, the county clubs in cricket—the rise of a sporting Press, and the introduction of Leagues and Cup competitions, have all fostered the cult of games as a thing to be watched like any other popular spectacle of the day. The cult is in many ways unhealthy. The youthful dweller in a great city finds many temptations for his idle hours. The workers in Lads' Clubs declare that their charges need nothing so much as some wholesome outlet for their pent-up energies in the evenings of the summer and the half-holidays throughout the year. It is not enough to attend at crowded functions, which in the big cities—though the evil is largely confined to football—are associated with much secret gambling. The lads of the present day need to be encouraged to play games. Most of them, perhaps, need but little encouragement, and lack only the opportunity, the fields on which to play. In some places the movement to provide playing fields is making headway, but what is being done to help so good a cause by the leaders of the cricket world? Even the Northern Union, the professional Rugby organisation of the North, has just undertaken to help the playing fields movement, partly, no doubt, in the hope of fortifying its own "code" against the inroads of Association football, but partly, too, in a genuine endeavor to spread the playing of a healthy game. In vain does one look for anything so enlightened among the organised heads of cricket. No, we are to have "Triangular Tests." The great show-days of the summer sport are to be multiplied. County cricket and club cricket are to be thrust still further into the shade, and the attractions of an "international" will be dinned into the ears of every schoolboy who needs all the healthy, strenuous exercise which his spare moments might permit. How many "tests" are there to be? Three matches, it is understood, furnish no fair criterion of merit, for often only one, or none, is finished. So we are likely to have five between each pair of opponents, or fifteen in all. And, if the weather prove unfavorable, the cry will once again go up that each match should be played out to a finish. Every week and every great cricket centre will have its "test" match, and all the season one or other of the visiting Colonial teams, and often both, will be attracting special attention by matches with the counties or with such a combination of counties as Lancashire and Yorkshire, following the pattern of the match which the Australians are playing at Manchester this week for the first time. It is sometimes said that these impressive functions "stimulate" the game, but one sees no sign of greater or quicker vigor in the sport throughout the country. Such a result would indeed be remarkable. The attraction of great matches, played (and written about) by celebrities, "boomed" in the general and in special newspapers, is immense in its power, simple in its operation, and easy to gratify. But to multiply the playing of the game is a very different matter, demanding sacrifice of time and leisure, the collection of funds, and powers of organisation. Cricket may be more Imperial, but it will not be any the more a national game for the coming of Triangular Tests.

Nor will the year 1912, "if all goes well," improve cricket in itself. Too often already does cricket become less of a game and more of an ordeal. In the county competitions many a player is influenced by the thought of his average and the importance of the championship, yet what has either to do with the spirit of the sport? In "test" matches he is still more subjected to extraneous pressure; the criticism of the crowd and of the Press, the importance of the occasion, the incalculable significance of one mistake—these and other anxieties are in perpetual warfare against the inclination to play a natural game, to do what he would do if there were no crowd, no Press, no championship or "ashes." Do we really wish to multiply such contests? Would it not be better if we took the lighter kind of cricket a little more seriously, and made a stand against the multiplication of its high solemnities?—Yours, &c.,

LANCASTRIAN.

Manchester, June 23rd, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

RELIGION AND CONDUCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Sidney Low, in his highly suggestive article, very justly arrives at the conclusion that creed does not, in the majority of cases, materially affect conduct, and the arguments from which he makes the deduction are excellently set forth. But it would appear that he has failed to answer the question which he himself has propounded, by reason of his tendency to identify creed with ethical impulse, or at least to confuse these two quite separate things. The illustrations which he draws from such men as Collingwood and Nelson, Wellington and Napoleon, do not meet the case, inasmuch as the ethics of war are definitely abnormal to meet an abnormal state of affairs. In other words, ethical morality, in the common meaning of the term, does not enter into the soldier's scheme at all. His sole purpose is victory, and his victory of necessity implies another man's loss. With commerce, on the other hand, the case is different. The commercial man's purpose is also gain for himself; but, properly speaking, his gain implies gain, and not loss, to his co-transactor. Whilst, therefore, the soldier may have a high code of ethics, and yet violate this in the following of his particular calling, the trader is not allowed this peculiar and wholly absurd latitude.

Mr. Low further states that "A man may have a very bad creed, and be a very good father, husband, friend, or citizen," and in this statement lies his chief weakness. It is almost impossible to call any creed bad. If a man has a creed at all, that is, a belief as to the supreme dispensation being beneficent or otherwise, he holds it by conviction and necessity, arising from his intellectual temperament, and not by choice. If it be a stimulating and inspiring creed, he is to be envied; if it be a desolating one, he is to be pitied but certainly not blamed, for his creed, although it be an unhappy one, is not a bad one, not in any sense a thing of deliberate viciousness. It may be admitted at once that a man in so sorry a position might still be, and frequently is, endowed with the virtue of high citizenship, and so forth; but if Mr. Low means the terms "creed" and "ethics" to be interchangeable, as would appear from the general tone of his article, then his contention seems to call for flat contradiction. A man whose ethical code is bad will be neither a good husband, nor father, nor friend, nor citizen; and here we come to the phase of the question that affects Mr. Rockefeller, or any other man in his position. Such a man's creed, indeed any man's creed, is of no importance whatever to anyone but himself. It wears no badge, and may be a closely guarded and permanent secret. But his ideas of responsibility in conduct show themselves to the world every day. Now the highest ideal of conduct has for its chief characteristic altruism, and altruism cannot bear its finest fruit in a mind devoid of imagination.

Mr. Rockefeller's mind is precisely of the type in which imagination has no place. The direct relief of suffering is a plain matter-of-fact proceeding, totally unimaginative and totally egotistical. I do not mean that it is a bad thing to do, but it certainly is not greatly good. To refrain from relieving deep and obvious distress with the means ready to hand is a less pleasant thing to do than to relieve the distress. Only very occasionally does such a course entail any act of real self-sacrifice. We hand our penny or our five-pound note to the beggar, careful that the alms is strictly within our means, with a genuine sense of pleasure and a vague but comfortable feeling that we are laying up treasure in heaven. We indulge the wishes of our intimates, reaping immediate reward in happy faces which are so much more agreeable to live with than sour and disappointed ones. And in doing these things we do well, but we do nothing to prove that our ethical ideals are so constituted as to withstand any severe test. We give no proof that our ideal has that saving grace of imagination, and it is at this point that the commercial morality of the day is lamentably deficient. To drive a good bargain has come to be accounted as a virtue in business, and, our imagination being dull, we do not realise that our astuteness too often spells distress if not disaster for the beaten. We may apply to an importunate conscience the reflection that "business is business," until such time as conscience plays no part in such things, but in so stifling the imagination we give incontrovertible testimony, be our creed as soothing and our reputation in the seclusion of our own circle as immaculate as they may, that our ethical build is lacking in its loftiest and most vital attribute.

The man who cannot see beyond his nose in matters of conduct can lay no claim to true and instinctive nobility of purpose, and it will not avail him to protest that he only fell through blindness. He must, for his salvation, acquire imaginative vision.—Yours, &c., JOHN DRINKWATER.

King's Heath, Birmingham,
June 23rd, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In accordance with your general invitation appended to your most interesting article on the above subject, I desire, as briefly as possible, to offer a suggestion. The puzzle seems to be that people with the most diverse supernatural beliefs and unbeliefs may be equally virtuous or equally vicious. By way of solution you say, "Life is not so much a science as an art." I fancy science is necessary to art. But reserving that point, I agree with you—that is to say, the "art" is most prominent—the "science" is implied. Now Spinoza in his fine way endorses, while he transforms and elevates, the vulgar maxim that "self-preservation is the first law of nature." But what he means by self-preservation is making the most and best of ourselves as "parts and proportions of one wondrous whole." The office of religions is to show us how to do this. They all have a try at it, and it must be conceded that some succeed better than others. Some have said the main thing is to "save your soul"—that is, from hell—others have said, like the Buddha, the main thing is to get rid of all desire, a religion in its ultimate moral nihilism not very different from that of the Stoics. Others have said, like the Mahommedans, the main thing is to be the soldiers of a dogma even unto death. In all these and many other ways, religions act upon and modify the innate and inexpugnable nisus to be one's self, and make the most—I mean the best and highest—of one's self. Whatever religion ultimately succeeds in teaching all humanity to do this will justify itself. But it will not be the religion of Mr. John D. Rockefeller. If I might venture to prophesy, it will be—say, somewhere about the twenty-fifth century—that of the Spanish-Dutch Jew, Benedict de Spinoza.—Yours, &c., J. ALLANSON PICTON.

Caerlyr, Penmaenmawr,
June 21st, 1909

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—"The intense concentration of the mind on mechanical effects appears often to render it incapable of perceiving anything that is not mechanical." And, as Richard Jefferies adds further on, in this last chapter of "The Story of My Heart," "To shut out the soul is to put us back more than twelve thousand years."

Mr. Sidney Low gives a very painful example of this "shutting out the soul" or "Bulstrodeism" in his article, and I cordially agree with it.

In the "Spectator" of the same date as your issue, among the "Correspondence" there was this most candid statement of our modern business morality: "An influential and cultivated Portuguese at Lorenzo Marques assured me that all the educated Portuguese, with the exception of those who were financially interested, were opposed to forcing laborers from Angola to San Thomé."

Do we realise how strong a grip "financial interests" have? How our judgment is biassed and vitiated thereby? That the increase of vested interests are the decrease of individual rights?

"To be paid, and not to do business, is rank oppression" was a maxim of Penn's, and applies to conduct; while for religion surely this is excellent: "The devils also believe and know abundance, but in this is the difference, their Faith works not by Love, nor their Knowledge by Obedience, and therefore are they never the better for them. And if ours be such we shall be of their Church."

I am continually noticing how the active, or male, side of life is given, to the exclusion of the passive or female, and that even such a subject as "Female Suffrage" is never argued from the right that the passive side of human nature should at least be given equal encouragement to the active.

"We live by Admiration, Hope, and Love" psychic forces, wrested by modern business methods to their own destruction, for they each and all are opposed to material gain. It has been said of war, and it can be of modern business, "the most barbaric tendencies of men come to life again, and for its uses they are incommensurably good." Religion and conduct, thus forced into watertight compartments, cease to be reciprocating forces. Surely we must pay more attention to feeling, sentiment, imagination, the motor power, so to say, of the objective, admiration, hope and love.

> "For ever as spirit more spiritual is,
> It craves in its essence yet more to combine
> Innermost weldings of the sweet sanctities
> Of humanity."

Would it not be well in these days of "millionaires" to remember that all the great religions have held up "poverty" as a virtue? William James has put this idea very forceably in his "Gifford" lectures of eight years ago. "Poverty is, indeed, the strenuous life, without brass bands or uniforms or hysteric popular applause, or lies, or circumlocutions, and when one sees the way in which wealth-getting enters as an ideal into the very bone and marrow of our generation, one wonders whether a revival of the belief that poverty is a worthy religious vocation may not be 'the transformation of military courage' and the spiritual reform which our time stands most in need of." . . "I recommend this matter to your serious pondering, for it is certain that the prevalent fear of poverty among the educated classes is the worst moral disease from which our modern civilisation suffers."

Sir Thomas More, three hundred years before, had the same thought. "For who knoweth not the fraud, theft, ravine, brawling, quarrelling, brabling, striffe, chiding, contention, murder, treason, poisoning, which by daily punishments are rather revenged then refrained, do dye when money dyeth?"

One is glad that the echo of this teaching is yet heard. St. Francis from his pulpit in Assisi, Sir Thomas More in his immortal book, William James in his "Gifford" lectures: I rather wonder if THE NATION will help to voice it once again?—Yours, &c.,

V. P.

June 21st, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One seems to have heard an anticipation of Mr. Low's excellent article in the saying, "It is easy to be religious on a pound a week." Under such auspices I should suspect that the converse would be equally true. Take away the pound a week, and religion, like love under similar circumstances, would fly "out of the window." But would either the religion or the love be worthy of the name in such an event? I fancy that with the sharp tooth of adversity those water-tight barriers of which Mr. Low speaks would be broken down, and then the real character would be displayed. Is it not the case, sir, that we have largely ceased to make religion the mainspring of action. Creeds, dogmas, church-going, and outward philanthropy, which is a long way from real charity, have taken the place of the Sermon on the Mount. Until that sermon or its equivalent becomes the basis of social life, J. D. R.'s will abound and the mind of the plain man will continue to be confused. —Yours, &c.,

F. G. MONTAGU POWELL.

Foxlease, Southbourne, Christchurch.
June 23rd, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read Mr. Low's article with much interest, but think that the various meanings which the word "religion" connotes have led him into some confusion of thought. Although he may not formally do so, yet the line of his argument restricts it to theology and philosophy, as when he refers to it as a "theory of the universe." But surely "religion" stands for the devotion of the heart and the consecration of the will, as well as the illumination of the mind. Otherwise it is but "a form of godliness without the power." In Christianity "the end of the commandment" is holy character without which mere "religiosity" (θησκεία) is vain.

The imperfections of Christians cannot fairly be charged to religion, but rather to the intractability of the original material. Moreover, the religion itself is often of too purely a speculative character, a mere opinion which has not penetrated into the deeper strata of feeling or commanded the allegiance of the will. Hence it has little dynamic power.

It has been said that with most of us "there is a side turned to the cold north, which the sun of grace has scarcely touched"; but when the major activities of a life are so turned, it is difficult for the most generous charity to recognise the presence of any religion which is worthy of the name.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH FLETCHER.

17, Fairfield Road, Croydon,
June 23rd, 1909.

---

THE FIGHT FOR THE BUDGET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely there is another reason for fighting for this Budget beyond even those which you give? What has agriculture and rural life done to be left out of count? I thought we all agreed that the health of the nation depended on rural vitality and development, as the most natural means of stopping urban congestion.

Now if we can once get the universal valuation of site and soil, apart from buildings and farming improvements, then, another year, we can hope for a tax of 1d. or 1½d. on land values universally; and with the proceeds repeal Sch. A, which falls on improvement values as much as on land values; and we could also make a beginning of shifting of local rates from land and improvements to land only. Then only will good farming and improvements be stimulated by abolition of the present fines on them. At present if a landlord or tenant improves the property, assessment for taxes and rates goes up, while men with no enterprise or industry are relieved, or, at any rate, let alone. Can there be worse fiscal folly and robbery?

Till we propose this, land values taxation is easily misrepresented as adding to the burdens of agriculture. If we are bold enough to show our full hand, we can then be seen by the farmer and the good landlord to be proposing the only real method of relief.—Yours, &c.,

TH. HILL.

The Vicarage,
North Somercotes, Lincolnshire,
June 23rd, 1909.

---

THE SERVICES OF MISS COLENSO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some time ago, you may remember, a Committee was formed to "receive subscriptions . . . to compensate Miss Colenso and her sister in some measure for the great pecuniary sacrifices they have made in defence of the Zulus and their chief." It might have been hoped that the names appended to this appeal, the strong feeling which exists in this country as to the injustice which the Zulus have suffered and are suffering, the reverence which everyone who has met Miss Colenso (and there must be many who have heard her speak during her two visits to this country, in 1890-93 and 1895-97), must feel for her character and her self-sacrificing work—and an appreciation of the late Bishop's services to the cause of humanity and of truth—that all these factors would have co-operated in producing a hearty response to this appeal. I am distressed to find that this is only the case to a limited extent. The sum in hand has now reached £1,300—largely through generous gifts from people who have already given to the same or similar causes, and who have many other calls upon them. £6,000 is the sum needed to buy an annuity, which, as Miss Colenso's friends are agreed, is the most effectual form of help. We wish to make this appeal known beyond the circle of those who, from their willingness to give, are apt to have more than their just share of the world's burdens laid on them. It would, indeed, be a national disgrace if the women to whom thousands of the distressed look as their only friends, who have done more than any other human beings to keep alive in the Zulu mind the belief in the essential justice of England, should be driven—if we may borrow the true word spoken in jest by one of them, "to retire into some friendly kraal—room would hardly be found in the almshouses here!"

If any words of mine could convey the feeling which the Zulu people entertain towards Harriette and Agnes Colenso, I could also convey some idea of the effect which would be produced on the Zulus by the knowledge that the nation whose righteousness they have so long and so persistently believed in, is leaving the "Amakosazana ka' Sobantu" to want! I may, perhaps, remind your readers that contributions may be sent to Lady Schwann, 4, Prince's Gardens, S.W., who is Honorary Treasurer of the fund.—Yours, &c.,

A. WERNER.

8, Mill Lane, N.W.
June 22nd, 1909.

---

ESPERANTO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article on "The Destruction of Dialect" in your last week's issue alludes to Esperanto as "a universal language" in terms liable to give rise to misapprehension such as it is desirable to avoid. Permit me to point out that Esperanto does not aim to be a universal language. The idea of its author, and of all interested in its progress, is that it should be the international auxiliary language—a very different thing. It is not intended to supersede or displace any national tongue, but that it should be adopted as a second language for all, each nation using its own mother tongue as heretofore for its own internal requirements, and Esperanto as its medium of communication with people of other lands. The writer of your article, therefore, need not fearfully anticipate the nightmare "of the whole world wrapped in one single shroud of Esperanto."

In the last paragraph he says: "The ideal surely is that all possible communities should subsist in some greater unity." Yes, and Esperanto will help—is helping —to realise that ideal.

Trusting you will give publicity to this brief explanation.—Yours, &c.,

J. GOURLAY.

"THE DESTRUCTION OF DIALECT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I wish to express my agreement with the writer of the fine article on the "Destruction of Dialect." After a little thought, one looks with horror upon the bare possibility of a universal Esperanto or Volapuk. Imagine a guide availing himself of Esperanto to describe the beauties of the Alhambra or St. Mark's—a salad of incongruous sounds would have a difficulty in harmonising with the environment. And to see "English Spoken Here" placarded over the whole world would only make life a little more dreary and uninteresting. The romance of life is fast dwindling into thin air without the aid of a universal tongue to dissipate it. Tradition, custom, and individualism are being brought under the influence of commercialism more and more every day—a universal language would effectively strangle the last vestige. One can imagine a conversation on the subject by George Borrow or Walter Scott.

The belief is fast gaining ground that unity of language makes for unity of race. Are the Finnish people any more in agreement with the Russian because they are compelled to learn the Russian tongue? Is the French-Canadian, the Channel Islander, or the Gael any less a British patriot because he has a language other than English?

An Englishman does not think of Canada with its magnificent scenery, modern convenience of travel, and similarity of language, with the same feeling of wander-travel as he thinks of Italy or Spain where there is history and a foreign tongue; and what would become of history if language were torn away? A colorless, Gibbonised register only, would be left.—Yours, &c.,

NEAL GREEN.

Humberstone, Grimsby,
June 22nd, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on this subject is very interesting to a Scot like me, who recalls, across the long interval of fifty years, the word "crack" as in constant use in Lowland Scotland, where "chat" would be used in England. "Come awa in and gie's yer crack," was a common invitation to a passing friend or acquaintance, who might be supposed to be the possessor of the latest news, or of the current gossip of the neighboring town. "Poke," too, was generally used instead of "bag," although pronounced more as though spelled "pock," and what the beggars carried as a receptacle for broken food was always called the "meal pock." "Starved" is another word which was used in the same sense as described in your article, a common expression in cold weather being, "I'm sterving o' cauld." "Throng," again, is another; generally pronounced "thrang," and when people were very busy they would describe themselves as being "as thrang as three in a bed." I have even heard the expression, "A great thrangity," as applied to an excessive rush of business. That delightful word "fettle" was so common in Scotland in my day that I have always thought it was purely Scotch. But it was not used in the sense described by you, but rather as indicating the condition of a person, or thing, as though you should say to a friend: "I hope you're in good fettle," or speak of a piece of machinery as being "out of fettle," or "out of gear," to put it politely. "Soft" is a common expression applied to wet weather in Scotland, and a pouring wet day would be described as "a wee saft" by your meteorological optimist. It is related—I think, by Dr. John Brown—that the Duke of Buccleuch once asked one of his farmers what kind of a day it was going to be, and was answered as follows:—

> "Weel, your grace, it's like it'll be shoors,
> Langtailed shoors,
> Wi' rain atween,
> And it'll be kittle tae plump,
> But it'll no' be a wecht o' weet"

Surely the force of optimism could no further go.—Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

June 22nd, 1909

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was gratified to notice the regret, so sympathetically expressed by your contributor, at the "destruction of dialect" that is taking place around us. Your article will draw attention to a form of English that is so surely passing from among us, to the undoubted impoverishment of the language. Its destruction can probably be traced to the impression that to speak in company other ways than in "Book English," is to be stigmatised as an illiterate person.

We, in Scotland, have, I think, clung longer to our dialects than our Southern kinsfolk, perhaps owing to Burns having enshrined in his poetry so many words of the mother tongue. But there is cause for alarm even here. Within recent years the children of the middle and upper classes, on completion of their scholastic studies would be, I am sure, unable to read Burns without recourse to a glossary. Now this is a grave defect of our educational apparatus, and should receive some recognition from those in authority. It is agreed on every hand that a nation's life is reflected in its language, and its growth can be traced in the words that compose it. Would not the formation of societies for the preservation of dialect words be worth considering? These words, unless effort is forthcoming, will pass beyond our ken, save in the isolated cases of a few writers, who have made particular districts the bases of their narrations.

Some of the words given by your contributor are also in use in the North. A "crack" is the usual word for a chat, though it is more often associated with two persons only, and called a "twa-handed crack." "Poke" (bag). "Throng" is "thrang" here—notice the change of vowel—and means busily occupied. "A very soft night" is the customary passing greeting under extremely wet conditions. The "back end" signifies to us the last weeks of the year. The difference between that and the autumn is, of course, very slight. It would both be interesting and instructive to gather a list of dialect words common to both countries. Could it be done?

Might I be allowed, if space permits, to pass on a few words, the oral use of which narrows each year, and as the older generation passes out, will pass into the silence of books? "Lippen" is more than trust, its nearest English equivalent. "To thole" is another of our expressive words, gathering into itself the significance of a quadrupled "to bear." "Sconner'd" or "scunner'd," to a Scot, is wonderfully strong; used in the phrase: "I am fair scunner'd wi' ye," is the quintessence of loathing and contempt, and is sufficient to shrivel up the object of its expression. "To threap" is to contradict, but in a profounder sense. "To 'threap' down one's throat" has the force as of a clenched fist emphasising with constant reiteration. "To ettle" is to purpose. Another word, "dreich," meaning a sauntering slowness of action or gait, is most expressive. This Scottish dialect, spoken in the drawing-rooms in the time of Burns, is now but rarely heard, and what little is voiced is quickly becoming a thing of the past. I fear it is "rattling" to its death. Yet there is still heard in rural haunts, the chance phrase forgotten long ago; but its recurrence strikes a chord that vibrates again and recalls vividly "that secluded valley which for us is home."—Yours, &c.,

DAVID WILSON.

Glasgow,
June 24th, 1909.

---

"THE FEUD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In view of Mr. William Archer's remark in his criticism of "The Feud" that the characters "Helga, Hordis, Arnor, and Bue reproduce very closely Ibsen's Hjördis, Dagny, Gunnar, and Sigurd," it may interest him to know that what he thinks possible is true—viz., that I had not read "The Vikings in Helgeland" when I wrote "The Feud," three years ago. Literary parallels are often curious and often deceptive. My heroine, Helga, has, of course, a lay line of prototypes in old Teutonic literature, but her passion for Bue bears no resemblance to the relations of Hjördis (Brynnhylde) with Sigurd. The contrast between the sweet and lovable sister and the imperious sister is not confined to Ibsen or to Norse saga, but is to be found in the literature of every race and every epoch. Helga's relations with Arnor and Hordis could probably be closely paralleled in literatures as far apart, racially, as the Celtic and the Japanese. I may add, in conclusion, that while Ibsen's aim would appear to have been to give a dramatic variation of the Volsunga Saga, my aim was to present dramatically the psychology of a woman whose hatred of a man springs from her proud repression of her longing. The atmosphere of my play belongs to a degenerate period of Icelandic history—the thirteenth century, a period with which the heroic characters of the Volsunga Saga have nothing to do.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD GARNETT.

The Cearne, near Edenbridge,
June 19th, 1909.

"THE INTELLECTS OF MEN AND WOMEN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondents both fall into the error, now grown tiresome, of implying that the assumed difference in regard to intellectuality, as between men and women, is a matter of historical development.

One correspondent (the lady) says that if one "would . . . . take into consideration the narrow groove in which (women) have been compelled to move, it would, perhaps, be a matter of surprise that the male sex has not the monopoly of genius." It would be more pertinent to "take into consideration" that men and women are of one and the same species, and that each consequently inherits from the other sex as well as from his or her own.

Another thing that has become tiresome is to hear grown-up men and women arguing as to the respective general merits of the sexes; they are equally good and equally efficient. Why quarrel about each other's brains?

The difference is not of heredity, but of sex; not of degree, but of direction; both have their value in and to the race. To reason along this line makes for balance of privilege; to contend as though the sexes were distinct species makes for sex rivalry, under which the weaker should be expected to go to the wall.—Yours, &c.,

E. SYKES.

Eynsford, Kent,
June 22nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mrs. or Miss Hunter, reminds me of a friend who, on being shown the portfolio of sketches of a great artist, innocently remarked, "Now why are we not all taught to paint like that?" She seems equally to believe that education can not only develop, but confer gifts. Only put women into the same educational mould as men, and they will prove themselves more than their equals. Nevertheless, I venture to assert that no education can alter Nature's laws, and that the bulk of men will in the future as in the past, produce greater and more original work than the bulk of women, just because they are men. This virility, consisting as it does in greater strength, more stable health, combativeness, tenacity, spirit of adventure, and true independence, can never be achieved by the bulk of women, however much, and unwisely, they may try to sacrifice their highest characteristics, by planning their education and experience on the lines of those of the opposite sex.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) F. TRAVERS.

Tortington House, Arundel, Sussex,
June 22nd, 1909.

FEMINIST ARGUMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Had we as yet definitely passed out of the stage of society in which war is a possible and not always highly improbable eventuality, and where all men are, potentially or actually, liable to undergo compulsory military training with a view to active service, then the "higher and saner level" argument of your correspondent, Edith Hunter, might have some claim to consideration, but for that to be the case, we must, I submit, have reached the "higher and saner level" of social fact first. Until we have attained this new society (as one day we undoubtedly shall), the argument appears to me totally irrelevant. For the rest, I can assure your correspondent that it is precisely because I have studied "the position of women from the standpoint of historical development" that I am driven to the conclusions to which she objects. Otherwise I dare say I might have been found shouting with the Feminist crowd, few of whom, in my experience, are strong on this very "standpoint of historical development." Although women may have in some respects been confined to a "narrow groove" in many periods of history, there have been others in which this has by no means been the case—e.g., Ancient Egypt, Rome of the Augustan period, the Italian Renaissance, &c. In no period that I can recall has there been any serious handicap to women exercising their talents in poetry, painting, or music. Yet what have they achieved in their departments in comparison with men? George Eliot's philosophy was acquired directly from Comte, Lewis, and Spencer. As to Mrs. Browning, with regard to her equality with Robert Browning, I will leave that to be answered by the many students and admirers of that great man. Moreover, for how much in her poetic thought was not her husband responsible directly or indirectly? It will be generally found that clever women have been little more than the facile absorbants of the ideas of some man or men with whom they have been in close personal contact. The attempt, too common in current controversy, to "bluff" the issue by insinuations of belatedness—in this case by allusions to Milton—leave me unmoved. Milton, perhaps, expressed, in the Biblical and theological language of his day, a truth; for it has certainly never been refuted, though it may be fashionable in current "advanced" circles to sneer at, or conveniently ignore, it, but it may remain a truth for all that.

With regard to Mr. Nevinson's pathetic descriptions of his eye-witnessing of the suffering women in some cases endure through war, they are surely utterly beside the issue of the present controversy. I have never denied that women sometimes suffer in war. What I deny is that they ever suffer more than men, or, even in the majority of cases, in any intelligible sense as much as men. Take the worst instances imaginable, such as those given by Mr. Nevinson! By what right does he assume that the women suffered more than the soldiers who accompanied them? In the majority of cases in modern warfare, as I have said, their sufferings are altogether vicarious. To say that those who stay at home suffer more than those who bear the brunt of a campaign, is, I still contend, an egregious absurdity, such as would be at once laughed out of court, did it affect any class of the community other than the sacred and privileged sex. If Mr. Nevinson thinks it is equitable that women who are absolved by privilege or sex from fighting, should have the right by their votes to decree a war which men have to wage, I can only say I do not.—Yours, &c.,

E. BELFORT BAX.

June 23rd, 1909.

FIRE BRIGADES AND FIRE INSURANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. A. E. Brown shall be convicted out of his own mouth. In his letter to you of the 16th inst. he stated "I must admit that there is considerable property non-insured," and he also stated "that hundreds of firms have their own fire insurance funds, amounting to millions." Here, in a nutshell, is the answer to my contention that it is wrong in principle to tax the insured for the non-insured. The Government, railway companies, and "hundreds of uninsured firms with millions" at their back only contribute to the support of the Fire Brigades through the rates, but the insured have to do so twice over. This has been my contention from first to last. I am indebted to Mr. A. E. Brown for saving me further controversy, as I am leaving town for some weeks.—Yours, &c.,

INSURANCE MANAGER.

June 19th, 1909.

THE INCORRIGIBLE CENSOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I feel grateful, both on personal and public grounds, to "A." for turning the discussion from the special point of Mr. Shaw's play to the more general question of the Censorship.

In the matter of that reform, I am inclined to go further than "A." Unless I have read the Areopagitica to no purpose, I gather that it was a Council or Board of Licensers against which Milton protested, and, as that Board was under the control (probably appointed by) Parliament, it must have had an indirectly representative character.

Nor do I quite like to trust, like another of your correspondents, to the effect of hisses. That is a disorderly proceeding, at best, and it may be inspired by quite as narrow a prejudice as any action of the Lord Chamberlain.

My own belief is that the reform must come from the playwright and the actor, not from the public or some external official body.

The average playwright or actor is, at lowest, a hard-working person, trying to carry out a difficult task. The average playgoer is, at best, a searcher for innocent amusement. Surely the former classes must supply the higher average of morality and intelligence? But while they are in danger of being exploited by wealthy capitalists who may be at the feet of the mob, and who judge of the public by their coarsest outcomes, what can we hope for, except in accidental cases? A co-operative society of actors and playwrights, with a genuine belief in their art, might produce an esprit de corps, which would enable them to resist capitalist theories and rude terrorism. For my part, I should not object to unite stage painters in such a society.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead, June 22nd, 1909.

THE ALLEGED "CAVE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust that one of your regular subscribers and readers may be allowed to enter a protest against the violence of the attack made in your last number on a considerable section of the Liberal members of Parliament, although I have no right to speak for anyone but myself. First you describe them as forming a "Cave," then you separate them into groups and individuals and make the imputation that each has been guided by personal rather than public motives, and, finally, you devote one, if not two, articles to the suggestion that the party should take violent measures to prevent free discussion, if necessary going to the length of undermining the influence of its own supporters in their several constituencies. I feel the more confidence in asking you to adopt a more reasonable attitude because the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and others who are entitled to speak for the Ministry, entirely disclaim any desire to countenance the course you have advocated. The Liberal members who waited on the Prime Minister at his own request with regard to the Budget had their case most ably explained by Sir Thomas Whittaker, who, like many others present, was never understood to have any great personal interests in land; nor has there been anything "furtive" in the proceedings. I, more fortunate than many, was able to explain my criticisms on the Budget in the debate on the second reading. There has been and there is no concealment whatever, and the whole pother has been worked up to supply "copy" for newspapers, mainly, I regret to say, Liberal. There are no more loyal supporters of the Government than those who think that in certain of its aspects the Budget is extravagant, and that the Land Clauses run absolutely contrary to all the teachings of Liberalism, with regard to the taxation of land. So far as I know, all of them support the Budget in its main features, recognise the necessity of the State for increased financial assistance, and assent to the taxation of land. Progressive and Liberal teaching, founded on Royal Commissions and other inquiries, have laid down perfectly clearly during the last twenty-five years that urban land should be taxed apart from houses by the medium of rates, and that the whole produce of the tax should go to the local and not Imperial funds.

So far as I am concerned, this point presented much difficulty. Now, however, it has, to a large extent, been met by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has agreed to return half of the money to the Local Authorities. Other aspects of the Finance Bill suggest grave difficulties to Liberals, who have been trained to principles of economy and pledged to the reduction of armaments. Everyone appears to agree that between presenting estimates, some £3,000,000 under what seems likely to be produced by existing taxes, and proposing new imposts which will bring in £6,000,000 more than they are required to produce, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is imposing a far heavier burden than is necessary on the nation. You defend this on the ground of the "genuine needs of social reform and the perpetual pressure for panic armaments," but the sums I have mentioned are to be provided, after paying for every proposal of social reform that has yet been brought forward. There seems to be no recognition in your articles of the constitutional principle that taxes should only be raised for one year, and that Parliament has really no right to grant any supplies beyond that which are necessary for the period which will end on March 31st next. The difficulty that many feel is that while the coming social reforms are vague, the intention to spend vast sums in increased armaments is quite clearly laid down. We have not only the £3,000,000 extra for the Navy this year, but a prospect of laying down four other "Dreadnoughts," and all this to be only the prelude to further vast outlay in the immediate future. I had better quote the Chancellor's words:—

> "The Navy Bill for this year will take very serious and grave dimensions. Indeed, it will make the taxpayers shudder, and next year the Navy Bill will show an increase which will be something gigantic."

Thus the Finance Bill almost appears to be a War Budget. The recent Colonial Press Conference was turned into a demonstration for increased armaments. A naval review was arranged for these messengers of peace. That fiery spirit, Lord Charles Beresford, is working with some vague Defence Committee of the Cabinet, and it is understood that he is shortly to present a report to Parliament. Another naval review is being organised, and in many ways our Liberal Ministers are appealing to the martial spirit of the people.

Has it become a crime for Liberals to protest against these things?—Yours, &c., THOMAS LOUGH.

14, Dean's Yard, Westminster, S.W.
June 24th, 1909.

[Mr. Lough's defence must speak for itself, though it would seem to suggest that if he has left the "Cave" he has not yet reached the Penitent Form. But it is contrary to the fact to suggest that we declared each group or individual forming the "Cave" to be "guided by personal rather than public motives." On the contrary, we stated that some of them were clearly honest critics on points of detail.—ED., NATION.]

Poetry.

VICTORIA STREET.

To-day I spake with souls that journeyed by,
Here in the street they touched me as they passed.
Sorrow and Hope and Terror flying fast,
Life soon to bud, or, withering, soon to die.

And many more with troubled, wistful eye
Into my heart their timeless question cast.
To-day I spake with souls that journeyed by,
Here in the street they touched me as they passed.

The spires consumed in sunset, ceaselessly
The traffic surged with sob and trumpet blast.
Dusty, ensnared, immortal, driven fast,
They raised their faces to the evening sky—
To-day I spake with souls that journeyed by.

LUCY LYTTELTON.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE coming autumn is to see the publication of several interesting memoirs. Mr. John Bigelow, who was American Minister to France during the last two years of the Civil War, has finished a work called "Retrospections of an Active Life," which will be published in three volumes during September. According to the "New York Times," it will give the first full account of the "Trent" affair and of Maxmilian's occupation of Mexico, both from authoritative sources and with original documents. There are also promised many anecdotes of Lincoln, Sumner, Cobden, Bright, Thackeray, and Queen Victoria.

* * *

ANOTHER autobiography of some political interest is Mr. N. H. Dole's translation of the Baroness von Suttner's "Memoirs," which is announced by Messrs. Ginn. Although her father and her two brothers were generals in the Austrian Army, Baroness von Suttner has long been a dramatic and interesting figure in the European movement against militarism. It was through her influence that Nobel founded his famous prize for the most notable service to the cause of International Peace, and this prize was very appropriately awarded to her in 1905. She is the author of several novels, all written with an anti-militarist point. "Lay Down Your Arms (Die Waffen Nieder)" has had an immense circulation, and been translated into every European language.

* * *

YET a third autobiography to appear in the early autumn is that of Sir Henry M. Stanley, which has been edited by the explorer's wife, and will be issued by Messrs. Sampson Low. The book is bound to contain much interesting, and also much disputable, matter. Stanley's character and achievements should perhaps be viewed in a somewhat drier light than Lady Stanley's memorial can possibly place them, accomplished as its workmanship is likely to be.

* * *

AMONG Mr. Eveleigh Nash's autumn books will be a volume of reminiscences by Lady Cardigan, the widow of the Earl of Cardigan who led the Light Brigade at the Balaklava charge. Lady Cardigan was one of the best known leaders of society during the mid-Victorian period and afterwards, and her revelations are said to lack neither frankness nor piquancy. Most of the famous people of the time figure in her pages, which abound in characteristic anecdotes. It may not be generally known that Beaconsfield once made a proposal of marriage to Lady Cardigan.

* * *

WE learn that a collection of posthumous essays by Richard Jefferies, including some that have not hitherto been published, will be issued in the autumn by Messrs. Duckworth. Before his death Jefferies had planned and partly written a book on shooting in England. Some portions of this, and, in particular, a paper on "The Art of Choosing a Gun," will appear in the coming volume.

* * *

THE same publishers announce for immediate publication "The Cliffs," a patriotic poem by Mr. C. M. Doughty, the author of "Arabia Deserta." The subject—the attempted invasion of England by a Continental Power—is said to be treated with extraordinary force of imagination and the most daring imagery. For one scene in especial, in which Truth and her elves hold a midnight court and weigh the souls of politicians, permanent officials, fashionable ladies, clubmen, soldiers, and sailors, and poor laboring folk, it is claimed that the author shows an originality equal to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt."

* * *

A BOOK which promises to throw valuable light on England's rural conditions is to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, under the title "Life in a Country Village." The author, Miss Maud F. Davies, has been a student at the London School of Economics, and the coming volume is due to the suggestion of Mr. Sidney Webb. It aims at doing for a country parish what Mr. Rowntree's "Poverty, a Study of Town Life" has done for the working-class districts of York, and with this object Miss Davies has chosen a scattered village of 800 inhabitants, whose social, economic, and domestic conditions she has closely observed and analysed. The first part of the book is an historical account of the development of the village, relating the changes which it underwent by the coming and going of the cloth trade and the enclosure of its waste lands and common fields. This is followed by an examination of its present state, and an attempt has been made to trace the migrations of its inhabitants during four generations. Miss Davies' inquiry promises to be a most useful piece of work, especially timely just now, when the land question is coming so much to the front.

* * *

AT the annual dinner of the Associated Booksellers on Saturday last, the two main topics of discussion were the decline in the book trade and the decadence of literature. As regards the former, the flooding of the market with inferior novels and the coming of the cheap reprint have undoubtedly caused a good deal of unsettlement. In preparing their lists publishers have often sacrificed quality to quantity. They have also neglected the machinery by which books are placed upon the market. Of course, it may be answered that a publisher's business is to publish, and nothing more. But the passing of the old-fashioned bookseller, who could talk about books and promote an interest in them as well as sell them, is to be regretted by publishers and public alike. Mr. Heinemann was not far out when he said that 75 per cent. of novels published were now sold to the libraries, and only the remaining 25 per cent. to the public. That this is a bad sign no publisher will deny, but in part the fault lies with the failure of the publishers themselves to foster the booksellers' business. However, there are already some signs of improvement, and we may hope that the report of the passing of the old-fashioned bookseller is, like that of Mark Twain's death, "greatly exaggerated." We may say the same, too, of the decadence of literature. The dearth of genius is a cry common to all ages. Did not Macaulay, writing in 1850, lament the total absence of great writing, and discern no prospect of a revival of letters? Yet, at the time he wrote, Dickens, Thackeray, Carlyle, Newman, Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, Ruskin, George Eliot, and Clough were all in the field, or about to occupy it.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Foundations of the Origin of Species." A Sketch written in 1842. By Charles Darwin. Edited by his son, Francis Darwin. (Cambridge University Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

"A Literary History of Rome from the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age." By J. Wight Duff. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Contemporary France." By Gabriel Hanotaux. Translated by E. Sparvel-Bayly. Vol. IV. (1877-1882). (Constable. 15s. net.)

"The Making of Species." By Douglas Dewar and Frank Finn. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Hanoverian Queens of England." By A. D. Greenwood. Vol. I. Sophia Dorothea of Celle and Caroline of Ansbach. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Laurus Nobilis." By Vernon Lee. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Australian Socialism: An Historical Sketch of its Origin and Developments." By A. St. Ledger. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Wits, Beaux, and Beauties of the Georgian Era." By John Fyvie. (Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Poems and Translations." By J. M. Synge. (The Cuala Press. 10s. 6d.)

"Explorers in the New World Before and After Columbus." By M. M. Mulhall. (Longmans. 6s 6d. net.)

"George Meredith in Anecdote and Criticism." By J. A. Hamerton. (Grant Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Grieg and His Music." By H. F. Finck. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Asmus Semper." By Otto Ernst. (Griffiths. 6s.)

"Everybody's Secret." By Dion Clayton Calthrop. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

"Le Prestige de Jean-Jacques Rousseau." Par Hippolyte Buffenoir. (Paris: Paul. 7fr. 50.)

"Le Théâtre Français des Origines jusqu'à nos Jours." Par Francisque d'Armade. (Paris: Delagrave. 6fr.)

"Le Dix-huitième Siècle." Par Casimir Stryienski. (Paris: Hachette. 5 fr.)

"Bismark in der französischen Literatur." Von A. Singer. (Würzburg: Kabitsch. M.10.)

Reviews.

THE GENIUS OF METHODISM.*

"Do not meddle with the Church of England," is a saying recorded of Charles Austin; "it is the one thing that stands between us and Christianity." The sentiment was belated; but a hundred years before it would have had point. The Georgian Church was singularly wanting in enthusiasm; this quality was denounced by so excellent a man as Butler as "a horrid thing." Yet it was enthusiasm on which Christianity was built and by which it was propagated; which is the sap in virtue of which it lives and in whose absence it decays. That enthusiasm is a danger to order and at least connotes superstition is true. It is equally true that it is indispensable to religion; that it gives the driving power by which movements of men on a large scale are brought about. Is it impossible to unite it with sanity? Is an enthusiasm for reason not in the nature of things? It is difficult to say that it is not. But "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence"; it is the violent—Luther, not Erasmus—who bear it away.

These volumes give us a popular and comprehensive view of the Foundation of Methodism; of Methodism at home, in America, and the Colonies; of its missionary enterprise; of the condition and prosperity of the Methodist Churches to-day. It is a great record. "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." If "every communion of thinkers, every phase of faith, has its place and its relation to the great whole, and plays some part, possibly protestant and transient merely, in the progress and development of the one Holy Catholic Church," then "a Church which comprises some thirty million adherents, which is to-day the largest Protestant Church in the world, which has established itself in every quarter of the globe, must have a meaning and place." John Wesley was "grossly superstitious," says a recent writer. He was. But to take this as his salient point is as if we were to see no more in Mr. Gladstone than the size of his collars: these things are not the man. Wesley's genius for government was not inferior to that of Richelieu, says Macaulay. Buckle speaks of him as "the first of theological statesmen," and of Methodism as "a second spiritual Reformation," "a great system of religion which bore the same relation to the Church of England that the Church of England bore to the Church of Rome." Let the founder be judged by the foundation:—

> "These are imperial works, and worthy kings."

The scepticism of the eighteen century was skin deep. The masses of the people were untouched by it. They lived on things, not on names; they were natural; their primitive passions—wonder, love, fear—lay near the surface, and were easily roused. The Church had never spoken to them in their own tongue; hence their indifference to her. Wesley did, and they responded instinctively to his appeal. He gathered round him men likeminded with himself, often from the humblest classes. A fire was kindled in every corner of the land.

> "Their voice was heard among the black moors of Northumberland, in the dens of London, and in the long galleries where, in the pauses of his labour, the Cornish miner would listen to the sobbing of the sea. Whitfield's preaching was such as England had never heard before; theatrical, extravagant, often commonplace, but hushing all criticism by its intense reality, its earnestness of belief, its deep tremulous sympathy with the sin and sorrow of mankind. It was no common enthusiast who could . . look down from the top of a green knoll at Kingwood on twenty thousand colliers, grimy from the Bristol coalpits, and see as he preached 'the tears making white channels down their blackened cheeks.'"

Of the hysteria which accompanied such preaching too much has been made. The physical and psychic phenomena of "conversion" are matter for the pathologist; their root lies in the nervous system, and in its imperfectly explored connection with consciousness. Medically they call for careful supervision; morally they are neither good nor evil, but of a neutral zone. The other criticism which suggests itself—that of the individualism of the movement—the stress laid not on a common, but a personal, good, is one of time and accent rather than of substance. "First the blade." Wesley preached a universal salvation; and the reproach of slackness in promoting the welfare of others is the last that can be brought against either the Methodists or the early Evangelicals—Evangelicalism was pre-eminently the party of good works.

Wesley's relation to the Church of England, if not debatable, is debated ground. That he was unwilling to separate from it is certain. But he did separate from it. Three years before his death he wrote "a separation has already taken place, and will inevitably spread, though by slow degrees," and the effort to represent him as occupying the distinctively Anglican standpoint breaks down not only on this fact, but over the record of the growth of his mind. He began life as a High Churchman of a doctrinaire and authoritative type. This was the rock on which he made shipwreck in Georgia. "The people say they are Protestants, but as for you (wrote a candid friend), they cannot tell what religion you are of. They never heard of such a religion before, and they do not know what to make of it." Anglicanism of this type exists on paper, not in real life. But his mind was too concrete to rest in abstractions. The Moravians were a revelation to him; he associated with members of non-episcopalian churches; he attended prayer meetings; he prayed without book. It was at one of these gatherings, listening to Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans, that the great peace came. Thus was the Evangelical Revival linked to the Reformation. "On that day Methodism, as history knows it, was born."

In a sense it is true that personally he did not leave the Church. But, like a strong rower, he looked one way while every stroke of the oar took him further in the opposite direction. The relation of the first Christians to the Jewish Synagogue is a parallel. They "continued daily in the temple"; and, had the temple passed over into the Church, there need have been no break with the past. But the two looked different ways. The Temple would not tolerate St. Paul, nor the Church Wesley. Like the Mother Country and the American Colonies, the respective laws of their being drove them apart. It is doubtful whether it is matter for regret that this was so. A strong feeling against dissent by no means implies a sacerdotalist view of religion—witness the controversies, not yet extinct, occasioned by the Scottish disruption. Separation as such is an evil: to justify it a grave cause is required. But what theologians call the sin of schism consists not in material separation—this is a thing of secondary moment—but in the schismatical temper; and this is found less in the seceders than in those whose high-handedness forces them to secede. In Wesley's case, he and his preachers were doing a work which the Church would not, and probably could not do. To the dog-in-the-manger policy of prohibition, one answer only was possible: we ought to obey God rather than men. A larger view of the Church is now possible, which claims for the Methodist societies their place at once in Catholicism and in the National Church.

The keynote of his life was the apostle's "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." "Remember that you cannot serve God alone: the Bible knows nothing of solitary religion." But to enthusiasm he added common sense and a surprising gift for administration. He was autocratic enough. "If by arbitrary power you mean a power which I exercise simply without any colleagues therein, this is certainly true," was his reply to cavillers; "but I see no hurt in it." His instructions to his preachers are refreshingly direct:—

> "Converse sparingly and cautiously with women; particularly with young women.
>
> "Take no step towards marriage without first consulting your brethren.
>
> "Do not affect the gentleman. You have no more to do with this character than with that of a dancing master. A preacher of the Gospel is the servant of all."

Nor were the preachers backward in similar directness. A clergyman who told one of them that he was not qualified to preach, was met by the retort: "Qualified! You say that? Why, without your gown you dare na, and without your book you could na, and without your pay you would na, and I do without all three." The practical questions that the progress of the movement brought with it were decided by him in the larger sense. He believed that women had, in certain cases, a call to the work of preaching. "God owns women in the conversion of sinners, and who am I that I should withstand God?"

* "A New History of Methodism." Edited by W. J. Townsend, D.D.; H. B. Workman, M.A., D.Lit.; and G. Eayrs, F.R.Hist.Sc. Hodder & Stoughton. Two Vols. 30s. net.

The American ordinations, the first step towards definite separation from the Church, was forced upon him by the circumstances in which the Methodists in the colonies found themselves after the War of Independence. Like the Continental chaplaincies up to a recent date, the Episcopalian Churches in America had been, legally, under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London. During the hostilities the bulk of the clergy had left the country; the Methodists, now numbering fifteen thousand, who had hitherto received the sacraments from them, sought his advice. He appealed in vain to Bishop Lowth to ordain at least one of his preachers, and, on his refusal, came to the conclusion expressed later in a circular letter:—

> "As our American brethren are now totally disentangled both from the State and from the English hierarchy, we dare not entangle them again with either the one or the other. They are now at full liberty simply to follow the Scriptures and the Primitive Church. And we judge it best that they should stand fast in that liberty wherewith God has so strangely made them free."

He ordained Coke, September 1st, 1784. In the same year Thomas Seabury was consecrated by Scottish bishops as the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

"John Wesley's chapels," says Mr. Birrell, "lie a little heavily on John Wesley. It has, perhaps, to be admitted that to found great organisations is to build your tomb." Yet it was from a tomb that the Christian life issued.

---

THINGS AS THEY ARE.*

The title first chosen for this book and abandoned by the author because he found himself forestalled, viz., "Things as They Are," would have been far better than one which openly professes heresy. For there is an air of affectation in pretending to rebel against an orthodoxy which has no real existence. There was a classical political economy from Ricardo's day to that of J. S. Mill, which might have claimed to be in some sense orthodox, but since Jevons broke up what Mill regarded as a settled central doctrine of value the orthodoxy has quite gone to pieces; for though in this country Professor Marshall's important book ranks as authoritative, its author would hardly assert that it contained an orthodox system of economic teaching, nor, if he did, would he find many to accept the claim. But though it is not possible to say that any of the particular positions taken by Sir Nathaniel Nathan is heretical, one general heresy he may be said to have committed himself to, viz., a denial that there is or can be an economic science. And this heresy is incidental and implicit rather than openly avowed: it comes out in frequent disparagement of "your theorist," who evolves from his inner conscience generalisations that do not fit the facts, and is ever seeking to "reduce all things to the workings of one universal cause on which alone he concentrates his mind." That this repudiation of theory really amounts to a denial of economic law is made particularly apparent in the treatment of taxation. In considering the incidence of taxes "each article will have to be judged by itself. What is found true of wheat, for example, does not necessarily apply to hops or fruit or butcher's meat or eggs or butter, or even oats or barley; and any attempt at generalisation or the application of 'first principles' is false." If Sir Nathaniel means anything more than that circumstances alter cases, he is an intellectual anarchist: if he means just this, then there is no such being as the "theorist" against whom he tilts. In dealing, for example, with tariffs, which occupy much space in this volume, where are the orthodox economists, the "theorists," who say that the producer or the consumer always pays or pays all the tax even for a single class of articles? Sir Nathaniel invents a theorist for a punching-bag, conceiving himself as a severely practical man conducting sound processes of reasoning among real things. Now far be it from us to deny that Sir Nathaniel is a practical man; a successful legal career in the Colonies, and a large visiting acquaintance with many lands and many sorts of men have given him a very wide knowledge of commerce and politics, and a keenly observant mind has enabled him to accumulate for use a large variety of facts. Moreover, he exhibits a good general acquaintance with recent economic literature of the more popular sort, and brings to bear upon many English questions the detached and liberal judgment which is a characteristic of the abler type of Colonial statesman or official.

Turning to the great fundamental issues of the time—Socialism versus Individualism, Free Trade and Protection—he does not show himself an indiscriminate partisan; indeed, to do so would be a dangerous approach towards "theory," and might entangle him in the acceptance of some general law. His method of deciding each case on its particular merits compels him to be constantly tacking and doubling on his tracks. Thus, though he accepts the name of Tariff Reformer, he gives away most of the positions which the main body of adherents of that faith hold most dear. The incidence of taxation is to him a mere rough and tumble business, in which no one can predict how any one will come out until it is over, a doctrine not particularly comforting to those who claim to possess an infallible specific for "taxing the foreigner."

Now disbelief in theory generally implies in the disbeliever a poor capacity for accurate reasoning. So it is here. Of course, no one can discourse argumentatively for four hundred pages upon "things as they are" without a large quantity of theorising, and, as might be expected, much of it is weak. Thus, while he sees clearly and denounces unsparingly the folly of tariffs for negotiation and imperial preference, he argues persistently in favor of taxing and keeping out foreign manufactured goods of sorts which we produce at home. He is convinced that by this means the volume of employment within this country can be increased. This is, perhaps, the central fallacy of Protectionism. Sir Nathaniel commits it, so to speak, with his eyes open, for he expressly repudiates the plain truth enunciated by Mr. Marshall, "If goods which can be produced at home are yet imported freely from abroad, that shows that they can be got 'generally' at less cost by making other things with which to buy them from abroad, than by the direct method of making them at home." Sir Nathaniel thinks the following a clinching refutation: "You cannot 'make other things with which to buy them from abroad' except there is the effective demand from abroad for the things which you propose to make, and it is precisely the cessation of that demand, the results of which you are at present struggling against in vain" (p. 318). Now, neither "facts" nor theory support the hypothesis of this cessation of demand. Sir Nathaniel's confident assertion (p. 202) that "Protection . . . . must clearly have the result of increasing the employment of British capital and energy to the extent to which it succeeds in checking the importation of competing goods," is based upon a refusal to follow out the indirect results of an action whose first effect is to raise the price of a class of commodities. There is no possibility of increasing the aggregate employment of native capital and labor or the aggregate product by checking freedom of exchange. The only way by which such a contention can be made plausible is by illicitly confining inquiry to the effect upon single trades.

The writer is at his best in some concluding chapters on Socialism and Land Nationalisation. He has no strong sympathy with the hard conservative doctrines of vested interests, and recognises that the modern State must supply its needs largely out of land values and succession to other forms of property. He stands with Mr. Carnegie in holding that stricter limits should be set upon the testamentary disposition of property and that "no testator should be allowed to deprive the State of property, to succeed to which there is no individual whom he reasonably desires to benefit or who may be adjudged to have a reasonably meritorious claim." Though abjuring the doctrines of Henry George, he commits himself to the somewhat revolutionary proposal of "abolishing the idea of 'freehold land' altogether and converting all existing tenures into 'leasehold' property" which should revert to the State in due time.

---

* "Economic Heresies." By Sir Nathaniel Nathan. Constable.

On what may be termed general Socialism his attitude is more conservative; he distrusts the selective capacity of the State in obtaining the requisite energy and ability for administering public enterprises, and urges that the acquisition of private businesses without compensation, or by the sham-compensation of taxing the expropriated interests to compensate themselves, will turn out to be as impracticable as it is unjust.

Though acknowledging quasi-socialistic sympathies, he fears lest moderate reformers should be impelled by pressure from behind to adopt measures which by checking the production of capital may hamper industry and damage the creation of wealth.

There is a good deal of ability in this queer blend of Conservatism and Socialism.

A GENTLE LIFE.*

Very much mourned was the death of Mrs. Brightwen, that gentle naturalist, whose notes on "Nature Won by Kindness," and introductions to the wonderful side of creation, have had more to do than we shall ever know with the rearing of a kindlier generation. Not everyone who reads of her wonderful Stanmore garden and sanctuary, nor yet all of those whom she received there and introduced to her feathered and other dumb friends, knew the effort that her courtesies cost her. This she confided only to her diary: the troubles of sleeplessness, the physical pain sometimes entailed in walking round her museum, how much she disliked repeating the same description of its exhibits, the boredom of chatter. "I don't get half enough solitude," she writes. "My life is far too much spent in enduring chatter, which, at last, makes me feel wild and as if I must get away, or scream, or say something sharp to stop it."

This was towards the end. But if we turn back the leaves of Mrs. Brightwen's account of her youth, we see how ingrained was her naturalist's love of solitude. She made for herself a perch in the branches of a tree, to which she went by means of a rough ladder nailed to the trunk. "I dreaded having to speak to strangers," she writes. "I came if I was called, but at the first opportunity I would flit away to one of my retreats behind the thick masses of evergreens, where I had a secret path which led back to my own garden."

Yet, as is, of course, known, Mrs. Brightwen had an intense sympathy for her fellow human beings. Quoting Kingsley's verse, she confides to her diary that "a great many lame dogs seem to come my way." At one time she pities a poor boy whom she washes, feeds, and clothes, and then sends on to someone who can do yet more for him. Or it is a man suffering from eczema whom she has to teach with great tact the advantage and the luxury of a daily wash. She buys a bale of flannel for the double purpose of finding employment for needlewomen and garments for the very poor, and she writes humorously of one Mrs. Kite who is continually swooping on her for more work.

As a naturalist, Mrs. Brightwen was old-fashioned. She read apparently in an obsolete library, and she seems to have been shut out from half the wonders of creation by imagining that the Bible forbade belief in the truths of Darwinism. She is moved to admiration by the obedience of all things under most adverse conditions to "increase and multiply," but rebels against the corollary of hawks and beasts of prey. Yet in due time we find her enacting the hawk by destroying queen wasps, and justifying the proceeding on grounds of mercy. Mrs. Brightwen also was not a faultless observer. A curious example of this is found in what she says concerning the habit of the nuthatch in plastering the entrance to its nest with clay. She proceeds as though one were writing of the hornbill instead: "The mate will plaster up the hole with clay, through which the male bird will feed the little mother until her eggs are hatched."

On the other hand, Mrs. Brightwen was more than a naturalist. We can find exact observers, though not too many of them, while we cannot find enough lovers like her to take humanity in one hand and wild nature in the other, and make, as it were, a personal introduction. Her love for the lower orders won for her a marvellous success in getting their confidence. There are the doves that came to her for help in their difficulties, the fox safely lying up in her garden while the hounds are drawing the country for him, a party of drones kept through the winter and made the subject of a paper read to the local Selborne Society, flying ants certified as interesting and intelligent pets, and many other striking cases to be found in her many books.

On the whole, we like her sweet personality best in the early Victorian frame. It is her description of her own girlhood and young womanhood that we shall read again with greatest pleasure. That, and the full and appreciative introduction that Mr. Edmund Gosse has contributed to this interesting book.

* "Eliza Brightwen: The Life and Thoughts of a Naturalist." Edited by W. H. Chesson. With an Introduction by Edmund Gosse. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.

A POLITICAL SATIRE.*

"A Change in the Cabinet" is amusing, and is worth reading, but the best advice we can give to Mr. Belloc is that in his next political satire he should cast back to the cool, sustained, ironical method he adopted in "Mr. Burden." The truth is that Mr. Belloc's dangerous passion for telling the truth as he perceives it should give him a position as unique in one field of literary activity as Mr. Bernard Shaw has attained in another. But since the whole world is, and always has been, in a conspiracy to suppress those simple facts, or those aspects of simple facts, the open declaration of which would undermine public belief in the powers that be, the truth-teller must forge for himself an artistic weapon of the finest edge. In "Mr. Burden" our author used with precision the rapier; in "A Change in the Cabinet" he betakes himself to a coal-hammer. The coal-hammer is, of course, a formidable instrument in the hands of an active assailant, but it is an exhausting exercise to swing it again and again, and in an encounter its use can give but little æsthetic pleasure to the impartial spectator. We have, in fact, too high an opinion of Mr. Belloc's powers as a satirist to be satisfied with the artistic effects of his last novel.

In the first third of "A Change in the Cabinet" Mr. Belloc draws a skilful portrait of the successful politician, Sir Charles Repton, and of the series of family manœuvres by which Mary Smith, "the friend, the confidant, the cousin, the sister-in-law, or the aunt of at least three-quarters of what counts in England," forces the young and popular Prime Minister, "Dolly," to give the impecunious and incompetent young man, "Dimmy," a seat in the Cabinet, a step which necessitates Sir Charles Repton's resignation of his Wardership of the Court of Dowry, and his taking a peerage. This section of the novel is kept within the legitimate bounds of satire, and, though a little blunt and emphatic, is convincing enough. But the artistic mechanism which Mr. Belloc has adopted to bring his situation to a climax is over-obvious, and, what is more unfortunate, the dramatic sequel degenerates into farce. That Sir Charles Repton, the astute statesman and man of the world, through the agency of a chance blow behind the ears, should lose entirely the faculty of self-restraint and caution, and forthwith give utterance in the House of Commons, on Boards of Directors, and elsewhere in public and private, to brazenly cynical and most unpalatable home-truths is within the bounds of probability. Whether Caryll's Ganglia is a figment of the author's fancy we do not know, but there are many well-authenticated cases of a blow on the head being followed by the series of symptoms in the recipient which Mr. Belloc sums up as "an attack of Veracitatis." But the scheme needs very deft artistic handling, and it is precisely at this point that Mr. Belloc's coal-hammer is brought into play. It descends with violence when Sir Charles gets up to address the directors and shareholders at the Van Diemens Board meeting; it descends again when the Warden of the Court of Dowry is answering questions in the House; and it is plied with vigor when the politician is entertaining guests at dinner, talking to his domestics, and traversing the London streets. But the grave disadvantage attending its use is that one blow is very like another, and that, after a very short time, this downright method palls. The finesse that is essential to a mastery of irony, on the other hand, would stand our author in good stead by forcing him to pause and measure his opponent, and so act by diminishing the impetuosity of his satire. This is especially apparent when we come to the series of chapters that deal with the misfortunes of the incompetent young politician, George Mulross Demaine, alias Dimmy. On the day that the Warden is attacked by the mania of Veracitatis, his successor disappears mysteriously, and the contents bill of the newspapers show in large letters, "Disappearance of a Minister Elect." Dimmy has inadvertently lost himself in the East End, been garotted, assaulted by the police, has blundered into the docks, hidden himself on a tramp steamer, and got ashore on the Sussex coast at Parham. This little series of adventures, which would be in place in the pages of Smollett, is really far too farcical in tone and too facile in expression to do Mr. Belloc credit. The author at this stage of his story has, apparently, grown careless of its quality, and it is only his firmness of touch that carries him, one way or another, through transparent absurdities. It is true that in many pages there are excellent things, and Mr. Belloc's audacity is justified when we reach the account of how Mr. Evans, the Prime Minister's private secretary, succeeded in keeping the particulars of Sir Charles Repton's outbreak out of the Press:—

* "A Change in the Cabinet" By H. Belloc. Methuen. 6s.

> "Well knowing that Davis' house lay in the extreme of the suburbs, and that he himself was going into the heart of Fleet Street, Evans offered to give his companion a lift. To his disgust it was accepted, and he was constrained to drive the editor of the "Capon" to St. Paul's Station; it lost him ten minutes, and those ten minutes were nearly fatal. For when he had got back at full speed to the offices of the "Moon," the paper had gone to press. The machines were shaking and thundering away in the basement, and mile after mile of diffused culture was pouring out in a cataract to feed the divine thirst for knowledge.
>
> It seemed too late, but Evans went boldly through it all the same. The editor was gone, but to the sub-editor he sent in his card and wrote upon it, "From the Prime Minister." It was a time needing heroic measures.
>
> He asked to see an advance copy. The leader was Repton—Repton—Repton, nothing but Repton. . . . Repton had given away the wickedness of modern finance; Repton, for purposes of his own, was prepared to expose the mockery of our politics. Repton would tell them the truth about the Concessions; they had a promise of an interview with Repton. What motives might have caused Repton to act as he had done they could not determine. It was sufficient for them that Repton, &c. . . .
>
> The leader had a title, and the title of the leader was Repton. It had coined a new word: the word was to "Reptonize," upon the model of "to peptonize." The "Moon" threatened to reptonize the whole of our public life. Evans spent about thirty seconds looking at the floor.
>
> "Can they stop the machines, Mr. Price?" he asked, for Price was the sub-editor's name.
>
> "Yes," said the sub-editor. "Why?"
>
> Evans walked to the window and looked out into the City street, and said, without showing his face:—
>
> "Mr. Price, your proprietor is a very valued member of our party."
>
> At the word "proprietor" Mr. Price changed colour. Yet Evans had not meant the proprietor of Mr. Price, he had merely meant the proprietor of the "Moon."
>
> "Mr. Price, I will tell you all!" (and he told him more than all!) "Your proprietor left for Canada during the Easter Recess; he was taken ill in Montreal; he is on his way back, and he will be home next week."
>
> Mr. Price nodded, and at the same time inwardly admired the omniscience of the Government.
>
> "Now, Mr. Price," continued Evans, still gazing at the street opposite, "there is the promise of a peerage. These things are hardly ever mentioned, and I tell it you quite frankly. If that leader appears," turning round sharply, "the peerage will not be conferred, and your proprietor shall be told that that leader was the cause of it."
>
> "But, Mr. Evans," began the sub-editor blankly. Evans was suddenly determined. It was astonishing to see the change in the man. His conduct and attitude would have seemed remarkable to the most indifferent observer: to one who knew that the proprietor of the "Moon" had never been, until that moment, within five hundred miles of a peerage, it would have seemed amazing.
>
> "Mr. Price," said Evans, rapidly and very clearly, "you are in a cleft stick. If you don't print your present issue, if you must delay it, it will cost your proprietor a heavy sum directly and indirectly. I know that. But if you do print it, it will cost him no money, but . . ."
>
> Mr. Price thought of the little home at Peckham; of the three young Prices, of Mrs. Price, and of sundry affections that grow up in the most arid and most unexpected soils; he was in an agony as to which course would least destroy him: he made one last appeal:—
>
> "May I have it in writing?"
>
> "Certainly not!" said Evans.
>
> "Very well, Mr. Evans," said the sub-editor, humbly; "I'll stop the machines," and with a heavy heart he rang the bell.
>
> Thus it was that the "Moon" came out an hour later than usual, and that the leader dealt in so singular a moment with the pestilent vices of the King of Bohemia, and of his gross maladministration of Spitzbergen, which it summoned to the bar of European opinion."

This is not particularly subtle, but it is good satire, and quite to the point. Perhaps better are the pages that deal with Sir Charles's utterances before his own servants, and the perfect demeanor of those admirable menials. But the central idea of "A Change in the Cabinet" is so superior to its artistic execution that we beg Mr. Belloc, in his next satire, to return to the ironical method he employed so brilliantly in "Dr. Caliban's Guide to Letters" and "Mr. Burden." An enfant terrible in literature is simply invaluable in these days of solemn pose and Press platitude, but an ironical enfant terrible is a far more disturbing force. There is danger, we fear, that our author may content himself with reiterating his fixed ideas, in which case the freshness and value of his satire will disappear together. But, should he take to the rapier again, concentrate his forces, and practise a little self-restraint, he might revive the art, now nigh lost, of satire—a literary instrument that, in the eighteenth century, was feared by politicians far more than our public men fear the Press. It is to the public advantage that talented men of uncompromising temperament should utter the very things which interested parties make it their daily business to conceal. The dulness of English public life arises in no little degree from its surface stream not being seen in relation to the current of human motive working beneath. It is the political satirist's function to expose official Tartufferie, but the more savage or biting is the satire, the greater necessity is there for the artist's self-restraint and expertness with his weapons, and in "A Change in the Cabinet" we certainly miss Mr. Belloc's fine deftness of hand.

ARISTOTLE'S METAPHYSICS.*

There was a touch of half-conscious malice in Jowett's idea of making Plato pay for Aristotle. He bequeathed the copyright of his works to Balliol College with the direction that the proceeds derived from their sale should be used to defray the cost of other translations, and in the first instance to subsidise a rendering of Aristotle. The first volume of this translation, which appears under the editorship of Mr. J. A. Smith and Mr. W. D. Ross, has now been published. It is the "Metaphysics," and comes from Mr. Ross's pen. Much has been written about the art of translating Plato. But the scholar who attempts a version of Aristotle has an even harder problem to solve. Whatever literary skill he may display, he will never enjoy the pleasure of reproducing a great style or giving to an immortal personality a new incarnation. The result of his work, however skilful, must needs be crabbed and bald and difficult. Yet every phrase and every particle sets a problem in lucidity, and can be surmounted only by a master of idiom. The "Metaphysics" involves a severer test of this rare skill than the ethics, the politics, or the logical books, and the ground is occupied at present by no standard translation.

We have subjected Mr. Ross's work to two tests—a straightforward reading, and a minute comparison of selected chapters with the original. It has been constructed with equal tact and conscience. It possesses in a high degree what is the hardest of all qualities to secure in a translation of Aristotle, a sense of continuity, an even flow of argument through the condensed sentences, and the packed reasoning where illustration jostles so rudely with the statement of principles. Smoothness has involved, however, no sacrifice of the minuter accuracy which attempts to render every shade and implication of meaning in the crowded particles and qualifications of the original. The terminology is, on the whole, that which has come to be in England the accepted rendering of Aristotle's carefully selected scientific vocabulary, and the text that of Christ's familiar edition. A better translation neither the scholar nor the philosopher need desire. This volume should assure a welcome to the promised series.

*"The Works of Aristotle translated into English." Vol. VIII. "Metaphysica." The Clarendon Press. 7s. 6d. net.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

No better subject than "The Inns of Court" (A. & C. Black, 7s. 6d. net), could have been chosen for a popular color book, so far, at any rate, as the London reader is concerned, and both Mr. Cecil Headlam's description and Mr. Gordon Home's illustrations should be potent agencies for reviving the interest in what remains of those historic establishments. Several of the Inns have, of course, disappeared, some within the memory of the present generation, while at least one—Clifford's Inn—is under sentence of demolition; but the four original ones remain—namely, Gray's Inn, Lincoln's Inn, and the Middle and Inner Temples—and there is still sufficient antiquity about their architecture to endear them to the student of medievalism as precious relics. The story of their origin and development is told by Mr. Headlam with genuine feeling. In the beginning they were the property of the Knights Templars, and thus, as it were, an emanation from the Crusades. Thence they passed into the hands of the rival body, the Knights Hospitallers, and thence again, about the time of Edward I., they were acquired by the societies of lawyers whose professional descendants occupy them still. A significant fact in their evolution was the long retention of their aristocratic character. Organised on the university system, they were reserved for persons of gentle blood, being exclusive in a sense that Oxford and Cambridge never knew. In the seventeenth century the university character disappeared, to a great extent, with the abolition of official instruction and certain other customs, since when, though some of the latter were revived in the nineteenth century, they have steadily become more democratic, until to-day there is little except the dinner-eating and a few ceremonial occasions to connect them with what they were under the ancient order. However, the fascination of the Inns, those both of Court and of Chancery, derives, as Mr. Headlam has clearly felt, less from their constitutions than from the people who have dwelt within their walls. They were as much the headquarters of literature as of law. It was the Middle Temple students who gave the first recorded performance of "Twelfth Night" in their Hall. Gray's Inn, where Ben Jonson worked as a bricklayer, can claim a similar honor, since it was here that the masque of "Midsummer Night's Dream" was given in Elizabeth's reign, probably under Shakespeare's stage-management. Cowper lodged in the Middle Temple, and had chambers in the Inner. In the latter, too, Dr. Johnson received Madame de Boufflers with his ungainly gallantries, while the same Inn during the nineteenth century is famous in having housed quite a line of Premiers, from Canning to Mr. Asquith. The book is a sincere and successful endeavor to give the whole history of the Inns in brief. It is illuminated, moreover, by some poignant criticism of vandalism committed on the architecture in the name of restoration, and it does well to call attention to buildings within the purlieus—buildings such as the Soane Museum—the character and contents of which are in this unseeing age but little appreciated. Mr. Home's drawings of exteriors represent, perhaps, the very best side of the London climate, and—since we see that side so rarely—are a little wanting in intimacy, a little artificial; but many of his interior scenes are, while wrought to a painstaking finish, redolent of the atmosphere and spirit of the places they picture, and, on the whole, his art is well up to the level achieved in previous volumes.

* * *

In "Lola Montez: An Adventuress of the 'Forties" (Werner Laurie, 12s. 6d. net), Mr. Edmund B. d'Auvergne gives us a good account of the career of the most famous of nineteenth century adventuresses. Of mixed Spanish and Irish blood, Maria Dolores Eliza Rosanna Gilbert was born at Limerick in 1818. Her father, an army officer who had risen from the ranks, died in India before she was seven. Her mother soon married again, and sent Lola back to England, where she began her adventures by running away with a Lieutenant James in order to avoid marrying Sir Abraham Lumley, a Judge of the Supreme Court in India. A few years later she was divorced by James, and thenceforward her career was more notorious than famous. She fascinated Liszt, the elder Dumas, and that famous journalist, Dujarier, while, as everybody knows, she became a Baroness and Countess of Bavaria, and ruled both King Louis and his people. Her influence upon nearly all those who knew her presents a remarkable psychological puzzle. She was gifted, it is true, with more than average beauty, and with great courage, but she failed both as actress and as dancer, and her attraction was due less to talent or even beauty than to some indefinable quality of personality. "Equipped," says M. d'Auvergne, "only with the education of a pre-Victorian schoolgirl, she overthrew the ablest plotters and intriguers in Europe, foiled the policy of Metternich, and hoisted the standard of freedom in the very stronghold of Ultramontane and reactionary Germany." Like many women who have made light of the conventions, Lola Montez had a vein of religiosity, and ended her days as an adherent of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America. M. d'Auvergne is inclined to whitewash his heroine wherever possible, but he can write, and has a good knowledge of the European history of the period. His chief source of information is the "Autobiography and Lectures of Lola Montez," but he supplements it by a judicious use of contemporary newspapers and memoirs.

* * *

Sir Henry W. Lucy's "Sixty Years in the Wilderness" (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d. net), is a lively and diverting series of reminiscences of the people famous in politics, art, and literature whom he has known. The thirty-six years during which Mr. Lucy has watched the doings of the House of Commons from the Press Gallery have supplied him with a great store of material, which, though he draws on it copiously for the present volume, is yet, we trust, far from exhaustion. The most interesting chapter in the book is that called "A Page of Secret History," which tells the story of the split in the Liberal ranks over Gladstone's Home Rule Bill. Mr. Labouchere has already written upon this subject, and Mr. Lucy quotes a long letter from him here, together with another from Mr. W. S. Caine. It seems that if the Bill had been modified in its financial clauses, and a provision inserted that the Irish members should still sit at Westminster, Mr. Chamberlain would have supported the measure. Gladstone was willing to modify his proposals in the direction required, but Mr. Chamberlain sent a telegram to his colleagues containing the words, "Absolute surrender," which was shown to Gladstone. As a result, the surrender was not so absolute as Mr. Chamberlain had anticipated, and the split took place. There are many entertaining anecdotes in the reminiscences, and the book is written with all the freshness and vivacity that we expect from "Toby, M.P."

* * *

The second volume of Dr. G. Carotti's "History of Art" (Duckworth, 5s. net) confirms the impression, produced by the first, of great erudition and systematic compilation. As in the previous instance, the text has been revised by Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, who has also edited the exhaustive bibliography at the end, with a view to the needs of English readers; we note, however, that the translation is by a different hand, namely, that of Beryl de Zoete. The three principal sections of the present volume deal with Early Christian Art, Neo-Oriental Art, and European Art, and, as before, the art discussed is very largely architecture, though the wall-paintings of the Catacombs and the decorative arts connected with the embellishment of buildings are treated in their relationship to the rest. According to the author's scheme of construction, the continuity of artistic development from the Early Christian Era to the beginnings of the Renaissance is preserved unbroken. In the West the

FROM MESSRS. DENT'S LIST.

A NEW HISTORY OF PAINTING IN ITALY.

By J. A. CROWE and G. B. CAVALCASELLE. A Reprint of the Original Text Verbatim. Edited and Supplemented with Notes by EDWARD HUTTON. At least 300 Reproductions of Pictures. To be completed in 3 vols. Vols. I. and II. now ready. Demy 8vo, £3 net per set.

Vol. III. will be published Autumn, 1909.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF MASTER JOHN HUS.

By COUNT LUTZOW, Hon. D. Litt. Oxon., Hon. Ph.D. Prag. Medium 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

This new and important volume, which should prove the standard work on the great Bohemian reformer, is the result of many years of original research, and the author believes that he has succeeded in drawing a picture of John Hus, from his birth in the little village of Husinec in 1369 to his burning at Constance in 1415, which embodies the noblest aspirations of his race.

CALVIN IN HIS LETTERS.

By REV. HENN F. HENDERSON, M.A., Author of "Erskine of Linlathen," &c. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

THE MYSTICAL ELEMENT OF RELIGION.

As Studied in the Lives of St. Catherine of Genoa and her Friends. By BARON F. VON HUGEL. Photogravure Portraits, 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

"The most complete and balanced attempt in any language to apply the modern scientific method to all the facts of religion on the grand scale. . . . The best-informed and most inspiring study of religion in our time—a mine for all future workers in that field."—Daily News.

LONDON'S FOREST.

By P. J. S. PERCEVAL. Illustrated by a large number of Black and White Drawings. 3s. 6d. net.

An excellent account of the attractions and vicissitudes of what, in 1641, was the Forest of Essex of 43,000 acres, and is now Epping Forest with 6,000. The many royal associations of the Forest, the annual "Easter Chace" of the London citizens (now fallen into disuse), and the three years' fight of the City against noble landgrabbers, which ended triumphantly in 1874, all receive due attention.

NEW BOOKS.

Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S.

LAMB'S TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE AND GULLIVER'S TRAVELS.

It would be hard to find any books better suited to Mr. Rackham's genius as an illustrator, than the two whose publication Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co. have the pleasure of announcing this autumn. The vagaries of Lilliput and Brobdinag, and the weird inhabitants of the Floating Island of Laputa, enable him to exercise that love of the grotesque which is one of the most characteristic features of his art: while he gives free rein to his beautiful fancy in the Romance and Faery of the "Tales from Shakespeare."

These 2 vols. will be issued at the low price of 7s. 6d. net.

There will also be an Edition de Luxe of each book, containing a specially drawn coloured illustration which does not appear in the 7s. 6d. editions. This L.P. edition is strictly limited to 1,000 copies, numbered and signed. Orders should, therefore, be placed immediately.

Price 21s. net.

Messrs. J. M. DENT & Co. have pleasure in announcing that they have now taken over many of the Publications of Messrs. Arnold, Fairbairns & Co., including all those of the St. George's Press, and the following important books:—

THE ART TREASURES OF LONDON PAINTING.

Compiled by HUGH STOKES. With many Illustrations and Plans of Galleries. 3s. 6d. net. A chronological guide to the schools of painting as represented in the public galleries of London, the collections at Dulwich and Hampton Court, and the University Museums of Oxford and Cambridge.

SAINT GEORGE.

A National Review dealing with Literature, Art, Education, and Social Questions in a broad and progressive spirit. Edited by J. HOWARD WHITEHOUSE, Secretary of Toynbee Hall. Editorial Board: W. H. Beveridge, Rev. J. B. Booth, J. A. Dale, T. E. Harvey, J. B. Stoughton Holborn, E. McGegan, D. H. Macgregor, H. Bompas Smith, E. J. Urwick.

The contributors to "St. George" have included the following:—The Bishop of Oxford, Professor F. York Powell, Mr. Walter Crane, Mr. A. E. Fletcher, Sir Wyke Bayliss, The Bishop of Truro, Mr. J. A. Hobson, The Warden of Glenalmond, Professor M. E. Sadler, Dean Farrar, Mr. J. Lewis Paton, Mrs. S. A. Barnett, Canon Scott Holland, Canon Barnett, Lord Windsor, Mr. M. H. Spielmann, Lord Avebury, John Oliver Hobbes, &c., &c.

CITY DEVELOPMENT.

A Study of Parks, Gardens, and Culture-Institutes. By PATRICK GEDDES, Professor of Botany, Univ. Coll., Dundee (St. Andrew's University). With Plan, Perspective and 136 illustrations. £1 1s. net.

Complete Catalogue sent Post Free.

J. M. DENT & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

G. P. Putnam's Sons' List

CHARACTERS AND EVENTS OF ROMAN HISTORY.

FROM CÆSAR TO NERO.

By GUGLIELMO FERRERO,

Author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," &c.

Translated by FRANCES LANCE FERRERO.

8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"The book should be read both with interest and profit by any reader of culture."—Scotsman.

"Students of the eternally arresting subject of life in the Imperial city will welcome this fascinating volume. . . . Professor Ferrero is at once picturesque and profound."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

SHELBURNE ESSAYS.

Sixth Series.

By PAUL ELMER MORE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. [Studies of Religious Dualism.

The publication of a new volume of the "Shelburne Essays," by Paul Elmer More, is a recurring event of importance in the world of letters. Like all that Mr. More writes, these essays appeal to every man whose intelligence is awake, whose curiosity about life and human nature is keen, and who wishes, as well through the broader experience of books as through the narrower personal experience, to know the world better, and, if possible, to come to better terms with it. They are chiefly concerned with religion and philosophy, but, as in the case of the studies of Pascal, Sir Thomas Browne, Bunyan, and Rousseau, with literature too in its religious and philosophical bearing.

"The studies are both well read and well thought out."

—Scotsman.

"His faith in the virtue of criticism is as was that of Matthew Arnold."—Athenæum.

 Please send for Special Prospectus of "Shelburne's Essays," Vols. 1—5.

FIGHTING THE TURK IN THE BALKANS:

Adventures with the Macedonian Revolutionists.

By ARTHUR D. HOWDEN SMITH. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"Mr. Arthur D. Howden Smith tells the story with full details in his fascinating work."—East Anglian Daily Times.

"Mr. Howden Smith's book is likely to take rank as one of the most informative and valuable."—Daily Telegraph.

A HISTORY OF MODERN BANKS OF ISSUE.

With an Account of the Economical Crises of the Present Century. By CHARLES A. CONANT. Fourth Edition. With an Account of the Economic Crisis of 1907. 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

THE ART OF NATURAL SLEEP.

With Definite Directions for the Wholesome Cure of Sleeplessness. Illustrated by Cases Treated. By LYMAN P. POWELL. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

"In this volume the author has gathered all the advice of the ages on how we may woo and win sleep."—Book Monthly.

BARTHOLOMEW DE LAS CASAS: His Life, Apostolate, and His Writings.

By FRANCIS AUGUSTUS MACNUTT. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

Las Casas, the sixteenth-century historian of early Spanish-America, the devoted missionary, and the defender of the Indians who fared so ill at the hands of their Christian conquerors, is the subject of the biography entitled "Bartholomew de las Casas," by Francis Augustus MacNutt, whose translation of "The Letters of Cortes," with its comprehensive, original, and scholarly editorial equipment, has given him a high place among authorities on the history of early sixteenth-century America.

"Mr. MacNutt's biography of Las Casas is as good reading as his admirable Cortes essay."—Manchester Guardian.

THE CENTURY OF THE CHILD.

By ELLEN KEY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"Mrs. Key's book is a stimulating volume, that deserves the attention of all thoughtful people."—Glasgow Herald

"It is a challenging book by a powerful and independent thinker."—Review of Reviews.

THE HEART OF A GEISHA.

By MRS. HUGH FRASER. With a Frontispiece in Colour by LUDWIG HOLBERG, and ornamental borders and decorations by R. WEIR CROUCH. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. net.

"A pretty Japanese love tale, rendered the more so by being printed on one side of the paper only, and with decorated borders."

—Times Literary Supplement.

NEW LIST NOW READY.

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON; and New York.

brilliant growth of Byzantine art, having spread from Constantinople, kept alive the instinct that might otherwise have been destroyed by the barbarian invasion from the North; while Arab Art with its several ramifications may be traced also to Byzantine stock. What is known as Carolingian Art in the West is treated by Dr. Carotti in considerable detail, and the rise of the Gothic Art of the Romanesque, especially in central France, receives close attention. The numberless small blocks that illustrate this volume help to make it fully as interesting and as valuable as a work of reference as its predecessors.

The Week in the City.

The approaching end of the half-year has been felt rather earlier than usual, and, somewhat unexpectedly, the market went to the Bank for help on Thursday afternoon, borrowing for a week and taking money on discounts for half a month. It does not seem likely, however, that there will be any serious stringency next week, for the Bank's reserve is remarkably strong, and the foreign exchanges firm. The strength of the Paris cheque is especially notable because the speculation in Kaffirs, which three weeks ago was bringing French money to London is for the moment less active. The settlement was fairly heavy, but it is impossible to say how long public interest in the market will last. Opinions still vary enormously, but there is a general impression that Americans are far too high, and on this side people are keeping clear of them, whatever may be happening in America.

The Position of the Railways.

It is a long time since English railways attracted as much departmental and Parliamentary attention as they have received during the last year. First we had the Conference that reported the other day on amalgamations and a number of other subjects; then the report of the Committee on railway accounts; then the White Paper on the Midland-North-Western-L. & Y. agreement, and lastly the appointment of a committee to consider the legal aspect of amalgamation. It is to be hoped that something worth having will result from all these deliberations; but, quite frankly, the tone adopted by the railway managers on the railway accounts committee does not bode well for the future. Men appointed to serve on a committee ought to treat their fellow-members with a certain amount of courtesy, and even if you happen to be an expert you need not regard your less fortunate neighbors with open contempt. Meanwhile the Railway market is fairly strong, and those best qualified to judge are decidedly hopeful.

The Hudson's Bay Report.

The Hudson's Bay report was certain to be a bad one, and it turns out to be quite as bad as was expected. The land receipts which are still being swollen by the record sale of two and three years ago have fallen off only by £5,000, but the fur and trading profits are reduced by over £61,000, or 43 per cent. In fact, the net profits from this source are not half as large as they were two years ago, but it is scarcely likely that there will be another bad season this year, and as the prices obtained have been satisfactory the accounts twelve months hence ought in this respect to be a good deal better. The weak spot in the next few years is likely to be the land receipts which will suffer from the great reduction that has taken place in the sale since 1907. The farm land sold in 1906-7 was 140,089 acres; in 1907-8 it was only 21,214 acres, and last year only 25,449 acres, so that the instalments paid in on account of recent sales will be remarkably small for at least another three or four years. The sales of town lots amounted to £69,022 last year, against £334,312 in 1906-7, and £401,495 in 1905-6. This severe slump proves how speculative the land business of the Company really is, and how dangerous it is to buy the shares at high prices in a boom. In the long run, however, the value of the property should be safe enough, though exact calculations are not altogether to be trusted.

The Honduras Railway.

The credit of Honduras stands deservedly low, and a correspondent who has just returned from Central America tells me that it is impossible to regard the prospects of the foreign bondholders of Honduras in an optimistic light. The Honduras debt, he writes, on which no payment has been made since 1870, now amounts, interest and principal, to over £20,000,000—a sum which cannot be deemed extraordinary, seeing that the money was originally borrowed at 10 per cent. All that the Honduras nation and bondholders have to show for this is a railway fifty-six miles inland from Puerto Cortes. With a view to extinguishing this debt, the Honduras Government proposed to hand over to the bondholders this railway and the wharf of Puerto Cortes, and also to pay to an American gentleman, Mr. Washington Valentine, the sum of 70,000 dols. gold in lieu of certain rights which he had on the two properties. The transaction was to be effected on April 30th last. However, at the stipulated date the Honduras Government failed to produce the dollars, the transaction fell through, and matters are at a deadlock. The Honduras Government is trying to get the United Fruit Company to come to the rescue, but facilities for shipping bananas are frequent upon the Central American and Colombian coast, and it is doubtful whether Honduras could make it worth the while of that astute company to engage in a transaction which certainly has been the reverse of remunerative during the last generation. The Consul of Honduras remarks: "The only public railway in the country, consisting of fifty-six miles inland from Puerto Cortes, is much in need of repair, its present condition being such as to cause constant derailment, the result being to bruise the fruit carried and seriously to affect the selling price it can command in the market of New Orleans." We have been informed by a prominent gentleman in the legal profession of Honduras that the railway was leased to Mr. Washington Valentine for a term of years at 25,000 dols. per annum. Considering that the receipts were estimated for the year 1906 at 500,000 Honduras dollars, Mr. Valentine cannot be said to have made a bad bargain; but, our informant says, the Government was preparing for war, and, urgently desiring cash, could not afford to look into the future. The foreign bondholders will still have to wait. It is said that the loans were originally raised on exorbitant terms, and ought to be scaled down. In any case, the railway, in its present condition, is not a very hopeful asset, until a considerable amount has been laid out upon it. The "Picayune" observes: "The road is in a worse condition, and wrecks are of weekly occurrence. For the most part, the rails now in use are of the lightest type used in 1870 when laid. Repairs have been made here and there, but for the most part the entire line is laid with those old iron rails of the type of 1870. The banana growers have a fine prospect for a good harvest, but their dependence on the railroad for transportation in its poor condition renders their position absolutely hazardous." The record of Honduras, from a financial point of view, is very evil, nor is it improved by the subserviency of the Government to Nicaragua. It is only through the knowledge that coercion would be applied by the United States fleet that Honduras was induced to accept the first award of the new Peace Court. If it be found possible to suppress the incessant revolutionary tendencies which are constantly perturbing Central America and embroiling one Republic with another, there would be a chance of prosperity, but until political conditions in Honduras, Nicaragua, and Guatemala are improved, the prospects of peace and financial regeneration are not bright.

Lucellum.

8vo, pp. iv. + 650. Price 12s. 6d. net.

Inland Postage 5d.

STRENGTH & DIET

A Practical Treatise, with Special Regard to the Life of Nations.

BY THE

Hon. R. RUSSELL.

"Admirable. . . . We heartily recommend the book to our readers."—Practitioner.

"Should be in every household. . . . Of extraordinary interest."—Physical Education.

"A treasury of valuable information on the important subject it deals with."—Literary World.

"Exceedingly efficient."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The indictment is unanswerable."—Westminster Gazette.

"An immense amount of interesting and valuable matter."—Manchester Guardian.

"A book to read and to ponder over."—Daily Express.

"Handled in a masterly way. . . . Thoroughly interesting."—Table.

"Every public man in every district should know this work."—Gloucester Journal."

"One of the best books written on the subject."—Speaker.

"A fine encyclopaedia."—Rapid Review.

"Remarkably interesting."—Yorkshire Post.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

VOL. IV. CONCLUDING THE WORK. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Cambridge Natural History. Fully Illustrated. In Ten Volumes. 8vo. Price 17s. net each.

Volume IV.—Crustacea. By GEOFFREY SMITH, M.A., and the late W. F. R. WELDON, M.A. Trilobites. By HENRY WOODS, M.A. Introduction to Arachnida and King-Crabs. By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.R.S. Eurypterida. By HENRY WOODS, M.A. Scorpions, Spiders, Mites, Ticks etc. By CECIL WARBURTON, M.A. Tardigrada (Water-Bears). By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A. F.R.S. Pentastomida. By A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.R.S. Pycnogonida. By D'ARCY W. THOMPSON, C.B., M.A.

 Complete Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, post free on application.

Greek Architecture. By ALLAN MARQUAND, Ph.D., L.H.D., Professor of Art and Archæology in Princeton University. Illustrated, Extra Crown 8vo, 10s. net. [Handbooks of Archæology and Antiquities.

Australian Socialism. An Historical Sketch of its Origin and Developments. By A. ST. LEDGER, Senator for the State of Queensland in the Commonwealth Parliament. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Notes from a Knapsack. By GEORGE WHERRY, M.A., M.C.(Cantab.), F.R.C.S., Member of the Alpine Club. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

LIEUT. SHACKLETON AND THE SOUTH POLE.

By MAJOR-GENERAL A. W. GREELY.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Daily News

is now printed simultaneously in London and Manchester.

The History of "The Daily News" is part of the History of modern England. Since its foundation by Charles Dickens in 1846, "The Daily News" has consistently fought for the Liberty of the People, for Social Progress, for all that makes life worth living.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

London Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW

For the best statement of the case for the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission see the

CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH

OF NEXT WEEK (JUNE 30th, 1d.)

The following writers will deal with the Minority Report—

Mrs. Sidney Webb,
Mr. Sidney Webb,
The Rt. Hon. Sir John Gorst, K.C.,
C. Bernard Shaw,
H. G. Wells,
Rev. H. Russell Wakefield,
George Lansbury,
C. P. Cooch, M.P.

NEXT WEDNESDAY. OF ALL NEWSAGENTS. ONE PENNY.

Christian Commonwealth Co. Ltd., 133, SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

Head Master: ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

PREPARATION FOR UNIVERSITIES.
CITIZENSHIP COURSE.
LEISURE-HOUR WORK.

For Copies of Prospectus, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: Miss Amy Kemp.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,

STAFFORDSHIRE.

Charmingly situated on the borders of Shropshire.

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss Esther Case, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss Esterbrook Hicks, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

ST. HELENS, CLIFTON, GLOS.

SCHOOL for a limited number of Girls of good social position. Thorough education on modern lines. Healthy outdoor life, with due attention to Games and Physical Exercise. Principals: Miss Wingate, M.A. Dublin (Math. Trip. Cambs.), and Miss Potter.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

The Scholastic, Clerical, and Medical Association, Ltd. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for Girls and Boys) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (Army, Navy, University, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "Triform, London." Telephone No. Gerrard 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK. K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
it costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." / Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other Baths; Excellent cuisine; Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—July 17, July 31.

£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, COPENHAGEN, CHRISTIANIA, &c., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1909.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 14.] SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|---|
| Diary of the Week | 477 |
| Politics and Affairs:— | |
| If it were true! | 480 |
| A Plea of Moderation | 481 |
| The Duma and the Tsar | 482 |
| The Fate of the Censorship | 483 |
| Life and Letters:— | |
| Calvin. By the Dean of Ripon | 485 |
| A Mouth of Brass | 486 |
| Art in Crime | 488 |
| The Riches of Memory | 489 |
| The Drama:— | |
| The Manchester School. By William Archer | 490 |
| Letters from Abroad:— | |
| The Meaning of the Bülow Crisis. By Ed. Bernstein | 491 |
| Communications:— | |
| The Amendment of the Law of Murder. By G. G. Greenwood, M.P. | 492 |
| Letters to the Editor:— | |
| Faith and Conduct. By Canon Scott-Holland, G. K. Chesterton, A. de B., E. Stapledon, K. Morley Horder, Geo. Croswell Cressey, and D. Hamilton | 493 |
| Miss Colenso and the Defence of Dinizulu. By the Rev. Norman Bennet and Douglas Fox Pitt | 496 |
| The Lords and the Finance Bill. By Cleveland Fyfe | 497 |
| The Effect of the Land Taxes. By R. C. Phillimore and Fred J. H. Herle | 497 |
| "The Break-up of the Poor Law." By Mrs. C. D. Rackham | 497 |
| "Our Old Nobility." By John Lewis | 498 |
| The Destruction of Dialect. By J. Slater and G. L. Browne | 498 |
| "The Coming Reality of Politics." By John McCulloch | 499 |
| A Correction. By H. T. Poole | 499 |
| Poetry:— | |
| In Cobbett's Country. By J. S. Phillimore | 499 |
| Reviews:— | |
| History for the Upper Classes | 500 |
| Prophecy and Coincidence. By A. M. | 501 |
| The One and the Many | 502 |
| The Father of the Analytic Novel | 503 |
| A Novel of Irish Character | 504 |
| Books in Brief:— | |
| Days in Hellas | 506 |
| The Volunteer of 1859 | 506 |
| Hampshire | 506 |
| Wealth and Want | 508 |
| The Week in the City. By Lucellum | 508 |

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The personnel of the Government has been slightly changed during the week. Lord Fitzmaurice has resigned the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster, owing purely to reasons of health, and his place in the Cabinet has been taken by Mr. Herbert Samuel, lately Under-Secretary for the Home Department. There are few better-informed men in England than Lord Fitzmaurice, and, as knowledge and judgment are valuable qualities in government, his retirement is greatly to be regretted. But there can be no doubt that, in mental energy and in power of work and debate, the Cabinet will gain by the inclusion of Mr. Samuel. He is not a politician of genius, and there are limits to his highly trained capacities, but a young man who is able to measure swords with Mr. Balfour without disadvantage is no slight addition even to a Cabinet of gifted men. The Government suffers a second loss in Mr. Buchanan's retirement from the Indian Under-Secretaryship, which he has filled with real distinction and usefulness. His successor is to be the Master of Elibank, an agreeable politician, who at present acts as Whip to the Scottish Liberal Members. The resulting vacancy has not yet been filled. It is hoped that Mr. Gulland, a very able Scottish member, will occupy it. It is, we think, important, considering the character of the majority, that the Radical side of the Whips' Office should be strengthened.

* * *

Meanwhile we congratulate the Liberal managers, central and local, on the tactic which has secured a union of Liberal and Labor forces in Mid-Derbyshire, where Sir Alfred Jacoby's death has created a vacancy. Mr. Hancock, the miners' agent, has been chosen as the representative of these two bodies of opinion, and the constituency is likely to accept the decision, which will have an excellent effect in the Cleveland Division. We hope that this event may be taken as a sign that Mr. Gladstone's carefully prepared and admirably executed policy of understandings between Liberal and Labor candidates, which bore its full fruit three years ago, is to be resumed. Without it there can be little hope of a Liberal return to power. The Budget forms the proper basis of such an understanding, and, though the present Parliament has revealed sources of difference and friction, the motives and the advantages of an agreement are fully as strong as they were in 1906. Rightly or wrongly, Mr. Pease is thought to entertain different views from Mr. Gladstone's on these important questions of principle and strategy. We should have thought that the precedent of 1906 could not be bettered.

* * *

After six days' debate, Clause One of the Finance Bill, which imposed the increment duty, has been carried by 296 votes to 112, a highly satisfactory majority. The discussion in the House was less interesting than the attempt of the super-rich to suggest counter-proposals to the Chancellor. The first of these alternative Budgets was Lord Avebury's. It accepted all the indirect taxes, as well as the increased duties on stamps and the revised death duties, and objected only to the land taxes and the super-tax. Unfortunately Lord Avebury made a very obvious confusion between the full yield of the taxes and their estimated yield for the financial year. Thus he over-estimated the results of the income-tax by nearly a million and three-quarters, and those from stamps by £800,000, while he took the Morrison windfall of a million as a proper basis for estimating the yield of the death duties. The effect of these errors was that he left Mr. Lloyd George the task of filling a trifling gap of four millions. The second amateur Chancellor has been Lord Cromer, who, on Tuesday, proposed to the Unionist Free Traders a reduction of the estimates—under what head?—the re-imposition of the sugar duties, the graduation of income-tax down to the smallest incomes, and a loan for the Navy. Thus German and British finance would be assimilated on the double lines of bankrupt borrowing and the oppressive taxation of trade and the poor. The admission is a valuable one, for it exactly fulfils Liberal prophecies of what these "alternative Budgets" must be.

* * *

The substantial form of this "penguin policy," as the "Westminster Gazette" well calls it, is best illustrated by reference to the actual scheme of taxation passed by the Protectionist and reactionary Reichstag, which we reproduce from Mr. Bernstein's article on another page. The figures are in millions of marks.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Increased tax on | beer | ... | 100 |
| ,, ,, | spirits | ... | 83 |
| ,, ,, | tobacco | ... | 43 |
| ,, ,, | tea and coffee | ... | 37 |
| ,, ,, | sparkling wine | ... | 5 |
| New ,, | incandescent lamps | ... | 20 |
| ,, ,, | matches, &c. | ... | 25 |
| Increased ,, | railway tickets | ... | 20 |
| ,, ,, | bills of change | ... | 5 |

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Increased tax on stocks ... | ... | ... | ... | | 15 |
| New ,, cheques | ... | ... | ... | | 7 |
| ,, ,, transfers of land, part sites | | | | | 20 |
| | | | | | 380 |

It will be seen that when the Protectionist comes to business he taxes not the foreigner but his own people, precisely as his British brethren will do when they get their chance.

* * *

Meanwhile, there is every sign that an agitation mainly conducted by men who either have over £5,000 a year, or wish to give the impression that they have it, is already breaking down. Mr. Arthur Chamberlain has made an uncompromising defence of the Budget, declaring it to be a "great" instrument of justice and relief for trade and labor, and exhorting the Government to pay no heed to the outcries of a few millionaires. At the Conference of the National Liberal Federation at Southport the Chancellor's name, on a reference by Mr. Masterman, was received with an enthusiasm which, according to the "Manchester Guardian's" correspondent, recalls the days of Gladstone, and a resolution of fervid and uncompromising support was passed by acclamation. The half-formed "Cave" in the House is also breaking up, only two Liberals voting against the first clause of the Bill. Sir John Dickson-Poynder's position, however, strikes us as somewhat equivocal. He has joined the Executive Committee of the Budget League, but he continues in and out of the House an active critic and opponent of the Bill.

* * *

On Friday week the Prime Minister declined to receive personally, from representatives of over 200 head mistresses of girls' secondary schools, a memorial in favor of women's suffrage, and he also declined to receive on Tuesday a deputation from the Women's Social and Political Union. We regret especially the first of these decisions, for no one who has any acquaintance with the history of higher education for women in this country will fail to be struck with the highly representative character of the signatories. Surely the extreme pre-occupation of Parliament with a few questions is a reason why Ministers should give the broadest possible reading to the right of petition. On Tuesday Mrs. Pankhurst and her friends practically resolved to dispute the Prime Minister's decision by force. Their deputation to the House of Commons attracted a crowd of about 50,000 people, which is said to have been on the whole sympathetic. The way was, of course, barred by the police, who handed Mr. Asquith's refusal to the women's leader. She then attempted to force a passage, and is reported, we hope wrongly, to have struck either Inspector Scantlebury or Inspector Jarvis. She was then arrested, with over 100 other women, while another band of suffragettes threw stones, wrapped in paper, at Mr. Asquith's windows. We have only to repeat our conviction that every one of these incidents adds, in the present state of politics, to the practical obstacles to women's suffrage.

* * *

On Saturday the Labor Party published a manifesto passing in review the characteristic acts of tyranny of the Tsar and his Government—all the allegations, by the way, have been suppressed by the "Times"—and protesting against his reception as an insult to national good fame. On Wednesday a not dissimilar letter was signed by Dr. Clifford, Dr. Monro Gibson, Mr. Jowett, and other Nonconformist ministers, calling on their colleagues to bring the condition of Russian prisons before their congregations, and to pray for the prisoners. On the other hand, M. Homyakoff, the President of the Duma, writes identifying the deputation now in this country with the Monarch, and stating, we think mistakenly, that the Labor manifesto does not reflect the general opinion of the British people. M. Homyakoff's action is endorsed by the leader of the Cadets, who declares that everything has been changed in Russia since the things of which the manifesto complains were possible.

* * *

As a result of his defeat in the matter of finance Prince Bülow on Saturday offered his resignation to the Kaiser, who refused it "until the labors for the reform of the Imperial finances should have produced a result of a positive kind which the Federal Governments could accept." Prince Bülow has lost no time in explaining this communiqué. He means to retire as soon as some kind of financial reform has been settled by arrangement with the Conservative-Clerical majority, a business which should take only a few weeks. The policy of dissolution urged by the Radicals and Liberals has been rejected, and although the "Kölnische Zeitung" suggests that this is because Prince Bülow was thrown over by the Federal Council, it is highly improbable that the Chancellor himself would have recommended so risky a step. The restoration of the Centre to authority, of course, means the end of the bloc as well as of Prince Bülow. No official hint has appeared as to Prince Bülow's successor, but Count Wedel, the Governor of Alsace, is one of the newspaper favorites.

* * *

The Persian Nationalists are reported to be advancing on Teheran in two bodies, the united Bakhtiaris from the south and the "Constitutionalists"—promptly re-christened "revolutionaries" by the "Times"—from Kazvin in the north. They declare loyalty to the Shah, but they naturally object to the advisers who with him have broken the Constitution. The Russians now openly advocate an expedition in force to Teheran, the moderate papers joining with the reactionary organs in pressing this course. The "Times" has the audacity to excuse and recommend it, though it involves a Russian occupation and eventually annexation of Northern Persia, with our co-operation in the destruction of Persian Constitutionalism. This can hardly be the view of our Foreign Office.

* * *

On Wednesday Lord Charles Beresford made an important speech on the naval question before the London Chamber of Commerce assembled in Merchant Taylors' Hall. On the whole, the address was on the lines of good sense and statesmanship. Lord Charles criticised both the tone and substance of our complaints of Germany, rebuked the sensationalism which started the race in "Dreadnoughts," and poured scorn on the "wild men" who proposed two British keels to Germany's one, and would thus "bankrupt the country." On naval policy he opposed the undue concentration of the Fleet in home waters, complained of the absence of a General Staff for the Navy, that is to say of a Department constructing plans of war, and then proposed his own naval programme. Its chief features were the laying down of ten more "Dreadnoughts" by 1914, which would give us twenty-six to Germany's twenty-one, or sixty-six powerful battleships to Germany's forty-one, a preponderance which he thought "sufficient." These ten ships were to be supported by eighteen second-class cruisers, eighteen cruisers for the protection of commerce, twenty-four large "anti-destroyers," and fifty-two torpedo boat destroyers—hardly a reinforcement of the fighting fleet. These additions would require 16,000 more men by the spring of 1914, while the maximum cost of the programme would be sixty millions, spread over five years. The meeting passed the usual parrot motion for more "Dreadnoughts" at once, though Lord Charles's battleship programme is quite compatible with the maintenance of our normal rates of construction.

* * *

Francis Joseph has appointed Dr. von Lukacs his homo regius or special Commissioner to negotiate with the Independence party a solution of the Hungarian crisis. The Wekerle Ministry was wrecked two months ago by its failure to carry through the Universal Suffrage Bill or to settle the Bank question. Herr Kossuth could not form a Ministry because the section of the Independence party, led by Herr Justh, objected to a Coalition Government, and because it insisted that in place of the joint Austro-Hungarian Bank two independent banks should be set up—a demand rejected by the Emperor. The Independence party is in the majority in the Hungarian Chamber, and Dr. von Lukacs is instructed to offer its leaders an entire Independence Cabinet but for the presence of some official members, on condition that the Universal Suffrage Bill is pushed through and the Bank question postponed. It is believed that the Independence Party will consent. The alternative is the appointment of an official Ministry, the temporary suspension of Parliamentary Government, and the resumption of the struggle between the Crown and the Independence party.

* * *

The United States Senate has polished off the coal, iron, and wood pulp schedules, and is practically through with the draft. It is expected that the amendment imposing an income-tax on corporations, and the Conference with the House, will take another three weeks in all, so that Congress may escape from the heat of Washington by July 20th. A feature of the Senate's later activities is the affixing to the wood-pulp schedule of a retaliatory clause aimed against Canada. The income-tax on corporations turns out to be a modest 2 per cent., with ample allowances and exemption up to £1,000. Mr. Aldrich has revealed its true meaning by saying that he supported it as a way of defeating a general Federal income-tax, and that, in any case, it would probably be repealed in two years. The chance, therefore, of the Constitutional amendment passing to permit a Federal income-tax is hardly worth considering, and Mr. Taft's sincerity in suggesting it takes an ugly look.

* * *

The new French tariff drafted by the Customs Committee is now before the Chamber, and has been under general discussion for several days. In its present form it reveals some slight concessions to British representations, and the Government may advocate more. The only strong attack on the draft tariff so far has come from the Socialists, though one member pointed out the danger of reprisals upon the wine trade, which maintains 19,000,000 Frenchmen. M. Morel, the reporter to the Committee, scouts these apprehensions, and, in the same breath, argues that the 1892 tariff has broken down completely, but, on the other hand, the new tariff, from which everything is to be expected, is really only a slight accentuation of the 1892 tariff. The Marseilles shipping strike shows how Protection really works. The 1892 tariff gave French shipping a monopoly of the colonial trade. As a result the number of French ships trading with Algeria has dropped from seventy-four to fifty, the traffic has got into the hands of a ring, the freights on Algerian goods are several times as high as on goods imported from abroad, so that the surcharge for the benefit of the monopolists wipes out the preference on colonial products, and every now and then a strike deprives Algeria of all means of transport.

* * *

The Imperial Press Conference has come to an end, and, although we regret the attempt of agents of Tariff Reform and Conscription to manipulate it in the interests of sensational journalism, we may well congratulate its members on the general fairness and good sense of its decisions. The Government has done the bulk of the Australian press the service of assisting the reduction by the Pacific Cable Board of the cable press rates to Australia and New Zealand from 1s. to 9d. and 9½d. a word. The Atlantic rates remain unrevised. The Prime Minister seemed to think that something might be done on the Atlantic rates, but he did not directly answer the appeal for a mixed Imperial and Colonial service. On this point the Government may do well to wait until they see what comes of the promised developments of the Marconi system. The events of the last few years have shown how strong is the necessity of securing an accurate cable service between the home country and her daughter nations.

* * *

The correspondents in Fez were reporting last week the imminent downfall of Mulai Hafid. The Sultan was said to be at daggers drawn with El Glawi and the other great feudal chiefs who are his viziers, while Bu Hamara, the Pretender, was burning and killing within a few miles of the capital. Mulai Hafid, however, remained undisturbed, his viziers seem to have changed their minds, and Bu Hamara has turned away from Fez. It is difficult, owing to the channels through which Moroccan news comes, to know what is the real truth, but one may safely attribute these pessimistic rumors, the activity of the Pretender and the coldness of the viziers, to foreign intrigues. In his interviews with envoys of the Powers, in particular the French and Spanish envoys, Mulai Hafid, who is a man of iron will and distinguished ability, insisted that the evacuation of Moorish territory should be part of any settlement. The French have always had relations with Bu Hamara and agents in the Maghzen, and they may have used these as instruments to weaken the Sultan's resolution. Spain has taken the more open way of sending 17,000 troops to Melilla to "police," in other words to occupy, the Riff country.

* * *

We have received a number of letters from Holland, and also a copy of the "Handelsblad," which seem to show that one or two phrases in our recent article on Dutch politics have given some pain. We can assure the writer in the "Handelsblad" and our friends in Holland that nothing was further from our intention than to wound the proper national pride of the Dutch. We referred to their "heroic past"; there is no phrase in our article which conveys a suggestion that they are "decadent." Were they attacked, it is certain that they would make a gallant resistance. But against a great Land Power would this resistance avail them more to-day than in the Napoleonic period? Holland, like Switzerland and Belgium, is secure, less by her own strength than by the respect for her rights which jealous and rival Powers enforce upon each other. There is no "taunt" involved in stating that patent fact.

---

[The next issue of "The Nation" will be an enlarged Number, dealing specially with fiction.]

Politics and Affairs.

IF IT BE TRUE!

What we admire most in the lamentations of the land-owner over the Budget is their disinterestedness. The owner of many acres is never found grieving for himself. It is not that he minds how the tax hits him. It is that through him it deals a blow at the vast public interests committed to his charge. Here is one man who is positively compelled to sell his land at a very high figure. One might think that there was profit here, hard cash and plenty of it for the seller, work for the builder, space for those who need houses and gardens, and who have hitherto been cramped because the land was held up. But this is entirely to miss the point of view of such men as Lord Onslow. The mere outsider sees only that the land is made available for those who need it. What Lord Onslow sees is mainly so much diminution of his authority as land-owner, so much loss to the nation of the inestimable value of his overlordship. Here again is a philanthropist mourning over the charities which he can no longer dispense, the hospitals which must decay without his aid, the poor at his gate who exchange his weekly dole for the mess of pottage of a State pension and the coldness of public support. The mere outsider might think that it was better for the public as a whole to face its collective responsibility for the sick and aged, and better for the sick and aged to rely on a legal right to support than on the arbitrary dispensation of their more fortunate neighbors. But this is Radicalism indeed. This is deadly ignorance of the function of a governing class. That there should be among them those who have all the wealth and all the power and all the land, and who practise in perfection the virtues of benevolence and condescension and wise, unselfish governance, is the social ideal to be understanded not of the vulgar, but only of those born in the purple.

Here again is the ducal sufferer who, contemplating increment taxes and super-taxes, sees no resource but to jump out of the window, and is restrained only by the timely remembrance of the death duties—an attitude of mind to be paralleled only by that of the promoters of the American Coffin Trust, who sedulously kept their doings dark for fear of discouraging mortality. How many millions of humble lives, we wonder, are lived cheerfully enough on five per cent. of the fortune remaining in ducal hands after the Inland Revenue has done its worst. We may even ask how much, when the whole effect of indirect taxation is reckoned up, after the duties on tea, tobacco, beer, have been paid, and the rates on the cottage reckoned in, does the proportion which the poor contribute fall behind that of the rich? If taxation develops in the poor no suicidal tendencies, it is, be sure, because they have not the same sense of their social importance.

It is indeed a pleasing trait in a governing class that it takes all its privileges as duties, we may almost say as sacrifices. In its own mind it owns land not to draw rents from it, but to order the life of those that dwell thereon. The rents are a necessary detail, but, considered as a remuneration to the owner for the example which he sets in the art of living well, they are already most inadequate. The squire supports the hunt from a sense of duty to the county. He and he alone is definitely above such base considerations as the destruction of poultry-farming by the preservation of the fox. The rich man motors that he may support a chauffeur and raise up a new industry. Without his luxuries—of which, heaven knows, he appreciates the utter necessity to himself—where, he demands, would be the employment of all the hands that now labor for his service? Without his charity, where would be the support for these same hands in sickness, unemployment, and old age? Without his guidance, where would be the control of affairs? To him his property is a trust, and the little enjoyment that he gets from it—how little it is sages have testified, and experience supports them—is a miserly recompense for the benefit which he confers upon the world by condescending to own it. Tax him a little more, and he will do what vulgar people do when the load is piled up beyond endurance. He will go on strike. He will sell, and where shall we all be then? He will put down his fourth motor-car. He will stop his charities. Last, and worst, almost beyond contemplation, he will withdraw his presence. He will carry off the capital piled up by English labor or realised by the sale of English land to more equable climates, where taxes fall on the mere bread and clothing of common folk, and the clamor for eight "Dreadnoughts" is not heard.

It seems almost profane to say it, but some of us can contemplate all these alternatives, even the last, without loss of equanimity. It occurs to us that Lord Onslow's and Lord Clinton's land is, socially speaking, more important than their ownership of it. The calamity of the severance does not loom so large in our minds as it seems to do with these noblemen. The truth, if we must confess it, is that quite a different vista of the future is opened up for our mind. If it is really true that the Budget will cause the break-up of the great estates, if there is to be at last a free market for land, if there is a fair prospect of openings for the small holder, and a general tendency to the use of the soil on an economic basis, then we may indeed hope that the Budget will prove a turning point in our social history. The net effect of our land system in the last century and a-half is, as we read it, to be seen in the depopulation of the rural districts and the crowding of the city slums. By the long series of enclosures between the middle of the eighteenth and the middle of the nineteenth centuries the English peasantry were finally divorced from the soil. By clearings in the interests of sport the Scottish peasantry were still more ruthlessly expelled. By the absorption of the unearned increment in private pockets, and the consequent weight of taxation on building, the house famine in the growing towns was brought about, and the peasant, driven into the cities, was forced to crowd into dwellings where room was insufficient, and rent skimmed off the slow increase of wages. We think we can do without this system. We think we can do better if we take a toll of the unearned increment from the common purse, and meet out of the funds which it provides the responsibilities of social progress. If lowered incomes induce owners to part with their land to those who want to live on it, or to put it to more economical uses, to prefer poultry to foxes, or a race of relatively independent small holders to cap-touching laborers, we think it will be so much the better for the country. And if it be true that the Budget means all this, we know no better argument for the Budget.

Again, if it be true that luxurious expenditure will be diminished, we may fairly ask whether this does not mean that the sum total of necessary expenditure will be increased. If the millionaire is spending less on wines or on motor cars because he has a thousand pounds to pay in increased taxation, what, we have to ask, is the ultimate destiny of this thousand pounds? It is not thrown into the sea. It finds its way through the National Exchequer into other channels of expenditure. If it goes in old age pensions, it means just so much of increased expenditure on the part of aged people and so much more in the grocer's bill, in the baker's bill, and possibly even in the butcher's bill, so much more demand for bread, and butter, and tea, and so much more employment of the labor by which bread and butter and tea are produced. There is no theoretical reason why one penny less should be expended in the employment of labor because of this change in the form of demand. Whether in the end there is net gain or not depends on the wisdom of public expenditure, not on any such question as that which is suggested in the economics of luxury.

Finally, as to charity, some bluntness of speech must be excused. There is a beautiful beneficence and an unbeautiful, and it is a sad fact that the one too often passes unconsciously into the other. Those who give to the poor do not mean to make them dependent, but too often succeed in doing so. As our social life is organised, dependence and charity have become two sides of the same shield, and it is a fundamental part of the problem of freedom to separate them, so that charity may once again become a virtue, and dependence something unknown except for the physically unable or the mentally deficient. The road to this liberation is through the fuller assumption by the State of collective responsibilities now inadequately discharged by private individuals. When the rich man tells us that what he pays in taxes he will withhold in gifts, he is merely assuring us that this beneficent process is under weigh. If it is all true, how great may be our hopes! Our only fear is that the spokesmen of wealth exaggerate.

A PLEA OF MODERATION.

As it is permissible to be taught by an enemy, we shall take leave to say that Lord Charles Beresford's speech before the London Chamber of Commerce puts fresh heart into the party of peace and of moderation in naval expenditure. We quite understand Lord Charles's position, and we shall take no unfair advantage of it. He represents an unpopular type of naval strategy. He dislikes Sir John Fisher and his school, a view, be it remembered, which he shares with distinguished seamen and experts like Sir Frederick Richards, Sir Cyprian Bridge, and Sir William White. He has carried his feeling while in active command much further, we think, than he should have carried it. But we must recall the fact that his opposition is not merely personal, and that it concerns two vital points of naval policy and administration. The first is the concentration of the Fleet in home waters, with its "point" towards the North Sea, the withdrawal, as Admiral Richards puts it, of the "flag from oversea." Let us assume that it was wise to correct the extreme dispersion of our naval forces. But let us also remember first that that action involved a certain loss of spectacular and even of moral power, of which the visit of the American Fleet to Australia, and its brilliant reception there, was a sign, and, secondly, that it intensified and embittered the Anglo-German controversy. Far less open to question was the impropriety of the advertisement given by Sir John Fisher to the first appearance of the "Dreadnought." We have already paid in tens of millions of pounds the price of Sir John's glowing announcements of his discovery of a ship that made the British Navy all but obsolete, and enabled its competitors, who thought that they were toiling hopelessly in the rear, to start level with it. Lord Charles Beresford fairly enough described the effect of that great misadventure:—

> "We started talking about the ship, the press was full of it, and our public men were full of it. They were saying, 'Look at our "Dreadnought"; look what Britain has done; no other nation can do it,' and they said these things to a neighboring nation. They said them to a nation which is a thoroughly business nation—a nation which thoroughly understands war, and I say that it is our fault that the other nations of the world have taken up 'Dreadnoughts' and have put us back to scratch. By this advertising we have led them to consider the 'Dreadnought' theory, and it is our fault that we have got to build these large ships in order to keep up in the race which we have created by our own fault and by our arrogant nonsense."

It is pertinent to ask with what justice the starters in the "Dreadnought" race can turn round on Germany and treat her own later adoption of this type as a deliberately planned assault on British supremacy in war-vessels? This is no idle question. At every point of the Anglo-German differences we come upon a state of the national mind, or of a section of it, which continually modifies to our disadvantage the material difficulties we have to meet. Which, for example, is the better issue for this country—that the German Navy League's demand for an expansion of the revised programme after 1911 (when it drops to almost trifling proportions) should be defeated, or that our Roseberys, and Lees, and our Councils of War with the Colonies, should frighten and irritate Germany into a further waste of her money and ours, a fresh heating of the international air? At no point, then, are temper and policy negligeable questions. They are vital; they are ever-present; they control the whole situation, and if we are to choose well our ships and the men who fight them, more watchful still should we be against those errors of heart and intellect for which nations pay as dear as individuals.

Now, both on the moral and the material side of our relations with Germany we have arrived at a very critical issue. On the material point Lord Charles Beresford does not give the Government a bad lead, as far as the building of battleships is concerned. Lord Charles has been a man of war from his youth upwards; we do not know whether he would even object to our calling him a Jingo. He has been for many years in active command of a British fleet, so that in practical experience he has more to tell us than his able rival at the Admiralty. But he does not ask the Prime Minister and his colleagues to build more than ten "Dreadnoughts" between 1910 and 1914, which is his critical year. By that date, he says, Germany will have twenty-one "Dreadnoughts." We cannot see how she can possibly have more than eighteen, and she is much more likely to have sixteen. But counting the four ordered for this year, Lord Charles professes his content with a British strength of twenty-six "Dreadnoughts" five years hence, or twenty-eight with the addition of the two "Lord Nelsons," while he laughs to scorn Mr. Stead's formula of two keels to one. Now, we must point out that this end is compatible not only with the postponement of the four "Dreadnoughts" till next year, but with a reduced rate of production either in 1911 or in 1912. We can build four early in 1910, four in 1911, and two in 1912, and yet maintain, five years hence, with the aid of the "King Edwards" and other powerful and non-obsolete types of battleships, a superiority over the German Navy of at least three to two. Such a situation can be developed with the utmost calm, without a word of provocation or a sign of panic. If we must administer a dose of soothing syrup to our neurotics, we can put the construction of our second four "Dreadnoughts" into the spring months of 1910. Beyond this, on Lord Charles Beresford's calculation, we need not go. We may or may not endorse his demand for a large force of second-rate cruisers and "commerce-protectors," for that appears to raise afresh the concluded question of the concentration of the navy. Such a disposition would not greatly assist the offensive capacity of the fleet, on which the issue with a rival Power would depend. But here, in black and white, a great authority on naval war, a mighty stickler for our naval supremacy, lays down a standard of strength compatible with reasonable pleas for economy and peace. Does a Liberal Government propose to over-trump Lord Charles Beresford?

There is another consideration. An incident of note occurred during the late mission of British ministers of religion to Germany. Admiral von Tirpitz expressed informally the pain he had felt because our own First Lord of the Admiralty had not accepted his statements denying an acceleration of the German programme. Has there been any such acceleration? The German Admiralty denies it point-blank, months after the original statement was made. That denial is open to absolute proof of its good or bad faith. Some months have passed since it was first tendered. Where is the evidence of the surreptitious pressing forward of the two or the four ships—on this point of numbers we do not seem to have made up our minds—of the 1909-10 programme? It may possibly exist. But by this time it must be fully known. If Admiral von Tirpitz and the German Ambassador in London have lied to our Government, then an exemplary exposure awaits them before the public opinion of Europe. If they have somehow concealed a "Dreadnought" or two beneath the skirts of a deceiving diplomacy, the debate on the question of the four extra "Dreadnoughts" will automatically cease. But supposing this is not true, and that we have only to deal with the normal evolution of a programme whose outlines are before the world—supposing that our whole discovery was that German methods of ship-building were on one or two points a little more business-like than our own—we owe Germany an apology, and our countrymen a distinct and authoritative warning against naval scares. We have to acknowledge that we shall have to meet not twenty-one, or seventeen, "Dreadnoughts" in 1912, but thirteen, that it is conceivable we may only have to deal with eleven, and that our resources are fully equal to either emergency.

Evidence is not wanting that many of the Ministerial statements of March last were made under a misapprehension. Mr. McKenna then seemed to think that, so far as building ships and the fitting up of the new type of war vessels were concerned, Germany was almost on an equality with ourselves. But on Monday last he made a much more qualified statement of German progress. He stated that, while we had thirteen graving docks fitted for "Dreadnoughts" in existence and six building, Germany had only five and one building, and one floating dock and two building against our two building. These figures exhibit no parity of building strength between the two nations on Germany's part, and no intention to create it. We have further to envisage a real appeasement of the Anglo-German situation, and a vivid and most significant growth of the immense, and, as yet, insuperable, financial difficulties which bar the way to the ambitions of the German Navy League. In Germany, as with us, the shriekers are also the shirkers. There, as here, the workmen and the industrials, who declare for peace, silently shoulder the burden for which they have not called; there, as here, the powerful classes that fasten these pledges of ill-will on the people's backs refuse them for their own. The moral force of the war-party is broken when the war-makers proclaim themselves ready to smash their Governments rather than subscribe to war budgets.

THE DUMA AND THE TSAR.

The visit of a distinguished deputation from the Third Duma has been in itself a pleasant and gracious episode. To bring two nations together and obliterate the rivalries of an angry past is to serve the cause of both. These courtesies, however, have more than a social meaning. We have been telling the Russians how much we have learned from their literature, which is to our generation what French letters were to the eighteenth and German thinking to the early nineteenth century, the chief among the humanising influences in Europe; they have replied by affirming their debt to Mill and Spencer and Darwin. But it is not of literature or human sympathies that our official class is thinking. This visit has been cleverly designed to prepare the way for the Tsar's coming in August, and that, in its turn, is an affirmation of a political understanding which verges on an alliance. In the end, our verdict on this episode must depend mainly on our attitude towards the European policy of which it is a necessary detail. To us the risks of this entry into the struggle for predominance in Europe are more apparent than its benefits. It shatters the Concert, challenges Germany, and accentuates the competition in armaments. One desires in a partner loyalty and strength; official Russia possesses neither. The connection has little value in the struggle to achieve a balance of power favorable to ourselves, unless we can be certain that Russia, if forced to choose, will prefer our friendship to that of Germany. There lies the permanent element of doubt. It is irrelevant to emphasise the sympathies of the Russian people. The Duma has no control whatever, even in theory, over foreign policy, which continues to be an unchallenged province of the Tsar's personal authority. He will accept from us what we can offer—a free hand to occupy Persia. He will take from France what she can give—her financial support. But he dare not break with his German neighbor. Poland is worth a score of Persias. Nor have we anything tangible to offer him comparable to the subtle flattery of the Kaiser's public recognition of his claims to rule by right divine. The connection, in short, seems to us a deviation from a Liberal policy in Europe, and, moral judgments apart, we doubt its value as a factor in any stable or efficient diplomacy.

The debate on the ethics of this connection has turned, in this country, mainly on the bearing which it may have upon the internal situation in Russia. In the early years of the Constitutional struggle, in 1905 and 1906, this was a vital question. We were clear then, and the Russian Liberals at that time agreed with us, that a refusal to assist the autocracy with loans, or to enhance its prestige by diplomatic support, would have aided the popular cause. Russia was then in a period of revolution, and even the Liberal Cadets (Constitutional Democrats) supported, first, the general strike, and then the idea of passive resistance. Clearly, if they were going to refuse to pay taxes, we ought also to have refused to subscribe to loans. The revolutionary period, however, came to an end with the destruction of the second Duma, not because liberty had been won, but because the opposition has been outmanœuvred. The Liberals have completely revised their strategy; the Socialists, who have refused to compromise, have been utterly crushed. Even men so sanguine as M. Miliukoff have jettisoned most of their hopes. In 1906 they thought they could secure responsible party government on the British or French model. To-day their dream is to attain, in the course of some years or even decades, a measure of liberty comparable to that which Prussia enjoys. The doctored franchise ensures a permanent Conservative and land-owning majority in the Duma; their utmost expectation is slowly to emerge from the system of martial law and arbitrary administration which prevails at present, into a condition in which personal liberty, toleration, and free speech will be nearly so secure as they are in the German Empire. They cannot win these ends by force. They are busy, therefore, in magnifying every simulacrum of a Constitutional right, hoping pathetically to placate the Tsar, to mollify the Ministry, and to influence the Conservative Octobrists. Merely to keep the Duma in being as a nucleus for future growth seems to them an immense achievement. Its bare survival is a sort of victory; at the worst it is the only free platform that remains. Their tactics have been transformed, and even when they venture to denounce the Black Hundreds they are careful to abstain in public from mentioning the fact that the Tsar is their patron and protector. They affect to treat him as a Constitutional monarch, much as the ancient Greeks called the Furies the Well-Disposed Spirits, in the hope that they would try to earn their name. These may be wise tactics, but we have our doubts. The Duma survives only because it is nearly impotent; if, some years hence, it tried to assert itself its fate would still be uncertain. Moreover, in every village, with the gradual destruction of the Mir (the village commune), aided by famine and over-taxation, a proletariat is being created which may, in the end, defeat, by its angry despair, these hopes of a pacific evolution towards legality.

In what way can British sympathy aid the Russian Liberals? Their own advice is clear. They ask us to consolidate the understanding, and if we cannot bring ourselves, as the "Times" does, to flatter their unspeakable Tsar, at least to give him a civil welcome. By so doing, they tell us, we may not exactly soften his heart, but at least we may prevent him from cementing his connection with the Kaiser, which would in their view be disastrous to their prospects. It is an ungracious duty to question the advice of men whom we respect, particularly when they face such appalling dangers. But, frankly, we do not follow their calculations. We doubt the ability either of King or Kaiser greatly to influence such a situation as this. In a civil war a foreign Power may throw its weight into one of two scales. But in Russia there is hardly an overt struggle in progress. Let us suppose that amid the general European game of chess, the crisis in Russia became acute, and the Tsar was about to destroy the Duma. Is it probable that either Sir Edward Grey or Lord Lansdowne, relying in their diplomacy on the support of official Russia, without which they cannot have the full backing of official France, would be prepared suddenly to face isolation by giving the Tsar unpalatable advice? Would either of them threaten to break off the understanding in order to save the Duma or avenge its fate? To ask that question is to answer it. Our ruling class makes no pretence to such chivalry as this. The "Spectator" and the "Standard" and the rest of the ultra-Tory Press began to urge a Russian understanding while the Tsar was still a pure autocrat. They wanted his aid against Germany. His aid would still be valuable, even if he imprisoned two hundred members of the Third, as he did of the First and Second Dumas. It is not democratic sympathy but a Bismarckian calculation which has made this understanding. The minority, consisting of Labor and the Radical Wing, which alone in this country steadily opposes an Imperialist foreign policy, would be impotent to force a more human standpoint upon the Foreign Office. The Tsar will always oscillate between the British and the German groups of Powers, guided solely by self-interest. Our diplomacy will have enough to do to keep him loyal in external affairs, without attempting to influence his internal policy.

In this complicated situation, we must, it seems to us, be the judges of our own conduct to the Tsar. Treaties are mortal, and even rivalries fleeting. Five or ten years hence our Jingoes will have found new allies and new enemies in Europe. But while they rearrange their diplomatic pawns, we have a permanent principle to guard. To flatter or even to welcome the Tsar is to obliterate the tradition which has taught us to welcome the exile and to execrate the despot. We cannot for the sake of marking a score against Germany befriend the Tsar, without sinking to the level at which she courted Abdul Hamid. He is for us the man who dragooned his dissenters; he is the man who gave the order to slaughter a peaceful crowd on Vladimir's Day; he is the man who subsidised and encouraged the Black Hundreds while they massacred the Jews; he is the man by whose will martial law is maintained, the prisons crowded with political suspects, and Siberia peopled with untried exiles; he is also the man who made a war to further a financial speculation in which he and his Court were involved. To the faults of the weakling he has added the crimes of the despot and the persecutor. No flattery will make him a loyal ally. Our silence will not make him a constitutional ruler. But to call him our friend is to besmirch our own escutcheon, and to surrender every principle for which free men contend. Whatever else we gain or lose, let us at least preserve our self-respect.

---

THE FATE OF THE CENSORSHIP.

The Government has, we hope, taken the first step to the abolition of the censorship of the drama through the office of the Lord Chamberlain. On the initiative of Mr. Robert Harcourt, the Prime Minister has appointed a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, and the whole case is now open to the judgment, not only of this body, but of the nation. The enemies of the censorship have undoubtedly been fortified by the refusal of the Censor to license a second play by Mr. Bernard Shaw, entitled "Press Cuttings," on the ground that it contains "personalities," which, we suppose, means reflections on living people, or caricatures of them. If this is the reason actually prevailing with Mr. Redford or Lord Althorp, or both, we can only say it is not a true reason. The play, which we have read, contains no such personalities. Mr. Shaw has, it is true, introduced two characters, a Prime Minister, whom he calls "Balsquith," and a Minister of War, whom he calls "Mitchener." But neither bears the smallest resemblance to Mr. Asquith or Mr. Balfour or Lord Kitchener, and both are clearly intended not to satirise individuals, but to illustrate certain current tendencies in British politics. The most moderate intelligence applied to the play's dialogue and intention would have revealed this fact, and convinced even the Censor that "Press Cuttings," the title of Mr. Shaw's play, has nothing in common with the deliberate caricature of individuals, such as the music-halls continually practise, or—to go farther back in the history of the drama—Aristophanes used at the expense of Socrates and his friends. The play turns, in the main, on the conflict of opinion and strategy about women's suffrage which women are now maintaining with the accustomed vigor of their sex, and, incidentally, administers the antidote to the social doctrines of "An Englishman's Home." It may involve too heavy a strain on the intelligence of the Censor to ask him why he should raise these latter ideas to the level of inspiration, of which no disrespectful word may be spoken, while a free country is denied the right to laugh at conscription through the mouth of its best living comedian, or even, in face of the Japanese Alliance, to witness an old fabular presentment of Japanese life, intended for the instruction and amusement, not of Japan, but of England.

We fancy, however, that we discern in the dim depths of the official mind the stirring of the instinct which equally provokes its acts of licence and of repression. It is determined to keep the theatre "in its place"—as an entertainer rather than a critic of life. The British drama is set free to wear the fool's cap and bells or the frocks of Mayfair, but not the sober livery of truth. It may use neither the looking-glass to show the age what it is like, nor the scalpel to excise its ulcers. While the stage lies under this bond to triviality, it is equally impossible to conceive the Censor permitting us to see "Ghosts" or staying such a revival of the drama of the Restoration as "Dear Old Charlie." Pursuing this line it has, therefore, contrived, with some cleverness, to plant the literary and managerial worlds in opposite camps. The literary conscience of England, applying its mind to the drama as a powerful instrument for conveying ideas about modern life, no longer accepts its exclusion from the sphere of morals and criticism which it freely enters through the world of books. The managers, finding that, in Mr. George Alexander's phrase, they are "safe" so long as they range within the wide bounds of frivolity and convention assigned them, discourage the serious drama, and ring the changes on every type of false, broadly suggestive, or merely imitative work, provided by the ingenuity of the commercial play-maker. Relieved of responsibility for a true moral and intellectual choice of plays, they cling to the censorship, which saves them trouble and, they think, fills the stalls and costlier seats of their play-houses. But here they are in error, for they have forgotten the music-halls. The "hall" can beat the theatre both in its appeal to the average sensual, non-intellectual man, and in the closer touch with life which artists of the type of "Harry Lauder" or "Dan Leno" maintain. The managers having settled among themselves that they will run not the true, the historic, the living theatre, but a showman's booth or a beauty show, declare, in effect, that they want neither the Puritans nor the intellectuals. And having thus sold their birthright, they conclude, like other sophisticated slaves, that their service is perfect freedom. They are mistaken in their judgment of the moral and of the commercial issue. The broad fact is that the theatre, on its present lines, does not prosper.

It is at this pass that the Government has rightly intervened and decided to review the whole situation as between the play and the British public. We need not speculate over-much on what the decision of the Joint Committee will be. It must, we think, be fatal to the Censorship. No one acquainted with modern drama can defend it. It is possible to say that world-poetry and the truthful criticism of social disorders are too painful, too embarrassing, for the mixed audiences in British theatres. But Mr. Redford cannot get a body even of representative politicians to say that no Englishman or Englishwoman shall see the "Ædipus Tyrannus" on the stage, but that they and their boys and girls are free to witness "The Giddy Goat" or "The Spring Chicken." The Committee may feel less certainty when they proceed to consider whom they shall put in Lord Althorp's and Mr. Redford's place. They may choose to rest the censorship of the drama, as they rest the censorship of literature, on the ground which Milton found strong enough, the good sense of common opinion, corrected by the law. This, we imagine, would act through the public prosecutor, who would not possess the power of arbitrary closure. Or they may set up (a) a special central body, with a representative element, or (b) the local authorities. Against this latter device the managers might have a reasonable objection. Unless the power of the local councils were very carefully guarded, it would expose them to refusals by provincial bodies to license plays that had passed the more instructed opinion of the capital. No one would say that Manchester or Liverpool were behind London in the capacity to criticise drama. But we should not think it fair to open the work of Ibsen and Brieux to the kind of revision that it might encounter from the rulers of Little Pedlington or even of Pedlington Major. Truth in new forms is often accepted by the people if they can be prevented from crucifying it, but a few sympathetic or instructed intelligences usually grasp it first and pass their discovery on to the rest. If, therefore, the Committee decide in favor of any kind of licensing authority, it will probably be a central one. Such an authority, it must be clearly understood, could not be the Censor in a new dress. Both the common informer, and the power of revising plays and banning them on moral or literary or political grounds, would have to go. The licensing body should only be invoked after fair notice to the managers of complaints brought against them, managers or lessees should have the power of appearance before it, it should possess no preliminary right of censorship of literature and morals—a function that we dispense with in the case of the music-halls. We should certainly hope that a free British drama would resemble neither that of Elizabeth nor of the restoration, and that, like modern British literature, it would retain a measure of proportion, good humor, and reticence. But it is essential to create or to restore the conditions under which it may again become a living power, able to correct the conscience and to exalt the mind, no less than to reconcile man to his lot.

Life and Letters.

CALVIN.

By the Dean of Ripon.

To-morrow the City of Geneva will celebrate the 400th anniversary of the birth of Calvin, the founder of its constitution, ecclesiastical and civil, the man who made its name a power throughout the civilised world. It will call upon all who sympathise with the Reformation to join in honoring his memory. A monument is to be placed against the remaining portion of the old city walls, with statues of Calvin and the principal reformers, facing a fine promenade. On Sunday there will be special services, and on the following days receptions and expeditions on the lake, the whole centring round the laying of the first stone of the monument on Tuesday, and a commemorative visit to the University founded as a college by Calvin. Deputations have been sent from all parts of the world, that from England having been organised by a committee presided over by the Dean of Canterbury. But, though the size and composition of this Committee, which includes bishops and representatives of the various churches and members of both houses of Parliament, prove that there are many eminent men amongst us by whom the memory of the Reformer is honored, yet Calvin is not, we imagine, appreciated by us as regards the most important and enduring parts of his work. He is known to most men either simply in connection with the doctrine which bears his name, and which is taken abstractedly and in its harshest sense, apart from its historical position, or else as the author of the prosecution of Servetus, the eminent physicist, which led to his condemnation as an Arian and to his death by burning. It may be as well, therefore, to touch at once upon these two points.

No one would, at the present day, seek to justify the burning of heretics; but in the 15th and 16th centuries it was not only the established custom, as the English Statute De Hæretico Comburendo shows, but an Act of Faith, as it was called in Spain. Calvin, who was bound by law, as the head of the Company of Pastors, to bring before the magistrates of Geneva a man who had already been condemned in France, pleaded before judges who had less inclination to leniency, and could not even prevail on them to substitute decapitation for burning. It would be useless to deny Calvin's complicity; but the strange thing is that, while in the case of other great men such things as this are overlooked, this one act of Calvin's has been allowed to besmirch his whole character. No one remembers against Sir Thomas More that he brought heretics without number to their doom, or thinks of Cranmer as writing of Frith, on whom he had sat in judgment, and who was condemned merely on the question of Transubstantiation, that "he would go in a few days to the fire." Surely in Calvin's case we may blame the age rather than the man: the time of toleration was not yet. But those who are now honoring Calvin have honored Servetus also, and have set up an expiatory monument on the place where he was burned.

It may be said truly that this act followed naturally from the extreme manner in which Calvin asserted the doctrine of Predestination. But here also he should be judged as we judge of St. Augustin, whose influence is largely responsible for these extreme views: and, what is more important, we must consider what gave so much importance to the doctrine of the Divine Sovereignty at the time of the Reformation. The Reformers were engaged in a life-and-death struggle against such things as indulgence and the worship of relics and of saints. For resisting these Huss had been burned and Luther banned. Here, they said, are inventions of men, by which the Christian conscience has been perverted, but which are enforced as necessary truth. We demand, they said, that "the whole of this rubbish should be carted away," and that there should be a return to the teaching of the New Testament: neither the Pope nor any other human power can we obey: God, not man, must be supreme. This great conviction was the strength of their position. It is true that, when translated into predestination, the doctrine was urged to the point of extravagance, though hardly further than it had been urged by St. Augustin, and that the idea of Reprobation, at which Calvin himself stood aghast, and spoke of it as a Decretum horribile (meaning, however, an awful, not horrible, decree) is a monstrous one, although the reformed churches in Holland, Scotland, and America have only of late years struggled out of it. It is true also that the more modified form of Predestination—that of Election—was misunderstood, being taken as a blessing to the person elected instead of as a call, as St. Paul expressed it, "to be conformed to the image of the Son" —that is, a call to pre-eminence in work and in suffering for the good of mankind. But the consciousness of God's Sovereignty has always been a fortifying power to those who have received it. Look at Coligny in France, or Maurice in the Netherlands, or the best of the Puritans in England, or Jonathan Edwards in America, and you will feel that Calvinism has been the parent of strong men.

And Calvin himself was emphatically a strong man, strong through the wisdom and courage which result from faith and righteousness. Renan said of him that he was the most Christian man of his generation. Hooker, while opposing some of the deductions of the Puritans from his system, says: "For my part, I think him incomparably the wisest man that ever the French Church hath enjoyed since she enjoyed him." He found Geneva a small, weak commonwealth, which had just freed itself from the power of a Prince Bishop and had embraced the Reformation, but turbulent, fickle, and corrupt. He left it, at his death, after little more than twenty years' work, a well-ordered city, with institutions which lasted almost down to the present time, and described by those who visited it as a City of God.

The centre of all his authority was the enforcement of Christian morality, and his weapon of discipline was excommunication. He would rather die than admit evil livers to the Communion. This was resented at first, and Geneva, with its party of Libertines, was in the condition of Florence when Savonarola was opposed by the Arrabbiati. Calvin was exiled to Strasburg; but, after two years, he was entreated to return to Geneva, and he returned to reign. He settled the constitution, with its Greater and Lesser Council and its governing Cabinet, but at their side he placed the Consistory and the Company of Pastors, who had a right to be heard when any law was proposed. He divided the City into districts for the care of the poor, under voluntary Hospitallers, and made provision for the instruction of all the citizens in religious knowledge. And all this was done under the sanction of religion. No one could be a citizen without giving his assent to the doctrines of the Catechism which Calvin had prepared at the beginning of his work. This Catechism is, like that of the Church of England, a simple exposition of the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Decalogue, and the Sacraments. There is no "Calvinism" in it, although when it was composed Calvin had already published his great theological work, the Institutes. To this demand for Christian conformity Rousseau submitted when he claimed his citizenship in 1754, and he defends it by saying that the confession of faith is the expression of the universal Gospel.

The activity of Calvin in every part of his work was extraordinary. He was a most diligent pastor: he preached and lectured assiduously. The Commentaries on almost the whole of the Bible, which he at times labored at all through the night, are far in advance of those of his time; indeed, of almost all until the modern critical era: they are human, direct, practical. Compare, for instance, his treatment of the "Servant of the Lord" in the second part of Isaiah with that given in the "Speaker's Commentary" as late as 1875, and you can hardly doubt that the superiority rests with Calvin.

There can be no doubt that Calvin's character was austere and inflexible; but there seems to have been nothing morose about it. He inspired affection as well as respect, and at times he showed a touching humility, as when, in a time of controversy with Luther, he exchanged greetings with his great antagonist, and said that, even if Luther should call him a devil, he would never cease from owning him as a true servant of God. He was fond of society, so far as his work allowed time for it: he had been known in his early days for his wit and vivacity, and in later years he would play quoits and bowls: nor did he join in the wholesale condemnation of the theatre by some of his brother ministers.

His immense influence also was used on the whole in the cause of moderation, as may be seen in his dealings with England if we contrast them with the demands of the Puritans in the next generation. Though a Presbyterian, he refused to condemn the Episcopal system in England—each church, he held, must settle its own government. His advice was given in favor of the alterations made by the second Prayer Book of Edward VI.; but, when the exiles at Frankfort during the reign of Queen Mary consulted him as to attempts to go further, he recommended them to desist: the things they wished to expunge, he said, might be foolish, but they could be accepted—they were "tolerabiles ineptiæ." He would not even condemn the use of wafer-bread in the Sacrament where the people were attached to it. He constantly refers to the works of the Fathers, and even of the Schoolmen he speaks in gentler terms than those used by Bacon—they were trying, he said, to reason out their faith. His letters to sovereigns and other leading persons were received with great respect, especially those to our Edward VI. and Elizabeth; even so moderate a man as Archbishop Parker entreated him to write frequently to the Queen.

In other Protestant countries Calvin was a power of the first magnitude, and Geneva became under him the model of a Christian community, a centre of light, and a city of refuge for the persecuted. Its Constitution stood firm amidst all the storms of the next generation, though constantly endangered by the attempts of the Duke of Savoy—attempts which only ended on the memorable night ("The Long Night" of Stanley Weyman's novel) in 1605, when the escalade was frustrated. The power of Calvin did not die with him, but produced the marvel of a little Republic living and making itself felt during the troubles of four agitated centuries: nor would it be possible to find a community of a similar size during all those centuries which has added so much to human progress. We may well join our English voices to those of the whole Protestant world in celebrating the 400th anniversary of the birth of the great teacher and statesman of Geneva.

---

A MOUTH OF BRASS.

It has been possible in old days for patriots and poets to speak of their country with a certain dignity and reserved, though proud, affection. It has been possible, even when the country was at the height of wealth and dominion, and very easily possible when she stood in peril either of oppression from without or of internal ruin through her own errors and perversion. We need hardly recall the noble utterances of patriotism from the psalms in Zion's praise ("When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion," "My feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!" "By the waters of Babylon," and so many other immortal verses) —from these outbursts of Zion's praise right down the course of nations to John of Gaunt's lines on England, and Ireland's "Dark Rosaleen," and the odes to France. Patriotic utterances are probably the most familiar passages in all literature.

It would be hard to decide what to choose as the greatest embodiment of the praise of country, but many would turn to Virgil when, like a farmer coming from his vines and bees, and beholding far-off the towers of a lofty city, with rivers sliding under its ancient walls, he, too, is stirred to devotion before the greatness of Rome, that revelation of divine accomplishment, that fairest sight the world contained. But nobler, perhaps, even than the spirit of reverence and trust pervading Virgil's aspect of Rome was the account of his country's greatness given, not by a poet, but by the Athenian statesman. One remembers how in that model of restrained and accurate eloquence, Pericles spoke of the beauty and elegance of Athenian life, the splendor of the public holidays, the peculiar freedom of intercourse in which no one scowled or looked black at his neighbor, the open-hearted tolerance for all foreigners, and the sympathy with the poor, whom no one despised, though, to be sure, if a man could save himself from poverty, so much the better. And then the speaker dwelt upon his countrymen's freedom from barracks and all the boredom of mechanical and compulsory exercises, and showed how they made up for the absence of drill-sergeant discipline by retaining their quickness and versatility of body and mind, so that, in whatever situation an Athenian was placed, he could always give a good account of himself. In a word, he said, the whole country, following beauty without extravagance, and knowledge without effeminacy, had become, as it were, a liberal education for the rest of Greece.

It was an Imperial State of which he was speaking. He himself had expanded her Empire, and firmly drawn its limits. Yet it was not on the glories of arms and conquest and Imperial power that he insisted, but on his country's daily freedom, her sunny tolerance, and her way of submitting everything to open discussion, in the confidence that the heart and brain of her people would go right on the whole. Such an ideal of ordinary life and freedom of government, no matter how short-lived, was the finest inheritance that even Athens, with all her sculpture, drama, and eloquence, has left the world; and, without undue boasting, we should have hoped that among succeeding nations our own country had come as near as any to fulfilling it. To be sure, our people do not follow knowledge, and our County Councils do not follow beauty, but still the country has some touch of that personal freedom, that versatility of mind and body, that sunny tolerance, and a readiness to submit everything to public discussion. We had rather prided ourselves on these qualities, and hoped they were admirable or even advantageous.

But now, bald and inharmonious as a Spartan invasion, up comes Mr. Kipling with his "City of Brass" in last Monday's "Morning Post," and pours contempt on all our pride. Exultant with savage joy, almost as though he were the Barbarian himself, he foretells the speedy destruction of our land and Empire. We are not here concerned with the particular means of our approaching ruin. That Sign out of the Sea, that Terror out of the Heaven—we know all about the German sea-serpent with ten 12-inch mouths vomiting fire, and the Terror that flieth by night over the Norfolk Broads. But the causes of our impending overthrow are interesting, because they are just the things on which in our hearts we rather flattered ourselves, thinking we deserved something of the eulogy of Pericles.

When Mr. Kipling affects the prophet, no one can ever be quite sure what he means; but, with some hesitation, we take it that he traces the ruin of our country to our tolerance in daily life, our pleasure in public festivals, our objection to drill-sergeant discipline, our love of personal freedom, our belief in the general heart and brain of our people, and our desire to believe in the same powers of self-government in others. To show that our doubts as to the exact meaning are well founded, let us recall a few typical lines from the effusion:—

> "As for their kinsmen far off, on the skirts of the nation,
> They harried all earth to make sure none escaped reprobation,
> They awakened unrest for a jest, in their newly-won borders,
> And jeered at the blood of their brethren betrayed by their orders,
> They instructed the ruled to rebel, the ruler to aid them;
> And since such as obeyed them not fell, their Viceroys obeyed them."

To the second line we can attach no meaning whatever, but we hope there is one that escapes us. The third and fourth lines appear to contain a shameless misrepresentation of the South Africans; the fifth and sixth, almost beyond question, contain a libel on Lord Minto. And so, through seven indefinite stanzas, the thing goes on—an obscure and unmusical outpouring of jargon, directed against this country, and especially against those particular qualities of freedom and tolerance and kindliness which we believe to be our country's noblest distinctions in history.

But worse than the obscurity and the hideous style, worse even than the attack upon England's highest ideals of life, is the temper of the attack. We know the mood of the poet who loves his country with a passion far beyond the common patriot's, and whose heart is torn with indignation at the sight of her errors, at his knowledge that she is departing from the great conception of her which his mind has formed. We know the proud scorn of Dante, and Milton's sorrow refusing comfort. There is a closer case in Wordsworth when he traced what he believed to be the signs of his country's corruption, because in her boundaries plain living and high thinking were no more, and peace, and fearful innocence, and pure religion had gone; and because men changed swords for ledgers, and deserted the student's bower for gold. Yet consider to what a passion of repentant love the thought of such reproaches drove him, with the anguish of one who for one moment has dared to detect a single fault in the beauty of his beloved's soul; "Now when I think of thee," he cries:—

> "Now when I think of thee, and what thou art,
> Verily, in the bottom of my heart,
> Of those unfilial fears I am ashamed.
> For dearly must we prize thee; we who find
> In thee a bulwark for the cause of men:
> And I by my affection was beguiled:
> What wonder if a Poet now and then,
> Among the many movements of his mind,
> Felt for thee as a lover or a child."

Of such mood there is no trace in Mr. Kipling's "City of Brass." There can be no trace, because, as it appears to us, the Imperialist poets, of whom Mr. Kipling was the genius and, together with Henley, the originator, have loved England for her weakness and not for her strength. Other poets have sung a country dear for her reputation through the world. "Rule Britannia!" is not a great poem, but it was written to sustain our own freedom when we were at issue for its existence. Campbell's battle-odes have the splendor of a contest against almost overwhelming power. Tennyson's "Bury the great Duke" was a grave incitement to maintain the stern ideal of duty and honour and devotion along whose paths the poet loved to think of our country moving. But with the Imperialist poets of fifteen years ago came the degrading note of brag and swagger—the spirit that cried in its own applause, "Judge, are we men of The Blood?"—that thought it virile to trample on the weak, and delighted in the conquest of little peoples because England's "whelps wanted blooding."

Henley, with his "Storm along, John!" was bad enough, no matter how bravely he made the bugles of England blow. Mr. Edgar Wallace is a true soldier-poet on his own line, and he has the advantage of writing on soldiers and war from the inside and not as a spectator; but when he imitates Mr. Kipling in his patriotism and not in his dialect only, he descends to such bathos as the conclusion of "The Sea-Nation":—

> "For us the seven seas in one:
> For landlocked hordes—oblivion."

Even Davidson, in his posthumous book of "Fleet Street," musts needs end his varied and unequal struggle after poetry with an Imperialist ode that is of a piece with any Jingo's swaggering doggerel:—

> "Sea-room, land-room, ours, appointed ours,
> Conscious of our calling and the first among the Powers!
> Our boasted Ocean Sovereignty, again and yet again!
> Our Counsel, and our Conduct, and our Armaments and Men!"

One of our leading wits has lately compared the Imperialist to the cuckoo, because, among other obvious reasons, he always sings the same note. That note has now become a danger and degradation to our country, besides being an intolerable bore. But we all know of the cuckoo that, as the time approaches when, according to the country-people's saying, "in Augúst Go he must,"

his note begins to fail and he can only get through one-half of it. May we not hope that the sound of failure and querulous disappointment in "The City of Brass" is a sign that the poetic August is also coming and the Imperialist monotony will at last cease dinning in our ears?

ART IN CRIME.

The annals of crime stand at an exceedingly low level of human interest in this country. The ingenious imagination of a De Quincey could discover no "fine art" in the alcoholised brutality of our modern murder; the romantic figure of the highwayman has vanished from our roads, nor has his place been filled here by his true lineal descendant, who, in America or Australia, succeeds occasionally in holding up a train and relieving the passengers of their valuables. Much intellectual skill is, no doubt, shown in the career of a fraudulent company promoter, or, upon a less magnificent scale, in that of the professional letter-beggar. But the detailed intellectuality of such pursuits cancels that popular sympathy which, save in cases of sheer malignity or cruelty, is apt to qualify the reprobation of the bolder sorts of crime. Since the violent ending of Charles Peace we do not recollect, in this country, any instance of a criminal of the older order who appeared to take an intelligent pride in his profession and to desire to impart a finish to his practice. Those who retain a feeling for the romance of crime find little satisfaction in our criminal courts, and are driven to the more or less convincing fabrications of De Boisgobey or Dr. Conan Doyle. It is this growing rarity of artistic crime that has given so much public interest to the case of King and Roberts, alias "D. S. Windell," just concluded at the London Sessions. "To rob a bank" is itself an arresting phrase, containing, so to speak, a supreme challenge to the sanctity of property. Not even a Radical Chancellor of the Exchequer in extremis would dare to rob a bank. The audacious simplicity of the plan by which these two young men extracted a large sum by a simultaneous raid upon the branches of a London bank, gave the note of distinction to their crime. To the ordinary human being there always remains some feeling of reverence, almost of religious awe, in entering a bank, where the real object of human worship appears to dwell in an apparent infinity of glorious sheen. Here every person of the meanest property has regular communion with the fountain of commercial power. Safe within safe, strong-room, barred and locked with force and craft, keep secure the sacred stuff. So it would appear. Yet up drives "D. S. Windell," a young adventurer, in a taxi-cab, waving a magical piece of paper, and, piercing all these barriers, carries off the "swag." An achievement as disconcerting to our sense of security as it is reprehensible to our sense of right.

But the case calls up other considerations than those of romantic interest. It is not, indeed, possible to question the obligation of any civilised society to put away such men as King and Roberts. But it may be worth while trying to understand an act which cannot be condoned. In the case of both young men there are circumstances that help to make their conduct, though not pardonable, at least intelligible. Society will continually have to reckon with cases of violent revolt against the grinding mechanism of her institutions, her routine of industrial materialism, and of spiritual conformity. One cannot condemn society, whether it operates through State or Church or School, or other instrument; it must impose upon the individual will a measure of forced or half-forced conformity. But where this required conformity is excessive or where it is imposed on natures of truculent independence, there will be revolts, and certain sorts of this revolt will rank as crime. Though there may be some element of falsehood in the account given of these young men and of their motives, some of the facts revealed at the trial are of material aid in assisting us to "construct the crime." A childhood crushed under the rigors of a Plymouth Brother household is an ill start in life, storing in the plastic mind immense capabilities of violent recoil. From such a boyhood to the counter of a bank! To stand all day and every day in the engine house of our industrial system working the dynamos of finance, watching the continual flow of power belonging to a great impersonal being, a Company, forbidden on pain of extinction to divert the smallest trickle to meet the strongest of his personal needs or desires—this is a hard situation for a weak, a reckless, or a coldly selfish man to occupy! There is something intelligible enough in King's explanation of his temptation, as he stood there with hundreds of thousands passing through his hands on a salary, after fourteen years' service, of £150 a year. We do not hesitate to rank as particeps criminis a company which couples such responsibility and discretion with a salary so inadequate to support a family in the standard of comfort which a cashier of a bank is supposed to be able to maintain. The brief comment of the Recorder that "If he was not satisfied with his salary he could have left," betrays some want of imagination. It is, indeed, true that many men, perhaps most men, settle down with tolerable ease into any mould, however unyielding, prepared for them in the great machines. Even put into a bank, on the wage of a hodman, they soon come to handle streams of gold with indifference. The good, the thoroughly conscientious man feels no temptation—perhaps, if he has a little imagination, plucks a human interest from the interstices of his routine—the conventional man becomes a harmless automaton. It is only a small third class that furnishes the insurgents, falling from sheer reaction against monotony into the practices of gambling, drink, and general dissipation, which in certain crises of temptation produce the forger, swindler, thief. Now and then will there be found a man like King, who, brooding on his situation, deliberately decides to pit his skill against the financial machine which he is operating.

The case of Roberts opens up a different set of considerations. Here was a man of wholly different character and rearing, the typical cosmopolitan who flits lightly over the wide surface of civilised society, of Eastern race, with that quickness of intelligence and easy sympathy that enable him to pick up languages and acquaintances wherever he goes, unable to settle down to any sort of solid work, an intellectual camp-follower in the modern march of civilisation. There is nothing inherently improbable in the curious psychological process which Roberts describes in his confession, though an indefinite allowance may be made either for introspective posing or even for calculated influence on the Court. He may have been what he describes, the victim of an excessively romantic temperament, attracted by the dramatic audacity of the proposed crime, and "excited with the prospect of making it a reality, with myself as hero of one of the most daring and ingenious schemes of modern times." It is quite likely that the moral heinousness, and even the probable detection of his crime, may have been obscured in such a temperament by the dazzling appeal of the sensational exploit, and that the ordinary base motives of the thief may have been absent or quite subordinate. Though the necessity for repression remains, it may well be conceded that in certain orders of typically modern offences against property, some of the essential immorality of the older forms of theft has diminished. It is improbable that a man who will dodge his taxes, cheat a railway company, aye, or even rob a bank, has the same sense of deliberately injuring an innocent fellow-being, as if he picked a pocket or burgled a dwelling-house. The development of joint stock enterprise and the enormous proportion of property belonging to these companies have weakened one of the sentiments which made for a recognition of the sanctity of property, the definite realisation of the rights of other persons. A great corporation is not "really" a person; with neither a soul to be saved nor a body to be kicked, it remains an amorphous being to the ordinary man who cannot yet assign to it the same rights of property or the same indignation at their infringement as in the case of his seen individual fellow-man. Neither the modern jurist nor the modern moralist has adequately grappled with this result of recent changes in the structure of property and industry.

THE RICHES OF MEMORY.

Nobody goes out to look on a fair scene of water winding through wooded hills, of snow-capped mountains springing from pines and spearing the rosiness of heaven, of emerald and amethyst sea and basalt cliffs, just for the momentary pleasure of the thing. We go, whether we know it or not, to get a memory to feed upon in the dull times when we can only look on bricks and mortar, a possession more real than the title deeds of the most smiling valley, a possession that piles to itself increment as great as that which accrues to landed property itself. We do not properly see these beautiful things while we look at them. They are like the scene revealed on a dark night by the flash of lightning. While the flash lasts, all is too dazzling for the sight to grasp, but when it is gone we begin to remember what the eye saw as an instrument and had not time to convey to us as a messenger. The messages coming in one after the other, as the single nerve "clears" for them, make up a fuller picture than could possibly be caught in the space of a lightning flash.

Some of our best eye-pictures no doubt fade and are lost. They lacked something of the keeping qualities, as some painted pictures unfortunately have done. But there are some stamped on the retina of the schoolboy's eye that have since added values not appreciable to schoolboys. In a day spent round Tintern thirty years ago, we, boy-like, refused to see all that was specially pointed out and made treasure of other matter that seemed more interesting. Ever since, the things we did not deem worth a second glance have been growing into the picture, and the things exciting on that day have been duly subordinated. The duck-pond, seen from the battlements of Chepstow Castle, was then the selected thing. We have seen a thousand duck-ponds since, and that one takes no more than its due place among them, while the cliff-poised walls overhanging the river take a place in the picture apparently not dreamed of by the schoolboy.

We cannot tell how our memory pictures change. We seldom confess that they do change. We read word after word of the critical passage in Mr. W. H. Hudson's introduction to his new book, "Afoot in England,"* hoping for the confession, but not finding it. He has been telling, in that beautiful and convincing style that is his, of some of the perfect things seen in his rambles—especially of one accompanied by the sound of church bells suddenly shut off by a hill behind, but breaking out as a scattered echo from hills in front. "It was," he says, "as if every one of those thousands of oak trees had a peal of bells in it, and that they were raining that far-up bright spiritual tree-music down into the valley below." Then he goes on: "Here, then, I had found and become the possessor of something priceless, since in that moment of surprise and delight the mysterious, beautiful sound, with the whole scene, had registered an impression which would outlast all others received at that place." Then he speaks of the folly of going back to one of the scenes from which we have drawn one of our treasure pictures. "The charm we found in it may have been in a measure due to the mood we were in, or to the peculiar aspect in which it came before us at the time, due to the season, to atmospheric and sunlight effects, to some human interest, or to a conjunction of several favorable circumstances; we know we can never see it again in that aspect and with that precise feeling."

There is much in that "mood we were in." Who cannot remember some time when too much city work had planted upon him an incubus that would not shift, an oppression of the whole system, corporeal and spiritual, centring itself, out of need for some focus, in a feeling of definite disease, the fear of sudden death. That mood, taken on holiday to the country, yields one evening to the glorious sense of many days' freedom from work, and brings suddenly the conviction of soundness in mind, body, and limb, of invincible health and certain future happiness. The memory of that rosy sunset, of that breeze fanning the brow, of the deep lungful of wine-like air is sufficient to endow the mildest landscape with a beauty that years cannot wipe out.

The comparison between one of these memory impressions and the best picture ever hung fails utterly when we think of the sounds, scents, and sensations that go to the building up of the former, and are, in spite of art cant, entirely outside the scope of the painter. As we lie now broad-back on a hill-top and gaze into the unfathomable sky, we wonder what painter will ever dare attempt that picture. Having got in that infinite invisibility of cloud film and blue ether, can he give us the rough caress of young heather at the ear, the scent of gorse that makes the air like liquid honey, the rush of a lizard in the grass, and the click of a beetle's wing-cases as it hurriedly spreads sail and flies away, then the silence of near things, so that we hear far up in the sky the hum of the drones waiting for their queen, the summer hum that every year puzzles some new naturalist. Yet when we take away the hands from before the eyes we realise that our hill-top, our sky, the scent of gorse, the hum of waiting drones, are impressions registered seven years ago. If they are not real things, then neither are the stars we see by night real things. We never see the stars themselves, only the light that comes from them and meets our sight somewhere millions of miles nearer to us than the stars are. Even the star we are looking at may have been extinguished a year or two ago, and we may be looking at the light it then emitted for the last time. All those drones may be dead, the gorse burnt, the lizards gone, yet the hilltop remains in our picture gallery unscathed; we see it, hear it, smell it, feel it when we look into the cave of the two hands closed before the face.

We should have expected a writer of Mr. Hudson's known tastes to have put in the forefront of things remembered at least one picture of pure nature. Such were, we remember, some of the most vivid of his pictures collected in South America. There was that day when on a rare oasis he saw hundreds of snakes of a kind to this day unidentified, resting, not in coils, but flung on the green grass like brown ribbons, and coming open-mouthed at the traveller who approached within yards of them. There was another day filled with grasshoppers that rang peals of bells from the grass stalks of a little hill, again a new and beautiful humming-bird seen for a few moments and then lost, a frog that flew at his finger and gripped it with almost terrifying strength, a wasp that left a very shrewd sting on fingers that would have detained it and then vanished for ever, and last, and only last, a man with teeth all canines, a high-pitched voice and a baffling air of antediluvianism about him.

In later days, however, Mr. Hudson has discovered, as it were in spite of his predilection for other species, the attractions of Homo varians. The most arresting pages in the present book are those that deal with some of the human types or mutations met with on by-gone Easter rambles or on "Rural Rides" (on a bicycle) in Cobbett's country. The sketches are taken on an acquaintanceship of a few hours or even a few minutes, and set down from memory perhaps months afterwards. As in the case of the atmospheric memory landscapes, no doubt, a return to the actual subjects would be attended with disillusion and call for much correction. They are pictures of a by-gone mood on the part of the artist rather than of eternal facts on the part of the objects. That is to say, they are true art. The artist's mood becomes the reader's mood. We, too, stand as he did, lost in a shelterless, wind-swept village and hear of a probable refuge from "a man tall and slim, with round, smooth face and big, pale blue, innocent-looking eyes, who puts one in mind of a big flimsy newspaper blown along the road by the wind." Or we share with him his astonishment at the appearance of that man in a donkey-cart whose cooey from the darkness had excited such pleased clamor of "Daddy" from his small children. There are half-a-dozen human vignettes in these pages that almost become the reader's own memory treasures. They are at any rate triumphs of picture making.

* Hutchinson.

The Drama.

THE MANCHESTER SCHOOL.

Let me at once reassure the reader, and explain that I am not, in a moment of aberration, about to plunge into the fiscal controversy. It is the Manchester school of drama, not of economics, that I have in mind. After further opportunities of studying the work of Miss Horniman's company at the Coronet Theatre, I wish to express my deliberate opinion that this Manchester movement is the most important fact in our theatrical history since the opening of the Vedrenne-Barker campaign at the Court Theatre, and less important than that only inasmuch as it is in some sense a consequence of it. I have seen nothing so cheering for many a day as these Manchester performances, nothing that put me so much heart as to the future. And it was not merely in promise but in actual achievement that they gave me the keenest pleasure. Judged by any standard whatsoever, they were quite amazingly good. No doubt in almost every production there were one or two parts that might, one felt, have been better filled if the management had had the pick of London at its command; but even in these parts the defect was not one of art, but of mere physical fitness. The flexibility, the adaptability of the company was altogether admirable, and the sense of living artistic endeavor gave excellence a new charm, while it more than reconciled one to an occasional imperfection. It is no affectation, but a simple statement of fact, to say that these fresh and vital performances gave me far more real pleasure than the most finished production mounted for a run by a manager who has ransacked the whole acting list to find the ideal representative for every part.

Not the least notable feature of the season at the Coronet was the cleverness of the one-act plays by new authors which generally headed the bill. "The Dear Departed," by Stanley Houghton, is a rather cynical but remarkably well-written low-life comedy. It deals with a theme at least as old as Ben Jonson's "Volpone"; but it treats it freshly and with a good deal of humorous invention. And the acting could not possibly have been better. Miss Ada King and Miss Louise Holbrook played two rapacious sisters, a Goneril and Regan of the slums, with admirable skill of characterisation; Mr. Henry Austin was excellent as Goneril's husband; and Miss Enid Meek played their daughter very brightly and naturally. "Makeshifts," by G. L. Robins, has less stamina in it, being little more than a somewhat sordid character-sketch; but it, too, is quite ably written. Here again Miss King and Miss Holbrook were very clever in parts of a wholly different nature; while the blatant cad who is the central figure was perfectly played by Mr. Charles Bibby. In speaking of "When the Devil was Ill," I praised Mr. Bibby's performance of the hero's long-suffering secretary. Since then I have seen him not only in the bounder-hero of "Makeshifts," but in Mr. Shaw's Cokane, and I have no hesitation in calling him one of the most accomplished comedians now on the stage. The McEvoy and the Shaw parts were not, on the face of it, altogether unlike, yet Mr. Bibby, with very little aid from make-up, differentiated them absolutely; while in "Makeshifts," though he adopted scarcely any mechanical means of disguise, one could with difficulty believe him to be the same man. Such versatility was never acquired in a long-run theatre.

The more important pieces which I saw last week were Sudermann's "Vale of Content" and Bernard Shaw's "Widowers' Houses." "Das Glück im Winkel" is only a second-rate Sudermann: it has neither the power nor the poetry of "Johannisfeuer." In theme it is not unlike Ibsen's "Lady from the Sea," which might, indeed, have been called "Das Glück im Winkel." In both plays the heroine is the second wife of a middle-aged and unromantic professional man, who is quietly and unselfishly devoted to her; in both plays she has to struggle against the allurement of a romantic passion, tempting her forth from the sequestered nook in which her lot is cast; and in both plays she is conquered by her husband's single-hearted magnanimity. The German play is written throughout in a key of somewhat stodgy sentiment; but it is interesting enough, and affords the actors some good opportunities. Miss Darragh's self-restrained style, with its suggestion of underlying depths of emotion, is admirably suited to the part of Elizabeth. She is the only member of the company already well-known to me; and it is significant that I have never seen her nearly so good in anything else. Mr. Henry Austin's portraiture of the poor schoolmaster, sensitive, shy, uncouth, and yet with a strength and nobility of his own, was a remarkably able piece of work; and Miss Hilda Bruce Potter, a valuable actress, played his blind daughter with charming simplicity. Mr. Edward Landor was clever as the odious snob of a school-inspector; and it was not the fault of Mr. Jules Shaw that he was quite unable to look the part of that stupendous lady-killer, the Baron von Röcknitz-Witzlingen. Mr. Shaw played the part quite cleverly, and contributed so far as in him lay to an excellent all-round performance.

As to "Widowers' Houses," what is one to say, after all these years? Since Mr. Bernard Shaw still allows it to be played, he is presumably still satisfied with this "first heir of his invention." I admire his faithfulness to the illusions of youth, but I am as far as ever from sharing them. As a dialogue on the housing question it has undubitable merits, but as a transcript of human character and emotion, it is not only false, but, what is even worse, feeble. In the light of a historical document, the first act had for me a sort of pathetic interest: it was so exquisitely mid-Victorian. I felt tears, idle tears, rise from the depth of some divine despair in thinking of the days that are no more—the days of H. J. Byron and the pre-operatic Gilbert, the days of confidants and catchwords, the days of attenuated Thackeray and inspissated Dickens. Mr. Shaw has always professed a contempt for Thackeray; but the spirit of this act is conventionally Thackerayan. It is like the work of a minor Thackeray, writing before the "Book of Snobs" had made snobbery self-conscious and wary. But neither Thackeray nor Dickens, nor even H. J. Byron, can be held responsible for the close of the act—for the way in which Dr. Trench bids Cokane "draft a letter" to his "Aunt Maria," and Cokane and Sartorius collaborate in the composition of that precious document. This is neither Victorian nor Edwardian, neither farce nor comedy, neither common sense nor agreeable nonsense. How the author of "John Bull's Other Island" and "The Doctor's Dilemma" can endure to see it rehearsed and solemnly performed passes my comprehension. Mr. Shaw will probably say that it is his mission in life to pass my comprehension. Well, he has seldom succeeded more completely.

The play, of course, lives on its Lickcheese scenes in the later acts; and they are undeniably excellent, and delightfully played by Mr. Iden Payne. To make Lickcheese burgeon in four months from the worm of the second act into the bounder of the third is to treat time with Shakespearean carelessness; but that is a trifling matter. On the other hand, the development of Blanche's character in these acts remains, in my eyes, as inartistic and intolerable as it ever was. Even the brilliant acting of Miss Mona Limerick did not in any degree justify it. Miss Limerick's rendering of Blanche's tempestuous outbursts was terribly real and convincing; but it did not explain why Mr. Shaw should have complicated his discussion of the housing question by choosing a maniac heroine. Indeed, the power of Miss Limerick's performance only rendered it doubly incredible that Dr. Trench should not have seized upon any excuse to break off his engagement to a woman who was obviously graduating for Colney Hatch. True, he was not present, as we were, at her assault upon the housemaid. Perhaps Mr. Shaw aimed at an effect of tragic irony in letting his luckless medical student lapse into the toils of the hysterical termagant; for what is tragic irony save our knowledge or foresight of some disastrous circumstance whereof the hero is blissfully ignorant? But, irony or no irony, Blanche's insanity remains absolutely irrelevant to the theme of "Widowers' Houses"; for I suppose it is not argued that the daughters of slum landlords are more likely than any other class of females to develop into dangerous lunatics.

Yet Blanche is only an extreme instance of the general tendency towards chronic cantankerousness displayed by almost all the characters of Mr. Shaw's early plays. This tendency was for long a mystery to me: it seemed so foreign to Mr. Shaw's own nature, which is, indeed, combative enough, but never cantankerous. The other day, however, at the Court Theatre, I caught a curious sidelight on the phenomenon. In listening to Lady Gregory's delightful sketch, "The Workhouse Ward," I found myself wondering: "How is it that this tone of constant bickering and wrangling is so very familiar to me? Where else have I met these old Irishmen whose sole delight it is to jump down each other's throat?" After a little reflection, the answer came to me: "Why, it's in Shaw's early plays: these two old gentlemen pervade them in various disguises." And so it is: the characters in "Widowers' Houses," "The Philanderer," even "Mrs. Warren's Profession," are for ever taking offence, flaring up, and girding at each other, for all the world like Lady Gregory's bedridden paupers. I open "Widowers' Houses" at random and cull a few stage directions:—

> "Trench, hotly"; "Sartorius, aggressively"; "Trench, vehemently"; "Blanche, still more vehemently"; "Sartorius, provoked"; "Trench, much injured"; "Sartorius, outraged"; "He flings angrily away"; "Trench turns away petulantly"; "Trench, defiantly"; "Sartorius, forcibly"; "Trench, moodily"; "The Parlor Maid, piteously"; "Blanche, with fierce disgust"; "Sartorius, formidably"; "Blanche, angrily"; "Lickcheese, shocked"; "Trench, morosely"; "Cokane, rising wildly"; "Sartorius, revolted"; "Trench, sulkily"; "Blanche, shrewishly"; "Trench, annoyed by her tone"; Blanche, white with rage."

I could easily make the list three times as long. Mr. Shaw used apparently to conceive this deliberate quarrelsomeness as the characteristically dramatic element in life; and Lady Gregory's play suggests that it is, in fact, a characteristically Irish element. So the trait which seemed personally so un-Shawlike turns out to be a reminiscence of his early environment. I commend this observation to the notice of Shaw-psychologists.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

THE MEANING OF THE BÜLOW CRISIS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In one of my last letters I expressed the opinion that the end of the German financial crisis would be a big deal. No particular gift of prophecy was required to foretell this finale of the battle, fought with so much noise and so little directness of purpose. The nature, strength, and political influence of the parties concerned made it apparent from the outset that very little principle and much compromise would rule the proceedings.

What is the situation? On June 24th the Clerico-Conservative majority of the Reichstag had, by 194 to 186 votes, rejected the inclusion of new taxes on inheritances in the bill for the restoration of the finances of the Empire. Prince Bülow then went to Kiel and offered the Kaiser his resignation, which—so we are semi-officially informed—William II. did not accept, but asked the Prince to stick to his post until the measure was carried. Only when this was achieved could the idea of Prince Bülow's retirement be entertained. At the same time we were told that a dissolution of the Reichstag and an appeal to the country was not intended. If this decision is upheld no solution of the present crisis is possible but a very tame, if not dirty, compromise.

And everything points to such an issue. An appeal to the country on behalf of a Finance Bill taxing trade and consumption by over 400 millions of marks and inheritances by less than 80 millions of marks is not likely to strengthen the Ministerial parties. The heroic declaration to stand or fall with the principle that property must pay some portion of the new taxes may have served parliamentary and other stage purposes. But the mass of the people called upon to judge between the contending parties would find the portion of the tax assigned to property much too small to cover the objectionable taxes the Government and its supporters have either proposed themselves or have willingly accepted from others. Already the Clerico-Conservatives sneeringly repeat to the newly-founded Hanse League of captains of industry and commerce Charles II.'s famous mot, said to his brother James: "They won't depose me to make you king."

No doubt, some of the taxes proposed and voted by the allied parties of the agriculturists are reactionary in the extreme. But it is small comfort to be informed that Prince Bülow has declared graduated taxes on flour mills, duties on the exportation of coals, and high taxes on stocks inacceptable to the federated Governments, when the same Governments come forward with proposals little less reactionary and not a bit less unjust. Thus they proposed to impose a high tax on fire insurances, and wanted the public to accept this tax as a tax on property, as if the store which a tradesman insures were a mark of his wealth. They or their Chancellor of the Exchequer have also been silent on the suggestion to burden perfumes, scented water, &c., with an extra duty, and insist on the taxation of matches and incandescent lamps.

This is the disheartening feature of the present political crisis of the German Empire. No great principle is involved; the fight is one of interests, and, on the whole, of rather petty interests. Look at the list of the taxes already voted by the majority of the Reichstag, either in Committee or by the House itself on the second reading (which means much more than a second reading in the House of Commons), and regarded by the federated Governments as accepted. The revenue thus obtained is estimated as follows (in millions of marks):—

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Increased tax on | | beer ... ... ... | 100 |
| ,, | ,, | spirits ... ... ... | 83 |
| ,, | ,, | tobacco ... ... | 43 |
| ,, | ,, | tea and coffee ... ... | 37 |
| ,, | ,, | sparkling wine ... | 5 |
| New | ,, | incandescent lamps ... | 20 |
| ,, | ,, | matches, &c. ... ... | 25 |
| Increased | ,, | railway tickets ... | 20 |
| ,, | ,, | bills of change ... | 5 |
| ,, | ,, | stocks ... ... ... | 15 |
| New | ,, | cheques ... ... | 7 |
| ,, | ,, | transfers of land, part sites ... ... ... | 20 |
| | | Together ... ... ... ... | 380 |

Now here are nearly four-fifths of the required 500 millions, and they either attack the consumer directly or tax trade. Some other taxes of the same character are still in abeyance, and the dispute is only as to what kind of taxes shall be the ornament or the fig-leaf of the whole body. In regard to this the Hanse League against the agricultural parties is certainly to be regarded as progressive. But its progressivism can only be compared with that of the Whig of the unreformed British Parliament. In its ranks you find high Protectionists and moderate Free Traders (very few thorough Free Traders), decided opponents and moderate upholders of the democratic franchise, foes and friends of Labor laws and working-class organisations, and its leading spirits are even more deeply tinged with Jingoism than their opponents of the Clerico-Conservative coalition.

It is consequently very doubtful whether the Hanse League will even make for moderate progress in Germany. With the financial resources it controls, with almost all the big middle-class papers at its command, it certainly wields a great power. But, apart from an opposition to an ultra-reactionary fiscal policy, for what purposes will that power be used? The press of the League publishes statistics to show that the majority of the Reichstag that rejected the inheritance duty represents only four millions of voters, whilst the parties that voted the duty represent seven millions of voters. This is true, and it is of interest to know the figures. The parties that vetoed the duty and their votes in 1907 were:—

| | |
|---|---|
| Conservatives ... ... ... | 1,060,000 |
| Agriculturists ... ... ... | 120,000 |
| South German Farmers' League ... | 75,000 |
| Centre Party .. ... ... ... | 2,180,000 |
| Poles ... ... ... ... ... | 454,000 |
| Alsatians ... ... ... ... | 104,000 |
| | 3,993,000 |

The parties that voted for the new duty on inheritances had in 1907 the following numbers of voters:—

| | |
|---|---|
| Freisinnige and Democrats ... | 1,234,000 |
| National Liberals ... ... ... | 1,630,000 |
| Liberal Conservatives ... ... | 472,000 |
| Anti-Semites ... ... ... | 353,000 |
| Social Democrats ... ... ... | 3,259,000 |
| Together ... ... ... | 6,948,000 |

These figures show how much the inequality of the electoral divisions benefits the agriculturists at the cost of the other sections of the community. Twice as many inhabitants of the German Empire live to-day on trade and commerce as live from agriculture, or 56 per cent. against 28 per cent. of the whole population. In spite of all the legislation for the protection of agriculture, agriculture occupies fewer people to-day than twenty-five years ago. The whole increase of the population had to find their subsistence in other occupations. And this is going to continue, for there is comparatively little arable land in Germany that is not already intensively worked, and the percentage of waste land has greatly decreased. The political supremacy of the agriculturists over the other classes of the community is in flat contradiction to the requirements of the economic situation, and the present crisis is only the natural result of an old constitutional grievance. The radical remedy would be a redistribution of seats in the Reichstag and the Prussian Landtag according to the changed aggregations of the population. If the towns and the industrial villages get their due representation in the German Parliaments, the mastery of the agriculturists, and with it the preponderance of the Catholic Centre Party, will at once be broken in pieces. A genuine fight against these conservative forces would therefore have to be waged under the cry: "Away with the crying inequality of representation!" But neither the Governments nor the middle-class industrialists and commercialists as organised in the Hanse League mean to take up this cry.

This is the real nature of the Bülow crisis. Apart from the Socialists and some extremists in the ranks of other parties, the two great contending factions are equally disinclined to put the question at issue in an unequivocal way before the nation. The Clerico-Conservative coalition denies any intention to institute Parliamentary Government, and, moreover, the Conservatives declare nothing to be further from their thoughts than to throw Prince Bülow overboard, whilst Prince Bülow again has not the slightest desire to see the Conservatives seriously decreased in strength. It is a family quarrel, where the disputants want to settle as much as possible of the quarrel by a deal behind the scenes, not a genuine battle between representatives of two well-defined political conceptions.

Prince Bülow shares the fate of many statesmen who acted as heads of Government in times of transition, who want to pose as modern thinkers and yet are resolved to graft as much as possible of the old condition of things on to the new society. They are almost bound to dissatisfy both sections and to fail in the end. Things change under their hands into mere parodies of what they were intended to be. The only justification of the Bülow bloc was, or would have been, that it was to be a first step to the foundation of parliamentary government. But neither its creator nor the Liberal partners in it ventured to admit this, whilst the Conservative partners repelled the very idea. And, indeed, what happens at the collapse of the bloc? Some of the Liberals were consistent enough to declare Bülow's retirement to be inevitable, and Bülow himself saved appearances by tendering his resignation. But the Conservatives pretend to see no earthly reason why Bülow should go, and if he still goes he does not surrender his place as a parliamentary statesman because of a disavowal of his policy by the nation, but only as a monarchical agent who has failed in a legislative experiment. His personal motives may be ever so honorable, and your correspondent thinks it unjust to accuse him of sticking to office merely because he has agreed to try again to carry the Finance Bill, but all the more must it be clearly pointed out that the present crisis is before all due to the tacit agreement of the three disputants—Government, i.e., Prince Bülow, Clerico-Conservatives, and Middle-class Liberals—to avoid calling in the democracy of the nation.

Therefore if Prince Bülow remains in office the game of barter will be continued. Strong interests will be bought, and weak—i.e., insufficiently represented—interests will be sold, and the worst form of compromise will rule the day. The nation will survive it—what pressure do nations not survive?—but uncounted citizens will be sacrificed, and enormous losses caused to thousands of struggling tradespeople and their workmen. And all for the fear of a democratic solution.—

Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

June 28th, 1909.

Communications.

THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW OF MURDER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Five and forty years ago a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the provisions and operation of the laws under which capital punishment may be inflicted in this country. The Chairman of the Commission was the Duke of Richmond, and among his colleagues were the late Lord Stanley, Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Justice O'Hagan, John Bright, Stephen Lushington, William Ewart, and Gathorne Hardy. In 1866 they made their report containing some very valuable recommendations for the amendment of the law of murder, which from that day to this, no Government has ever attempted to carry into effect. It is upon these recommendations that the provisions of the Law of Murder Amendment Bill which I have been privileged to introduce in the House of Commons are, in the main, based. It may be mentioned that four of the 1866 Commissioners, Stephen Lushington, John Bright, Charles Neale, and William Ewart, reported that in their opinion capital punishment might, safely, and with advantage to the community, be abolished; and Mr. Justice O'Hagan being of opinion "that the weight of evidence and reason is in favour of the abolition of capital punishment," only refrained from signing a declaration to the same effect, because he considered that public opinion was not yet ripe for the acceptance of such a change. The Bill, however, does not raise this very serious question. It makes no attempt to abolish the death penalty, but it would restrict its operation to murders of the worst description, those, namely, which are committed with deliberate intention. To secure this end, murders are classified as (1) murder of the first degree, and (2) murder of the second degree, and the jury are required, when they bring in a verdict of murder, to find whether it be murder of the first or of the second class; and the Bill further provides that "the verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree shall not be returned unless the jury find as a fact that the homicide which is the subject of the charge was deliberately committed by the accused with express malice aforethought." In this case only is the death sentence to be pronounced.

Some exception has been taken to the phrase "with express malice aforethought," but it is one which all criminal lawyers understand, and the meaning of which the judge would have no difficulty in explaining to the jury.

By the law, as the Commissioners pointed out, "murder is the unlawfully killing another with malice aforethought," but, "unfortunately these words have not been confined to express malice aforethought, or, as it is sometimes called, malice in fact, but have received a less natural construction, which has long been adopted as the settled law of the land. It has been held that malice in its legal sense imports nothing more than a wicked intention to do injury to the person of another without any just cause or excuse, and that where a man is killed in consequence of such wicked intention, the law will infer malice aforethought, though no express enmity or preconceived design can be shown; not, indeed, a particular, but a general malice aforethought. . . . This doctrine of implied malice aforethought goes even beyond this, and is carried to such an extent that the law always infers it when a person in the act of committing a felony, even of a trifling nature, kills another, though there may be, in fact, no premeditation, and no intention to kill, or do serious injury." Therefore, as the law stands to-day, if a man shoots at a fowl intending to steal it, and by accident kills another man, he is by law guilty of murder!

In view of these considerations, the Commissioners recommended: "That the punishment of death be retained for all murders deliberately committed with express malice aforethought, such malice to be found as a fact by the jury"; and these words I have adopted in the present Bill. The effect would be that in all but the worst, the most cold-blooded, and atrocious murders, the jury would return verdicts of guilty of murder of the second degree.

The Bill further deals with the law as to infanticide. From time to time the feelings of the community are shocked by cases, such as that of Daisy Lord, for example, where some poor girl, with mind deranged by shame, and trouble, and desertion, and the agonies of child-birth, has been impelled to put an end to the life of the tiny being upon whom, in other circumstances, she would have lavished the tenderness of a mother's love. She stands charged with murder, and is convicted; whereupon the judge assumes the black cap, and proceeds to pass upon her the terrible sentence of death, ending with an invocation to the Deity to have mercy on her soul. although everybody who hears it, except, perhaps, the unhappy prisoner herself, knows perfectly well that such sentence will not be, and is not intended to be, carried into effect. Surely there are few among us who will maintain that the law which prescribes such practice and procedure should remain unaltered.

"We have given this important and difficult subject our serious attention," say the Commissioners, "and we have arrived at the opinion that an Act should be passed making it an offence, punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment at the discretion of the court, unlawfully and maliciously to inflict bodily harm or serious injury upon a child during its birth, or within seven days afterwards, in case such child has subsequently died."

The Bill goes somewhat further than this. It provides, by its fifth clause, that "No woman shall be liable to be indicted for murder by reason of her killing her child at birth, or within one month after its birth; but every woman who unlawfully and maliciously inflicts grievous bodily harm, or serious injury upon her child during its birth, or within one month afterwards, shall, if the child dies in consequence of such grievous bodily harm or serious injury, be guilty of an indictable offence." The punishment provided in such case is "penal servitude for not more than ten years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for not more than two years, or detention during his Majesty's pleasure, in such place and under such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct." Infanticide is thus made a substantive offence, and a large discretion is granted with regard to its punishment in order to meet the peculiar circumstances of each case.

With regard to the words, "or within one month afterwards," many are of opinion that this period should be extended. In this connection, I may refer to the case of Alice Cleaver, aged twenty, who was recently sentenced to death for the murder of her child about three months old, where the jury made the following addition to their verdict, "Knowing that she was deserted and neglected by the man who had wronged her, and being forced into utter distraction, we very, very, strongly recommend her to mercy." ("Times," March 10th, 1909.) Surely the ends of justice could be adequately met if a miserable girl, in such circumstances, were to be found guilty of the crime of "Infanticide," especially in view of the fact that the death sentence is never carried out in such cases.

But details as to the age of the child, and the nature of the punishment of Infanticide are, of course, matters which would be reconsidered in Committee, if the Bill could be brought to that stage.

Provision is also made to amend the laws of suicide. As the law now stands, if two persons agree to commit suicide together, and one succeeds in the attempt, while the other fails, the survivor is guilty of murder. As an illustration I may mention the case of Marion Seddon (1905), an old woman of sixty-five, who together with her aged husband, took poison, being in dire poverty. The old man died, but the woman recovered, was tried for aiding and abetting the murder of her husband, and was sentenced to death. Under the Bill she would have been guilty, not of murder, but of an indictable offence, punishable by penal servitude, or imprisonment with or without hard labor. Surely this would be amply sufficient, and, perhaps, more than sufficient to vindicate the ends of justice!

That such reforms as these are urgently required has been recognised by enlightened men for the last forty years or more. Why, then, is nothing done? Because Governments will not take up any question which is not forced upon them by a large body of public opinion. The good of the community is supposed to be the aim of all legislation; but votes are the driving-power. Does anyone expect that the present or any other Government will lay their hands to this beneficent and much-needed work, in the absence of organised outside pressure? As well might he "call the clouds and whistle to the wind." And the moral is that bodies such as the Romilly Society, the Howard Association, and all penal reformers who have signified their strong approval of the proposals contained in this Bill, should do their best to educate public opinion in its favor. If they do this, I am not without hopes that it may, possibly, become law—say, in another forty years' time!—Yours, &c.,

G. G. Greenwood.

June 29th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

FAITH AND CONDUCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—What need to discuss Mr. Sidney Low's problem? The instance on which he raised it supplies us with the answer. Mr. Rockefeller's religion was individualistic, and had, therefore, only a private or domestic application. In private, he showed himself kindly, unselfish, good.

It had no intelligible mode of applying itself to public or social life. This all lay outside his narrow religious frontiers.

And, in his public and social life, he showed himself selfish, cruel, and wicked.

The difference between Mr. Rockefeller at home and Mr. Rockefeller the financier is the measure, therefore, of the influence of his religion on his conduct.—Yours, &c.,

Henry Scott Holland.

1, Amen Court, St. Paul's, E.C.
June 30th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Sidney Low's statement that creeds do not greatly affect conduct is a very common one at the present time. To me it seems not only obviously untrue, but obscurantist and oppressive in the worst degree. Priests are accused of despising human reason, but no priest ever despised it so utterly as to assert that its highest conclusions about the cosmos make no difference whatever. No superstition, no abuse of authority, ever struck so deadly a blow as that at intellect and the search after truth. This is the worst obscurantism: to say that even if we find the truth it will make no difference; that a man in a triangular world will behave just like a man in a square world; and a man in a good universe exactly like a man in a bad one. It really amounts to saying that a man's head is a useless appendage to his automatically cheerful body.

But the theory that creed does not affect conduct is not only obscurantist—it is plainly untrue. Wherever you have a general confession of faith by a whole people, as Buddhism in Burmah or Catholicism in Ireland, you do have a certain ethical type, good or bad, certain virtues insisted on or certain vices condoned. This generalisation is only subject to exception in the same sense as any generalisation is, about race or nationality or physical conditions. When one says that Scotchmen are energetic, one does not mean that there are no lazy Scotchmen; and when one says that Buddhists are quiet, one does not mean that there are no noisy Buddhists.

But, though there are exceptions, the one which Mr. Sidney Low has chosen is extraordinarily unfortunate for his own case. He has gone out of his way to point out that Mr. Rockefeller, the rapacious Trust magnate, is, nevertheless, a teacher in a Baptist Sunday school. Now, I should say, most emphatically, that Mr. Rockefeller is a very typical product of his religion, that he has been made by his religion, and that he could not possibly have been the same with any other religion. I do not say he might not have been as bad. If he had been a Moslem, he might have slaughtered Armenians; if he had been a Thug, he might have strangled travellers; if he had been an Anglican, he might have looked up to the squire; if he had been a Theosophist, he might have looked down on everybody. Every faith has its besetting temptation. But this temptation to combine business brazenly with piety, to regard riches as a form of Divine approval, to be a plutocrat openly and with unction—this is, and has always been, the peculiar temptation of that type of Protestant individualist religion to which Mr. Rockefeller belongs.

The real change wrought in our ethics by the Reformation is often stated wrong. That extreme of the reformed opinion to whose brief heroic age we give the name of Puritanism, is often attacked for its severity against the sins of the flesh. But individual Christians of all creeds have sometimes shown such a severity; it is not really here that the point lies. The real change wrought in the long run by Puritan morals was this: it was not so much that men began to say that lust and gluttony were deadly sins; it was that they began to say, for the first time, that pride and avarice were not deadly sins. Of course, they did not put it in those words. But I can tell you the words they did put it in: "The Industrious Apprentice," "Self Help," "The Self-made Man," "Not slothful in business, serving the Lord," "Ever remember, my dear Dan, that you may some day be the head of that concern." I am certain that no honest modern Puritan will deny that from the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the nineteenth century at least, the arresting feature of Puritan ethics was the vague association between being regular at chapel and being regular at the bank. The result is Mr. Rockefeller, anxious, consistent, and quite contented with himself. Catholics cheat and bargain and hoard money; they do it stubbornly, sullenly, as they do any other wicked thing. Mr. Rockefeller does it vastly, magnificently, poetically, because in his religion it has often been counted an admirable thing. Avarice is a sin of Christians; it is an ideal of individualists. Hence the indisputable fact that millionaire worship is as much a mark of a Protestant country as Ancestor worship of China.—Yours, &c.,

G. K. Chesterton.

July 1st, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—No problem is more vital than that of the relations between religion and conduct, and we must all be very grateful to Mr. Sydney Low for his very able and frank statement. If you allow me, I will just venture to offer one or two suggestions.

Religion does not appear to me to be essentially a set of dogmas or an ethical code—as Mr. Sydney Low seems to think—but rather a living belief in a spiritual world and a real communion with that world. For the religious man this spiritual world is a matter of daily and deep experience, a great reality which permeates the whole of life, and which can become by prayer and all what is commonly called religious experience, a deep source of power and energy for the individual. That great unseen reality is, moreover, for the religious man, the supreme guarantee of the truth of all his best aspirations, of all his cravings for justice and righteousness. Religion gives to human life a new and infinite value, by regarding each man, however degraded he may be, as having at least a spark of the divine in him, as being, in fact, akin to the divine and eternal in value. Religion makes us realise, under the differences of race and character, the deep unity of all mankind, by considering each individual as a unit in a great divine whole from which he must not dissociate himself. Such a faith is bound to have a tremendous practical influence on conduct.

The moral life—viz., the life entirely consecrated to duty—is beset with very great difficulties in this world of ours. Our ideals seem too often to break down before a brute reality.

To attain a high moral standard in our own private lives, the incessant fight we have to wage against those low and selfish motives so deeply rooted in the heart, does not always end by victory. For the great majority of those to whom conscience is not merely a word, the struggle would not be worth while if they did not believe in a God who helped them and gave them the strength to win.

In public life the practical influence of religion is quite as capital. In reality, especially nowadays, private and public life are so deeply intermingled that it is impossible to separate them, and what is true for the individual is true for society. The men who fight for social justice and righteousness always meet with a terrific opposition, which too often ends by checking their work. How many noble efforts have apparently been defeated, how many men have given up their lives to defend great ideals which the world could not understand! History, it is true, shows us that all great causes win in the end, because no self-sacrifice is ever done in vain, and, above all, because nothing can prevail against God; but history shows us, too, that the men who defend these causes must be always prepared to encounter every mockery, every insult, every defeat, possibly disaster and death. The prophets, the social and religious reformers, all the men who fight for some ideal, are only a small minority (though it is they that make the world), and they are often liable to feel swamped. Most of them would grow weary and heartbroken, and would give up the fight as useless and vain, if they did not believe in a God ever present, the Incarnation of all great ideals, the guarantee of their eternal value and reality, the pledge of their ultimate victory. I do not deny that men have lived and died for great causes who had no religious beliefs, but these men were religious in fact, if not in name, for their very life proves that the ideal was much more real to them than the material world.

Thus, in public as well as in private life, religion is a formidable help to the attainment of a high standard of conduct. It is very difficult to follow an ideal if we do not believe in its objective reality in some superior sphere of existence. I venture to say that religion appears to me nowadays more necessary than ever. All over Europe, especially in England and France, democracy is steadily progressing; everywhere new forces are rising, and their strength increases every day. How and where shall these forces be directed? If they are to win—above all, if they are to > "Ring out the darkness of the land, > Ring in the Christ that is to be,"

they must have a great religious faith, for that faith alone can render them invincible. Democracy, just because it is the highest state of government, demands of each citizen a very high sense of public duty, such as religion alone can give. As Father Tyrrell says, "It is religion alone that can give an infinite and absolute value to humanity and to the service of humanity."—Yours, &c.,

A. de B.

Wimbledon, June 29th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with the deepest interest Mr. Low's article on "Religion and Conduct," in this week's NATION, and should like, if you will allow me, to touch upon one or two points which seem to me to account for the very curious ethical anomaly which is disclosed by the "Reminisciences" of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, and which Mr. Low so forcibly comments upon.

The surprise with which we find that this "money-making machine," as we saw him to be in his business life, is in private amiable, affectionate, generous, and "unimpeachably upright," is perfectly natural; but, then, we have not allowed for what may be called the moral astigmatism with which we are more or less afflicted, but of which, perhaps, Mr. John D. Rockefeller is an extreme example.

When the Church betrayed Religion by giving up all authority over that vast region of human activity called "business," and limited its function to so-called spiritual concerns, this moral disease, as it may truly be called, spread unchecked, and the Political Economy arose which recognised and concerned itself only with the material things of life, and of these chiefly with the mere making of money; and, unchallenged by the Church, took possession of all the ground abandoned by it. By this lamentable failure, the Church gave up its most important social function, viz., the teaching the nature of, and insisting on the practice of, Justice among men, resulting in the moral obliquity which can serenely and, to its own mind, quite conscientiously serve two gods—God and Mammon. Now the Founder of our Religion distinctly stated that this was an impossibility; and when we realise the unhealthy condition of modern society, the congestion of wealth, with its accompanying ruinous luxury, on one hand, and abject poverty, with its consequent degradation on the other, we may begin to think that He was right.

If I do not misunderstand Mr. Low, he implies that Religion is not necessarily authoritative in the conduct of life; "religious and ethical conceptions exercise less influence upon conduct than is commonly attributed to them." As a matter of fact, it depends upon what really is our Religion—what we are bound to, not what we merely think it to be. It is not likely that, in listening to the sayings of Jesus read in church on Sunday, Mr. John D. Rockefeller was ever seriously disturbed by the question as to whether his riches would make it difficult for him to get into Heaven, much less would he be alarmed by the thought that he might eventually bear Dives company in Hell; these things he did not really believe, though it gave him a comfortable feeling to think he did—nor did he believe that other saying of Jesus: "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you," or these alone, applied to his life, would have given rise to a very different course of action. What he did, with his whole heart, believe in was money—riches. The pursuit of them gave him the greatest satisfaction life could afford, and if ever he cast a thought to the ruin and devastation his financial operations caused to hundreds and thousands of his fellow creatures (though it is not likely he had imagination enough to enable him to), could he not more than make amends by founding colleges, endowing churches and charities and "liberality" everywhere, in the exercise of which popular virtue, much praise would be added as sweet sauce to his pudding?

Mr. Rockefeller is but an example of the widespread evil resulting from the Church's pusillanimity in abandoning her frontiers to the enemy. This divorce between religion and ethics runs all through our present social system. When will the Church learn that, though she must not cease striving after the crowning graces of Faith, Hope, and Charity, she must see to it first that her feet are well planted on the bedrock of all human worth, the cardinal virtues of Prudence, Fortitude, Justice, and Temperance, and that of this majestic sisterhood Justice comes first as the foundation of all worthy social life? In Ruskin's "Letters to the Clergy" he charges them with failure in their pastoral duty of guiding their flocks in the right way, and that, instead of explaining to them and trying to get them to do the "will of the Lord" here on earth, they assume the mediatorial rather than the pastoral office, and think rather of absolving the sinner from his punishment instead of purging him from his sin.

Carlyle, seeing visions, exclaims: "Thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not be stolen from; what a society were that—Plato's Republic, More's Utopia mere emblems of it! Give every man what is his—the accurate price of what he has done and been—no more shall any complain, neither shall the earth suffer more"; and Ruskin, in grave and measured terms, writes: "Absolute justice is indeed no more attainable than absolute truth; but the righteous man is distinguished from the unrighteous by his desire and hope of justice, as the true man from the false by his desire and hope of truth. And, though absolute justice be unattainable, as much justice as we need for all practical use is attainable by those who make it their aim," and it is only in proportion to the number of men and women in it whose hearts cherish that ideal, and whose actions are, as far as possible, guided by it, that a nation can be sane and strong.—Yours, &c.,

E. STAPLEDON.

June 25th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question which Mr. Low voices for many interested persons is, "How can a deeply religious man occupy himself during his hours of activity in a manner which is often irreligious and sometimes anti-religious?"

The answer, clearly, I think, is that no man can be "deeply religious," let his beliefs be what they may, unless his religion colors his life in every department.

As the first principle of the Christian life is "giving" and not "getting," no man whose energies have always been directed towards "the difficult art of getting" can have even set foot inside the Kingdom of God. It is obvious that the laws which govern that kingdom would be to him unthinkable, and its current coin worse than useless.

A man who can succeed in keeping his religion in a water-tight compartment must always be a man of little imagination and low ideals. Where his religion does influence his actions is only where his bodily eyes are concerned in relation to people he can see before him, but with the far-reaching effects of his methods of business on people he cannot see, he has nothing to do. They do not enter into his calculations, excepting as pawns in the game. Therefore he can be "calm, contented, kindly, tranquil in mind and soul, at ease in his relation to the universe and the general scheme of things."

His mind is never tortured with visions of suffering or distress any further away than that of the beggar whom he relieves in passing. He is too complacently secure to dream of criticising himself. His ideal is sufficiently low for him to attain unto it, and if he has done so, his every wish is gratified and his soul at peace.

But can any state of mind which breeds such complacency be called religious in any true sense? Everyone knows that the divorce of religion from conduct is not peculiar to this type of character, but in the case of persons who are sensitive, thoughtful, and imaginative, whether their inconsistencies arise from the assertiveness of strong self-will, or the wavering of a weak will, their state of mind is never complacent.

The knowledge of the contradiction between their ideals and conduct keeps them in a state of inward restlessness and discord.

Those who are hungering and thirsting after righteousness, whose inmost souls, like David's, are panting and crying out for the living God, whose love is set on the high ideal of holiness, are the only persons who can know what true and deep religion means. To these souls Christ promised that they should be filled. And the only legitimate "getting" in the religious life is the getting of the knowledge of God and the power to act on that knowledge. Christ promised his followers the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and as an illustration of the working of the spirit in the heart of man, he likened it to the leaven hid in dough which in time leavens the whole lump; and also to a well of water, perpetually springing up. When this leaven is working in a man's soul, he cannot live a life of self-satisfaction. Therein lies the difference between true religion and the travesty of religion in which Mr. Rockefeller, and men of his type, rest so contentedly. It does not alter their point of view. And it seems to me that such people do more to hinder the desire for true religion in others than those who indulge in open vice.—Yours, &c.,

K. Morley Horder.

6, Hamilton Terrace, N.W.
June 30th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The letter of Mr. Low, concerning Mr. Rockefeller and the relation of religion and ethics to action, opens an interesting and vital subject. Not only Mr. Rockefeller, but in greater degree the late Mr. H. H. Rogers, his partner, are examples naturally suggesting the question how far the religious spirit and professed moral principles influence life. Mr. Rogers, who believed in religion, and was a constant attendant at church, not only gave large amounts for public and semi-public purposes in his native town and elsewhere, but also much secretly and in a private way, and always, whether publicly or privately, entirely without ostentation. Dr. Robert Collyer, his pastor, says: "No offer was ever made to him in vain." Now the secret of this apparent separation of precept and practice in so far as the methods of the Standard Oil Company and other large co-operations are open to adverse criticism from an ethical point of view, lies not in the fact that ethics and religion do not have an influence on life, but that in the minds of these men business did not come strictly under the law and spirit of the higher ethics. To quote from a man who was successful in his business career, and also possessed in high degree the domestic and prudential virtues: "Business is business, and comes in no way under the Golden Rule." In other words, shrewdness, sagacity and subtlety within the limits of common honesty and the regulations of the law, are entitled to their results in the business world. This man, e.g., would not force a company in which he was interested into bankruptcy for personal profit; but, if under such attention as he was able to give to its affairs, as its chief official, it became insolvent, he would not hesitate to ignore the moral rights of minor stockholders to the advantage of himself and his friends. Such distinctions in conduct offer manifold temptations, and are calculated to cajole conscience.

But why did these men make this distinction, for we cannot for a moment admit that the ethical spirit should not exercise control in all human affairs? One explanation is afforded, I think, in the fact that when they received ethical instruction in early life, "high finance" had not developed as a feature of the commercial world. Their instruction was of the sort which applied mainly to personal and social life. It was, in short, in accordance with the environment and outlook of the time, and very likely included some definite precepts concerning the business world as it then was.

However much or little religious beliefs affect life—a question which cannot be discussed here—experience shows that a change of belief or the presence of a new ethical spirit in the community, generally fails to produce decided results on those in middle life. The ideas and training of earlier years remain often unconsciously in force, and when one's interests are involved, form an easy excuse. There are, of course, numerous exceptions. Many, happily, have that ethical temperament which quickly rises above the letter, and seeks always to apply the spirit. Mr. Rogers often visited his native town, the appearance of which his lavish gifts had almost transformed, and sometimes listened to severe strictures of a general nature on financial methods similar to his own. It is said, however, that on such occasions he never showed resentment, but only sorrow, apparently regarding himself as a victim of misunderstanding and injustice. This, perhaps, may be taken to some extent as evidence that he was conscientious in the view that business in its ethical relation stands in a class by itself.

Living is doubtless in some sense an art and a science; but this does not exclude the religious and ethical elements, the one as an inspiration, the other as a guide. Art, least of all, can dispense with the ideal. Religious dogmas often fail to affect life; but the truly religious spirit is its highest inspiration.—Yours, &c.,

London, Geo. Croswell Cressey.
June 26th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Sydney Low's letter would seem to suggest a doubt whether the chrematistic art of successful bargaining, however unscrupulously carried on, is at all amenable to the tribunal of ethics. It appears at least to occasion no qualms in minds otherwise admirably constituted like that of J. D. R. That a man should be kind, generous, unselfish within his own intimate circle, and even lavish to Churches and philanthropic societies, but callous and utterly unscrupulous in his commercial transactions is, indeed, a puzzling contradiction.

The laws of political economy throw no light on the matter: they take cognizance of exchanges merely, and all higher considerations are ruled out. Such things do not surprise us when exemplified in a typical Roman of the time of Cicero, but are sadly out of time with Christian ideals, and tend to turn many away from religion altogether. The broad fact remains that the sharp practices of modern business, not only in America, but in Britain also, call forth no rebuke or condemnation from the Church; hence patriots cannot reckon on her support against commercial immorality, or, indeed, any gross national evil that requires to be uprooted. It is notorious that all the Churches in America, with the honorable exception of the Quakers, supported slavery as a recognised institution, in this, as in some other things, showing a lower morality than the world.

If religion moves and has its being within a luminous inner sphere which exhibits all our actions in their true light, no act, however mean or great, can be exempt from her survey. To imply that religion and morality are two separate departments standing in no direct relation to each other is a cardinal error. The world is quick to perceive any discrepancy between the profession of the former and the practice of the latter, and no one will dispute its right to do so. Goodness of heart and nobility of character are often met with in many who manifest no keen religious aspirations; nor should we forget that Aristotle has dealt with ethics apart entirely from religion. Nevertheless we may affirm that a pure religion animates our morality by purifying the inner springs of action, and imparting clearer perceptions and higher sanctions of conduct. The science of ethics teaches us that we are bound—unless where mentally defective—to recognise the results of our actions to others as well as to ourselves; and where no authoritative voice is heard in fervid condemnation of practices, commercial or otherwise, which entail suffering and ruin on others, we shall never get any further forward in morals than what is implied in its own definition: mores, or established ways.

Thus the contradiction referred to is only apparent after all; the laws of our moral and spiritual nature are few and intelligible by the simplest; we cannot play fast and loose with them in any sphere of action and delude ourselves it is the same thing; in other words, we cannot serve God and Mammon.

Is, then, our modern life to be but a repetition of the ancient wail, "video meliora proboque, deteriora sequor?"—Yours, &c.,

D. Hamilton.

60, Magdalen Yard Road,
Dundee,
June 29th, 1909.

---

MISS COLENSO AND THE DEFENCE OF DINIZULU.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Having reference to Colonel Seely's answer in the House in regard to the expenses of the Dinizulu defence, I have received a letter by the last mail from Miss Colenso, which contains the following passage relating to the subject. This I would commend to your readers, with the addition of the fact that the Misses Colenso have expended literally every sixpence of their means of livelihood in making the defence of the persecuted chief possible.

"Bishopstowe, Natal.

"For all these subsequent cases, though nominally pressed against others, have really been urged in the eager search for any charge with which to blacken Dinuzulu's character. And there has been the whole machinery of the administration of the Colony to be coped with by the half-a-dozen of us (Europeans, I mean), and that administration practically on trial itself, and savagely aware of the fact! Well, as far as the moral victory goes, I think our side has gained to the full the good success you wished us, but, at the same time, the 'powers of this world' are powers, and one cannot stand up to them without getting knocked about. So here is Dinuzulu, after all his efforts and success on the side of law and order (but the success is credited to others!), a prisoner in Pietermaritzburg gaol, where I am only allowed to visit him once a month. In the matter of money, too, one must get the worst of it, e.g., when the other side can spend £73,000 in bringing Dinuzulu a prisoner to Pietermaritzburg, when he was quite willing to come without even an escort; and £10,000 and more on his trial before the Supreme Court, not to speak of the expenses of the twelve months' preliminary examination and those of the other connected trials. It is nothing short of amazing that we have won through at all, and that we have done so is due to Mr. Schreiner, who not only conducted the defence, but advanced £2,000 towards his junior's fees when (just at the time I got your note) we were on the point of breaking down for lack of money I am truly thankful to learn that friends in England intend to help us in this respect, and I trust that they will, at any rate, see Mr. Schreiner paid, for most assuredly if South Africa is going to escape a terrible conflict between white and black, it will be largely through Mr. Schreiner's brave and masterly and most Christian defence of Dinuzulu."

—Yours, &c., NORMAN BENNET,
Diocesan Missioner for Hereford.
June 30th, 1908.

[We believe the statement that the Misses Colenso have expended every penny of their private fortune—some £6,000—in the defence of Dinizulu to be strictly true. We hope that so splendid an act will be recognised; indeed, the honor of the country is concerned in the repayment of money devoted purely to the cause of Imperial justice.—ED., NATION.]

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Government's refusal to recoup Miss Colenso and her sister for the pecuniary losses they have suffered in defending Dinizulu, the Zulu chief, on the grounds that it would be unprecedented, seems to me most unsatisfactory, and still more unsatisfactory is the fact that a Liberal Government does not use its influence in securing the immediate release of an absolutely innocent man. As we know, the Natal Government trumped up charges against Dinizulu because the Natal colonists wanted the land of the Zulus. Dinizulu was brought to trial on charges of high treason and murder. These accusations were not proved, but the Zulu chief, by his own confession, was found guilty of permitting a few half-starved fugitives to take refuge in his neighborhood. In other words, the Natal Christians—for presumably they are Christians—have sentenced a man to four years' imprisonment for carrying out Christ's instructions—i.e., to give food and shelter to those in need.

The situation would be almost humorous if it were not a very grave reflection on the white man's idea of justice. One can only suppose that the public are ignorant of the great services Miss Colenso and her sister have rendered to the cause of civilisation and justice, otherwise the £6,000 required to place these two noble ladies beyond want would have been subscribed long ago.—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS FOX PITT.
War Coppice, near Caterham, Surrey,
June 30th, 1909.

---

THE LORDS AND THE FINANCE BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to the article in your issue of last week, in which you discuss the right of the House of Lords to amend or reject the Finance Bill, are your readers to understand that the words in the preamble to the Bill, "that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled," have no meaning whatever?—Yours, &c.,

CLEVELAND FYFE.
June 29th, 1909.

[The application of that phrase to Money Bills is precisely the matter discussed in our article.—ED., NATION.]

THE EFFECT OF THE LAND TAXES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is generally supposed that the effect of the land tax clauses of the Budget will be to bring building land into the market, and the arguments pro and con have been based upon this assumption. For a time, of course, this will be so, but the ultimate result will be the contrary.

I am the owner of land, some of which is "ripe" for building, but the greater part of which is not. I shall have to make up my mind at what figure to return it. As far as land ripe for building is concerned, as the writer of your article on "The Argument for the Land Taxes" points out, it will be to my interest to find the true probable figure at which I can sell. Therefore, having decided how much of my land will come in for building in the next five or ten years, I shall value it at its selling price, and probably proceed to build small houses on it, and let them for the time with an acre of land each in order to escape the tax. The rest of the land, which is either too far from a station or, being back land, will require expensive roadmaking to make it suitable for building purposes, I shall treat as agricultural and lump at £50 an acre. As I wish to see my land developed, I shall return a larger proportion of it as building land than will my neighbors, and probably, therefore, the Commissioners will accept my figures without dispute.

So far, so good. But when the land so valued is exhausted, I am left with land which I have put at £50 an acre. In the normal course, this would have been gradually "ripening," and in ten years' time would take the place of the land now "ripe," and be sold or let for building. But under the Finance Bill this process will be checked by the increment tax of 20 per cent., and the landowner will endeavor to hold his land up till the demand for it is so great that he can get this tax out of his purchaser or lessee. I am aware, of course, that it is proposed to periodically re-value the land for the purpose of the ½d. tax, but in a way this will only make matters worse, because it will not only be to the landlord's interest, or supposed interest, to hold up land once valued as agricultural, but even to avoid for the time the appearance of its being building land, and this he can do in a variety of ways, as, for instance, by letting the access to it on lease.—Yours, &c., R. C. PHILLIMORE.

Tranarossan, Downings Bay, Co. Donegal,
June 23rd, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the otherwise admirable and lucid résumé of the proposed legislation as to the land taxes published in your issue for the 26th June, you say with regard to the undeveloped land tax: "The tax will be a halfpenny in the pound levied on the amount by which the capital value of any land which has no buildings upon it, or is not used for trade or industry, exceeds its value for purely agricultural purposes."

Surely you are in error as to this. As I read Section 10 of the Bill, the tax is to be levied on the whole site value of land worth more than £50 an acre. Thus, take a piece of land let to a farmer whose capitalised value, based upon the rent paid by the farmer, is £40 an acre, but whose full value is £100, the tax will be levied, not (as the résumé would seem to have it) on £60, but upon the full £100.—Yours, &c., FRED. J. H. HERLE.

9, Radnor Place, Hyde Park, W.
June 28th, 1909.

---

"THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am very grateful to Mrs. Sidney Webb for her very full and instructive letter to THE NATION of June 5th, dealing with the difficult question of the Registrar's position and duties under the scheme of the Minority Report. There is one matter—namely, the amount of charge and recovery involved—in regard to which I should like to make my position a little clearer. It is not for fear that the Registrar should be unduly harsh in attempting to recover from the very poor that I regret the extensive amount of indebtedness that I foresee under this scheme, especially in the matter of medical relief. It is because I dislike a credit system, even when payment for what has been received is enforced only in the case of those who are considered by some authority as able to pay, in accordance with a fixed scale. The scheme by which the Medical Officer of Health will treat by advice, and—if sanctioned by the Registrar—by home aliment, any case which comes under his notice, must inevitably to a large extent supersede the work of Provident Medical Associations, doctors' clubs, and friendly societies, by which people are encouraged to ensure themselves for medical treatment in time of illness. The medical treatment thus provided may no doubt often be unsatisfactory; but if insurance is preferable to credit, it would be better to direct our efforts towards improving such provident schemes rather than to adopt a plan which cannot fail to weaken them.

The great difficulty lies in the question of outdoor relief. Mrs. Sidney Webb says that at present the Education Authority, Health Authority, Police Authority, and Lunacy Authority, are all relieving members of the same family simultaneously, so that some families are receiving in the aggregate more than the laborer's income. This might be misleading, because in effect not one of these authorities is distributing any relief in the homes of the poor, but is only granting institutional relief. There would, it appears to me, be many advantages in handing over to these authorities all institutional relief, whether primarily intended for the destitute or not, and so to a great extent breaking up the Poor Law, and ensuring a more complete break up of the general mixed workhouse than would be possible under the Majority scheme. But when it comes to all these authorities—as well as the new Authority to deal with the able bodied—distributing outdoor relief or home aliment, one feels that even the Registrar will prove unequal to the amount of enquiry, investigation, and supervision which must ensue, if worse evils are to be prevented.

The defence of the Registrar is obviously based on the idea that only a carefully trained expert can assimilate, digest, and criticise large masses of evidence, and—in general—that a single person can organise and control, in a more rapid and efficient manner than any body, this or any other complicated system involving the examination of reports or evidence. Such an idea has much in it to attract, and has many theoretical advantages; but it is open to serious practical objections. Such an official cannot investigate personally, except in a number of special and typical cases, and hence is apt to lose touch with actuality.

It is obvious that one point in which present Poor Law administration fails is in having nothing to offer except outdoor relief or the workhouse. Outdoor relief may be refused on one of many grounds (and rightly refused in that a mere weekly allowance is often ineffectual to relieve poverty: there are other and deeper forces at work than mere lack of means), and the offer of the workhouse is not accepted. The situation is a deadlock, and is a sufficiently common one. What is wanted in such cases is a friendly visitor, who will look at the situation from the point of view of the family as a whole, and has the knowledge which will enable him to bring to bear upon the various weak spots in the situation all the forces, whether provided by charity, or the State, or other agencies. Under the Minority scheme, visiting may, of course, be provided by the various Committees at work; but no visitor from the Care Committee, or Health Committee, or Asylums Committee, will feel any responsibility for the family as a whole: each will consider the person that interests him. The Registrar is to consider solely the pecuniary resources of the family, and will have no concern whatever with its health or morals. Under this scheme we should, no doubt, secure the co-ordination of all relief given under the heading of the family; but should we also secure that restorative treatment which will bring back the independence of the family as a whole? For this must surely be our ultimate aim.

If there is anything in these considerations they suggest a recasting of the Registrar's position. It might be possible to establish a Poor Law Committee of the County or County Borough Council which should receive all applications for relief in the first instance and hand over to other Committees all cases for which institutional relief was required, while reserving to themselves the sole right to grant outdoor relief. Such a committee would retain under its own control in the way of institutional relief only a temporary receiving home, such as is suggested for the Registrar. It might make use of the services of volunteers as visitors for special cases, and should also have the advantage of a better-paid and better-qualified official, and one endowed with greater powers than the present Relieving Officer. It would be the duty of this official to collect for the use of the Committee all possible information as to what other Committees were granting in the way of school meals, pensions, &c.

I know that it is easy work to raise objections to any scheme and yet I think that useful work may be done if in a helpful and constructive spirit we can point out what seem to each of us the dangers and drawbacks of proposed schemes, and so feel our way towards the best that is within our reach.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) C. D. Rackham, P.L.G.

Cambridge,
June 22nd, 1909.

"OUR OLD NOBILITY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I note your reference to Howard Evans's "Our Old Nobility." I have before me the sixpenny edition. If this could be produced still lower, it would act like gunpowder.—Yours, &c., John Lewis.

Spedan Tower,
West Heath, Hampstead, N.W.
June 26th, 1909.

THE DESTRUCTION OF DIALECT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The following words still used in Cumberland may be of interest to your readers:—

A farmer "spanes" his calves, when he weans them, and his wife's bread is "sad" if it does not rise well. One can "cowp" a cart, or if one gets a head-over-heels tumble, one may be told: "Thou got a gai cowp there." A "menseful" woman is one who is a good housewife, and hospitable, and she saves both her "mense and means" when she invites visitors to stay a meal if they do not accept her invitation. An old "stegg" (gander) is an object to be steered clear of; and it is advisable on a cold night to "sneck" the door if one does not want black looks. A bad fire gives little low (rhyme with "now") but much reek. A cow is fastened in its "buse" in the byre, and a "whye" (female) calf can give one a good "tewing" if one tries to lead it where is does not want to go. It is as well not to "mell" with a wasp's nest, and to reach the cushat's nest, one may have to get the "stye" (ladder) out of the "lathe" (barn). A professor of English a few years ago wrote that when the Cumbrians called tourists "lakers," they referred to the fact that they were taking their holidays at the lakes; surely he had never heard a mother telling her bairns to "gan oot and lake." A busy person, as well as being as "thrang as three in a bed," can also be as "thrang as Throp's wife," though who she was, I cannot say. To hear a person "yacking" and coughing and "sniftering" is not pleasant, neither is it pleasant to hear a youngster "yowl" when it has sat on an "urchin" (hedgehog). In Wensleydale there is an old use of "at," equal to "from" in use; as, "Let me take that parcel at you."—Yours, &c.,

J. Slater.

Hull, June 28th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A contributor in a recent issue eulogising dialects, attacks Esperanto as inimical to them. This is, I think, a mistake proceeding from a misconception of the aim and nature of Esperanto. Besides being an Esperantist, I am a constant student of European languages and dialects, and am thus sympathetic to both parties, being, indeed, in agreement with your contributor on many of his other points.

Granting that the loss of individuality, shown by loss of local costumes and customs, as well as by loss of local languages, is a loss to the world, and admitting that the "single shroud" or "broad high noon" of one all-pervading language would be a catastrophe, I maintain that far from having any such result, Esperanto will have the directly opposite effect of perpetuating the existing dialects, and probably fostering the creation or revival of others. Esperanto, in providing a neutral basis for communication between persons speaking different languages, allows each to be ignorant of the other's "dialect," so that the condition to which Esperanto tends is one of co-existence of all dialects (languages) with Esperanto as the general medium for intercommunication. This view is one accepted by Esperantists, for a Catalan who attended the Cambridge Esperanto Congress assured me that he and other Catalan Esperantists wished to see two languages spoken in Catalonia—the Catalan for home affairs, and Esperanto for all external relations. In this case the indigenous dialect would be the gainer, and the only loss (one more apparent than real) would pertain to the Castilian "book language" of Spain. Translations have already been published in Esperanto from Flemish, Platt Deutsch, Provençal, Ruthenian, Croatian, Erse, &c., with the avowed object of increasing (not diminishing) the knowledge of these dialects.

The best language for the expression of one's thoughts to one's own people is the language of one's homeland; the best language for communicating them to all the world is the medium of greatest common measure. These are two kinds of best which are not conflictory, but mutually interdependent—the dialect for the hearth, Esperanto for the world-stage.—Yours, &c.,

G. L. Browne,
President Norda Stelo Esperanto Society,
53, Burghley Road, London, N.

Highgate Road, N.W.
June 23rd, 1909.

"THE COMING REALITY OF POLITICS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your readers who, like myself, have studied the imperfections, manœuvrings, delays, and feeble outputs in useful Acts of ten reformed Parliaments, must have felt refreshed if they caught any of the inspiration which your recent articles on the present political situation were so competent to impart. In advocating a special tax on that portion of land revenues derived from the presence of the community, and not from individual effort, you make a close approach to the theory promoted by Quesnay Patrick E. Dove, J. Stuart Mill, Carlyle, and Henry George—viz., that individual ownership of land is inimical to the commonwealth. It is thus that the newer countries are resuming lands formerly sold; it was on this ground that Texas reserved for the people of Texas the ownership and control which had in all the other States passed to the Federal Government of the United States. For the purpose of substituting State for individual control (and in the end ownership) a land tax is not only the most convenient, but the most efficient method. The heroic effort of the present custodian of the national purse to re-establish an elastic land tax not only holds the field as a veritable fiscal reform, but marks an era in the renaissance of society through the corporate action of the State.

It was high time to call attention to the use of every artifice ingenuity can devise to perpetuate class privileges of which individual property in land is the fundamental and chief.

All this is, to me, reminiscent of similar tactics in the past, employed more successfully than they are likely to be in attacking the Budget of 1909. In 1866-7 the whimsical controversy on renting and rating overshadowed the real issue; the extension of political power to the proletariat and the most cogent objection to the Bill, the exclusion of the rural householder. Similarly the political aspect of the disestablishment of the Irish Church obscured the disposition of the temporalities and the effect to be produced on the ownership of land. The extension of the Ulster tenant right to the whole of Ireland, although "a simple act of justice," frightened the late Duke of Argyll out of the Cabinet of the time, and it was the raising of the question of how far the national interest in the revenues would prejudice that of the landowner enticed him to cross swords with Henry George. It was not a Parliament in Dublin that the Home Rule dissentients feared so much as the land reforms that would there be initiated and held up for Trans-Channel imitation. It was the desire of a landed Parliament to get the Irish landlords expropriated without financial scaith that to a national credit of £100,000,000 was added a bonus of £12,000,000 without any valuable consideration whatever. It was thought no injustice to saddle non-agricultural ratepayers with five-eighths of the farmers' rates. Nor did Mr. Chamberlain and his apologists see any inconsistency in dropping like a hot coal the land reforms he had assiduously preached before he joined the Unionist—or landlord—alliance. But the electorate are taking more stock in "the coming reality" and less in the will-o'-the-wisps by which they have in the past been misled and betrayed.

It occurs to me that The Nation, in a cognate article, and even the Chancellor of the Exchequer, are underestimating the recuperation which land values have lately undergone, and not less the enormous advance as a whole, since the land tax was based on the valuation of 1692. It is even in 1909 a rise of something like forty times the early value. The rise of rent in Scotland since the abolition of military service in 1747 is something like 400 per cent. The fall which took place in the end of last century has been largely recovered, and did not over all Scotland at any time exceed 30 per cent. The abnormally high rents of the "'seventies" of last century were due to a period of prosperity and the inability of home produce to meet the increased demand. The succeeding fall was due to the better railway communication from the virgin prairies of the New World and the cheaper transportation which the triumphs of marine engineering similarly afforded. But the beam has so oscillated in the opposite direction that, apart from bad seasons, agriculture is prosperous. Prices are higher, and rents have not failed to respond. Even the derelict clays of Essex are yielding rent after due satisfaction of tithes and rates. There is, however, a good case for special consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—viz., the hardship attached to purchases of land made at the time of abnormally high rents and on the capitalisation of them at thirty years' purchase.—Yours, &c.,

John McCulloch.

June 28th, 1909.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I direct your attention to a statement you make on p. 319 in reviewing Mr. Hobson's book on "The Overplus of Wealth"?

You say that even if the tax reached 20s. in the £ on the productive surplus, it would have no such (detrimental) effect. Surely this ought to be un-productive surplus? Otherwise you miss the whole force of your argument.

In other respects it is a very interesting and carefully-considered review of a most useful contribution towards solving our present social and industrial problems.—Yours, &c.,

H. T. Poole.

Ingleside, Lyttleton Road, Stechford,
June 29th, 1909.

Poetry.

IN COBBETT'S COUNTRY.

A patch of plough, a little wood, a strip
Of meadowland that hugs the frugal stream,
Still interlaced in sober-motley scheme
Vary anew their threefold fellowship.

Each parcelled piece the straggling hedgerows clip
Limns on the land the peasant-owner's dream,
Disowns the unkindly rich, and bids redeem
That all-in-all the hoodwinked poor let slip.

The terrain spells a charter. Here and here
The squatter's axe, the adventurous yeoman's blade,
Carried a point against the wild, and men
Made the land human—every pioneer
So tamed his shrew—made each his croft, and made
England out of the forest and the fen.

J. S. Phillimore.

Reviews.

HISTORY FOR THE UPPER CLASSES.*

The rich, as we know, take a passionate interest in the religious education of the children of the poor. Perhaps a time will come when the poor will begin to concern themselves about the historical education of the children of the rich. One of the acutest minds of his time saw, a century ago, that the upper classes had turned the universities and public schools into institutions for imposing the ideas of a class upon the people of England. Much of Cobbett's criticism is, fortunately, no longer true, but it remains true that the insulation of sympathy which is so conspicuous a characteristic of English society is largely the result of an education in which a class sense and a class atmosphere are allowed to dominate the interpretation of history and of life.

A particularly flagrant example of this spirit is provided in two volumes just published by an Oxford don under the title of "An Introductory History of England." If we wanted to find a motto for the book, we should inscribe on it the famous remark of Bishop Horsley, that "the people have nothing to do with the laws except to obey them." By a curious irony this book makes its appearance at a time when Oxford is considering proposals for bringing the University into closer touch and sympathy with the democratic life of the country. It is hoped by the authors of those proposals that trade union secretaries and other working men will be enabled to take advantage of the teaching of economic history which is supplied in the University. Now, if the secretary of one of the cotton trade unions, full of ardor for the great riches of learning now to be spread before him, should open this volume, he will find the history of his class summed up in this illuminating sentence: "Like all trades dependent for their raw material on foreign countries, that of cotton was subject to great fluctuations, and liable to famines in time of war; hence the operatives or 'hands' have always been a turbulent race, given to strikes and riots." This description, as notable for its good taste as for its justice, is very happily conceived for increasing the working man's confidence in the strict impartiality of the Oxford teaching which he is invited to share. It is not less happily conceived for teaching the youth of a public school to appreciate the history and the character of some hundreds of thousands of their fellow countrymen. Here, again, is a characteristic sentence: "Crime, disease, discontent, and Radicalism, though far from rare in villages, are the natural children of great cities." These two sentences are taken, not as piquant paradoxes, but as illustrations of the temper of the book. There runs throughout Mr. Fletcher's conception of history the idea that the upper classes are the only people who have any right to be considered. This is not exactly a liberalising doctrine to teach to the youth of the upper classes, but what makes it worse is that the whole tendency of Mr. Fletcher's book is to give the impression that, while the poor have no rights, the rich have no duties. Thus, though he is full of contempt for the ignorance of the "lower classes," we cannot find any allusion in these pages to the fact that the rich, who were, and are, educated very largely with the help of endowments left for the poor, took during the days of their supreme power a less public-spirited view of the responsibilities of a State for the education of the poor than did the rulers of almost any other great country in Europe. It is often said that democracy is a bad form of government, because it means government by a class which is tempted to make rash experiments from its ignorance of history. Can it be argued that a class which is brought up on such history as this can be expected to take a larger or more generous view of politics? If a man relied on this book, he would never suppose that men like Hardy (whom Mr. Fletcher dismisses as the Piccadilly Bootmaker), who risked their lives and liberties for Reform, cared at all for their country, or that there was any connection between the form of government and the intolerable miseries of the poor at the beginning of the nineteenth century, that the brunt of the French war fell on "the lower classes," that at the end of it the French peasant had exchanged poverty for independence, and the English peasant independence for poverty, and that certain families, very much before the public eye at this moment, derive their ample fortunes from those years and those events.

Now, if Mr. Fletcher had held no official position, it would be unnecessary to treat his book seriously. An historian who can never speak of the English reform movement except as "froth," who tells us that he thinks there has been no statesman in England since Castlereagh, that all history is an anti-climax after the Six Acts, that the task of describing so hideous an event as the reform of 1832 is too heartbreaking for him to attempt it, is not likely to seduce the judgment of educated men. An historian who can never speak of the French Revolution except as "poison" or as "anarchy" or "the desire to massacre the intelligent classes of all nations" (if this were a true analysis possibly some of Mr. Fletcher's heroes exaggerated their own dangers) is not likely to arrest the attention of mankind as a profound and original observer of the deeper causes and forces of history. An historian who can only say of the leaders of the American Revolution that "the most disgusting hypocrite of the lot is perhaps Benjamin Franklin, the Pennsylvania Quaker," is not likely to make his readers take too flattering a view of his power to survey with composure and to master a complex situation. An occasional revelation of the basis of knowledge on which Mr. Fletcher builds his prejudices does not repair the confidence that the violence of his language weakens. A footnote on p. 329, into which he has apparently been betrayed by a misreading of Lord Rosebery's "Pitt," shows that he is not aware of the main outline of Whig Foreign Policy before 1786. Mr. Fletcher himself sagely remarks that "Chroniclers may indeed faithfully record the events of their own and their fathers' age, but such records can hardly be accounted History, for fair judgment on such events will be impossible." It is certainly difficult to write contemporary history, but it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that Croker and Creevey, who were not historians but mere "party men" for whom Mr. Fletcher has such contempt, found it easier to do justice to the living than Mr. Fletcher finds it to do justice to the dead. Further, if Mr. Fletcher's book is too violent to be plausible, it cannot be complained of him, as it was complained of another historian, that he bewitches the judgment of his readers by the dazzling charm of his style. Magdalen has not given us here a second Gibbon. Indeed, though Mr. Fletcher does not let off the faults of other writers lightly (he is very severe on the "froth" of Paine and of Mackintosh), his literary standard for a history tutor would seem to be less exacting than that which is, or was, expected of a Greats pupil.

We will give a few examples of his lively and almost colloquial English:—

> "The Princess of Wales was, it must be admitted, almost as great a 'horror' as her husband, though in a different kind of way."
>
> "An income-tax of ten per cent. till then a 'horror' unheard of by Englishmen."
>
> "We have certain data to go upon, which I had better give you in a horrid 'table.'"
>
> "My view will, I suppose, be called a frightful heresy."
>
> "This was a fearfully extravagant process."

We are not without hope of discovering, if we read a little further, some character described as a "dear." Another trick of style, not common among historians, which Mr. Fletcher affects is the use of "too" in italics, in the manner of ladies writing to each other in moments of enthusiasm. He is so fond of his playful pun on Whig and Wig that, not content with taking it as the heading of a chapter, he returns to it again and again in the text, at the risk of tiring those of his readers whose sense of humor is more fickle. A book of this kind might safely be left to itself in an audience of educated men. But Mr. Fletcher's volume, it must be remembered, goes into the public schools with the prestige of a University teacher behind it for the instruction of boys who are beginning the study of history, and who have no means of distinguishing between an historian of the type of Mr. Fletcher and an historian of the type of Green. This is to be the nursery of their ideas. Let anybody recall Professor Gilbert Murray's inaugural lecture, tracing the influence of Greek in stimulating the best qualities and sympathies of the English character, and then turn to this work, with its continual trickle of cynicism and ridicule, its insolent contempt of the poor, its ὕβρις of class and property, its encouragement of the narrowest prejudices of oligarchy, and then ask himself what kind of a citizen and what kind of a politician is likely to be bred on the study of a book that teaches its readers to regard their fellow-countrymen through this perverted medium.

* "An Introductory History of England." Vols. 3 and 4. By C. R. L. Fletcher, formerly Fellow of All Souls and Magdalen Colleges, Oxford. Murray.

There is a further reflection to be made on Mr. Fletcher's performance. We have no objection to partisan historians. The historian who never takes sides is too cold and too remote from human life to treat his subject with insight. But a very elementary moral sense teaches us that a man who is writing an introductory history is in a specially responsible position. He cannot give the evidence on which he bases his conclusions; he merely gives his conclusions. In Mr. Fletcher's case, conclusions are communicated to boys who have no means of testing the evidence. Common honesty demands of such a writer a certain care and moderation in his treatment of reputations that are, in a sense, in his keeping. If a writer has space to set out all the facts that are relevant, he may splash the characters of dead men with abuse as freely as he please. If he cannot set out the facts, remembering that he is determining the impression that a number of boys will take, perhaps to keep through life, of men of whom they at present know nothing, he will be particularly careful not to treat his opponents with less than justice. Now, how does Mr. Fletcher treat the Whigs and the Radicals? Romilly, one of the greatest names in the development of civilised law, is just mentioned twice. The first allusion speaks of him as "provided for in a Government"; the second sneers at his sincerity and patriotism. This is how Whitbread is introduced: "Mr. Whitbread the brewer, type of many a Whig and prig of the future, in whom burned the spirit of political Nonconformity of the coming century." Mr. Fletcher does not mention that Whitbread was one of the few persons who tried to arrest the destruction of the English village, and that if he had not been prevented by the Peers and Church of England he would have established in 1807 the national system of education for which England had to wait till 1870. Of Cobbett we are told that he was sentenced to imprisonment for a libel on the Army. Mr. Fletcher does not add that the libel consisted in a passionate protest, which any Englishman would be proud to have written, against the public flogging of English militiamen in the presence of a German legion specially brought to Ely to keep order. We somehow fancy that if Cobbett had been Minister of War instead of Castlereagh, and Castlereagh had written the libel instead of Cobbett, Mr. Fletcher would have found space to touch on the circumstances.

The first of these two volumes closes with this footnote:—

> "Fox, according to a story often denied, but never disproved, went the length of sending a private friend, Sir Robert Adair, to St. Petersburg, to intrigue with Russia against the British Ministry, and thereby incurred the guilt of high treason."

What are the facts about this incident? Burke, who brought the charge in the heat of a bitter quarrel, in a letter which was published, without his consent, four years later, said he heard it from a friend connected with the Ministry. Bishop Tomline, Pitt's biographer, said he could prove it from documents he had found among Pitt's papers. This is the evidence against Fox. The evidence in his favor consists in the fact that Bishop Tomline, when challenged to produce his evidence, failed to do so, and in Sir Robert Adair's own full explanation of all the circumstances of the case, which shows that he visited St. Petersburg on his own initiative, that Fox gave him no message or instruction, and merely, on hearing that he was going there, asked him to send any news he might gather. Mr. Lecky, who will not be suspected of any partiality for the memory of Fox, accepted Adair's statement as unimpeachable. It is even more significant that Canning, Pitt's most intimate disciple, afterwards chose Adair for a most delicate diplomatic mission to Constantinople, and that Lord Stanhope, who had in his hands, when writing his "Life of Pitt," all the documents left to Tomline, said that he could find no evidence for Tomline's statement. Now supposing this charge had concerned the character not of Fox, but of Castlereagh, would Mr. Fletcher have printed that footnote at all, and if he had printed it, would he have written "disproved" or "proved"? These are merely a few instances of Mr. Fletcher's idea of fairness. Professor Firth, in his sweeping indictment of the Oxford History School four years ago, said that the School turned out its pupils without either the equipment or the mental habits of scholars. Mr. Fletcher has now brought upon it a worse reproach, for in his haste to shelter all his private prejudices under the august name of history, he has shown that he, a teacher, and not a pupil in that School, lacks what is easier to acquire than the scholar's sense of history and the scholar's sense of style, the rudiments of the scholar's care for justice.

---

PROPHECY AND COINCIDENCE.*

It is hard to see that there is any more cogent reason for doubting the existence of the prophetic faculty than there is for doubting the existence of Napoleon Bonaparte or of Daniel Defoe. Archbishop Whately, indeed, showed that there were many "reasons" for suspecting the story of Napoleon to be a collection of myths; and it might be easy enough to show that the received account of the author of "Robinson Crusoe" is of a highly suspicious character. Still, we "believe in" Napoleon, and we believe in Defoe; and as has been observed, it is difficult to see why a belief in the existence of the prophetic faculty should be considered absurd, superstitious, or irrational. Of course, the power of foreseeing events is a rare one; but then Shakespeare, Napoleon, Defoe, Turner are more than rare; each is a unique. Again, we do not understand the second sight; we cannot imagine how it is done. But we do not understand how "Hamlet" is done, we do not understand how Turner's pictures are painted, we do not understand how a subordinate French officer conquered all Europe: if we consider the universe calmly we shall find that we do not really understand how anything is done, though by the judicious use of long words of Greek and Latin origin we occasionally persuade ourselves that we understand everything. It would be interesting, by the way, to discover how many people out of a hundred who use the term "gravitation" are able to give a clear account of the meaning of the doctrine involved therein.

Surely the only proper spirit with which to approach the question of prophecy—as also the question of why the apple falls to the ground—is the scientific spirit. That is we must start from the facts, from the evidence producible; not from certain abstract principles. It is one thing to declare after careful enquiry that the evidence for the alleged fact of the transmutation of metals is unsatisfactory and insufficient; it is quite another thing to pronounce that alchemy is an impossibility. It would probably be safe enough to say that the vast majority of witch trials prove nothing save the existence of a mass of absurdity, credulity, and malignity; it would be temerarious in the highest degree to affirm the impossibility of witchcraft, that is, of a certain obscure and malign power of the human will. So with the prophetic faculty: there may be no such thing. But we must not assume as our major premiss the proposition: "There is no such thing as prophecy," and then proceed to disprove, by that very assumption, all the affirmative evidence that may be offered. Such a procedure is neither logical, nor scientific; it is, indeed, radically inhuman. For it seems probable enough that a sort of universal "there-is-no-such-thing" premiss governs the minds—sometimes very highly developed—of the lower animals; and hence ants do not write sonnets, and bees know nothing of artistic modelling in wax.

Now, as Mr. Andrew Lang points out in his introductory chapter to "The Prophecies of the Brahan Seer," by Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, there is a considerable body of evidence bearing on this question of prophecy. Mr. Lang gives several instances of the prophetic faculty; the most remarkable of which is as follows:—

> "On June 15th [of last year] a lady, well known to me, and in various fields of literature, told me that, calling on another lady the day before, she had seen a vision of a man, previously unknown to her, who thrust a knife into her friend's left side. I offered to bet £100 against fulfilment. In autumn my friend, again calling at the same house, met the man of her vision on the doorstep. Entering, she found her friend dying, as her constitution did not rally after an operation on her left side, performed by the man of the vision, who was a surgeon."

* "The Prophecies of the Brahan Seer." By Alexander Mackenzie, F.S.A. (Scot.). Stirling: Eneas Mackay. 2s. 6d.

Now, it seems to the writer that if this piece of evidence stood alone, it would be conclusive as to the existence of the prophetic faculty in man. One speck of radium proves the existence of that substance as well as ten thousand specks; if we had seen a single individual dead it would absolutely prove the fact of death. But this story is only one out of many similar narratives, ancient and modern; and, as Mr. Lang observes, "the kind of story is always the same . . . the legends of St. Columba, in Adamnan, are much on a par, in many cases, with modern examples in 'The Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research.'" And it is not reasonable to suppose that "Australians, Tonkaways, Aztecs, Incas, Samoyeds," &c., &c., read up Adamnan with a view to seeing their visions in a proper and classic manner; nor would it be tolerable to charge Adamnan with having "cribbed" his procedure from Maoris and Polynesians. There is just the same kind of evidence for the existence of the faculty of second sight or prophecy as there is for the existence of the appetite or passion called thirst, though it is not pretended that prophets are, or ever have been, as common as thirsty men. But, on the other hand, it is probable—or rather certain—that there have been many more prophets than—for example—supreme literary artists. The undoubted fact that there have been very few poets of the first rank in the world does not constitute an argument against the existence of exquisite poetry.

It is to be presumed that the true reason—as apart from the alleged reason—why men do not believe in prophecy while they do (in a certain sense) believe in poetry is this: Any man can convince himself of the existence of such a thing as poetry by going to his bookshelf; but a similar proof of prophecy is not always, or even often, within his reach. But this difference in demonstration arises from the nature of the case: the printed page proves at once the existence of measured language, but though Mr. Lang is ready to swear to the truth of the story that has been quoted, we are at liberty, if we like, to say that he is a liar. In reality, this objection is only the old objection of "rarity" in a new form; it is only another way of stating that the prophetic gift is not the property of every human being. And, just in the same way, there are no doubt myriads of human beings who think, or who would think, that Turner's pictures are nonsense. And it would be impossible to "prove" the beauty of Turner's work to such persons, inasmuch as they lack the faculty of artistic discernment. A more formidable objection than this is the theory of coincidence; and it is much to be wished that some ingenious person would elaborate a "Doctrine of Coincidence," and lay down the laws of blind chance, regarded as an explanation of the marvellous. If, for example, a man living in a country village told his wife at breakfast that he had dreamt the night before that he would meet a friend on his morning walk, clearly it would not do to proclaim him a prophet because the event made the dream veridical. The marvel would have been if the vision had not come true. Again, if our countryman had a similar premonition before a visit to London and met his old friend Giles in Leicester Square: here the evidence would be no evidence, since London, large though it be, was well called by Stevenson "the City of Encounters." The ratio of improbability, of the unlikelihood of the coincidence may be increased indefinitely; still, the improbable does happen, and strange coincidences without number have been recorded. But let us take our countryman again; let us suppose him never to have heard of African Pigmies. Then, if he were to dream that he saw three Black Dwarfs, armed with peculiar weapons, walking up the village street, and if this vision were realised—as it might have been a year or two ago—then, it seems to the writer, coincidence would be an intolerable explanation. So with Mr. Andrew Lang's story. Chance and coincidence might account for his friend's dreaming of the knife in the lady's side; but chance and coincidence cannot reasonably account for her vision of the specific features of a specific doctor—whom she had never seen.

Hence it is difficult to agree with Mr. Lang's somewhat low estimate of the evidential value of Mr. Mackenzie's most interesting and curious book. The Brahan Seer, Coinneach Odhar Fiosaiche, lived in the seventeenth century, and no doubt Mr. Lang is right in considering that his history is largely legendary, that many of his "prophecies" were concocted after the event, and that many others which have not been fulfilled never can be fulfilled—unless the clan system of the Highlands should be restored. All this may be admitted; but the Seaforth Prophecy remains. This is certain: that somebody or other, Coinneach or Donald or Fergus matters not, prophesied, with minute detail, the disastrous end of a well-known Scottish family. There is evidence to show that this prophecy was known before the event, and in due course the doom of the Seaforths was fulfilled to the smallest particular. Here is the prophecy:—

> "I see a chief, the last of his house, both deaf and dumb. He will be the father of four fair sons, all of whom he will follow to the tomb. He will . . . die mourning, knowing that the honours of his line are to be extinguished for ever . . . the remnant of his possessions shall be inherited by a white-coifed lassie from the East, and she is to kill her sister. And as a sign by which it may be known that these things are coming to pass, there shall be four great lairds in the days of the last deaf and dumb Seaforth—Gairloch, Chisholm, Grant, and Raasay—of whom one shall be buck-toothed, another hare-lipped, another half-witted, and the fourth a stammerer."

And this doom was fulfilled in the person of Francis Humbertson Mackenzie, Lord Seaforth, who died in 1815. This unfortunate man was rendered totally deaf by an attack of scarlet fever in his boyhood; in his last years he became dumb. All his sons predeceased him, his title became extinct, a daughter, a young widow (and therefore "white-coifed") came from India to take possession of the property. This lady was driving her younger sister in a pony carriage, when the horses bolted, and the sister received fatal injuries. And the four lairds mentioned in the prophecy were actually in existence, with the peculiarities mentioned, at the time of Lord Seaforth's death. And one can only say that the inquirer who pronounced the prophecy and its fulfilment to be a case of mere coincidence would, in all probability, declare St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey to be purely natural formations.

A. M.

---

THE ONE AND THE MANY.*

People with no tincture of philosophy will be apt to marvel that two abstract terms like unity and plurality, the pale, listless slaves of arithmetic, should ever show so much vitality as to quarrel. They will find it stranger still that warm-blooded human beings should become partisans in their respective causes. Even the literary man who has got his head out of the fog of words into the purer atmosphere of historical contemplation wonders at the strange spectral battle. Its noises fall but faintly on his ears, like sounds from elf-land borne. In his opinion, the struggle may not even seem mystic; he talks of the philosophers battering in no dignified way the blind wall of a cul de sac. He, mounted as he is, and so able to see over the heads of the advancing human horde, believes he has a vista before him.

But the philosopher answers with a weary smile. The literary man's vista is but the dust thrown up by the human rabble. His problems of realism, art, inspiration, and genius are impenetrable to him; he really sees no farther than his own nose. No answer can be given to his inquiries until he has learned to gaze upon the problem of the world in all its universality. The first question to solve must be: Is the world one; is there a clue running through the windings of the labyrinth; do the fragments which we grasp all fit together into one vast system? Or have we fragments and nothing but fragments—things that we cannot properly call even fragments, because that suggests that they are the broken parts of a whole? The Greeks put the alternative more simply: Is the world the result of chance?

In our modern turmoil least of all can the plain man and his spokesman, the man of letters, feel the significance of the simple terms of philosophy. In simpler times it perhaps was not so.

* "A Pluralistic Universe." By William James. Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.

"The dun deer troop over the hill,
They are many, the hill is one.
The dun deer vanish,
The hill remains."

To the Celtic poet the one and the many were symbols of emotion, as to the Oriental and to Shelley, to whom the problems of Plato were not unreal.

If anyone were likely to revive an interest in philosophy on the part of those who count themselves cultured, it would be Professor William James. To him the one and the many make an appeal which plays upon the keys of emotion, an emotion to which a heedful reader will respond. Professor James raises the banner of the many. His hopes are all centred in its triumph; the victory of the one would be a dreary tyranny. But why? the reader will ask. Plurality has long been an exile from the philosophical state. Why pledge ourselves to the cause of the pretender? Because a world that really was one would be a finished world, a "block universe," one in which there really were no chances; everything would be what it is by unalterable necessity. Further, if we accepted an idealistic monism, we should have to believe that we finite spirits were not real beings, were mere pulses of the thought of God, as some say, or but faint adumbrations of a consciousness much higher than thought, the immediate self-feeling, the concrete unity itself—the Absolute. Professor James will have none of it; the time has come for revolt; and we have the new romantic movement in philosophy.

But the rebels will have to remember that the ardor of the philosophical loyalists, who will acknowledge but one wholly integral and harmonious universe, is no less strong. In striving for unity the intellect is warring for hearth and home. The one is that in which alone the mind can come to rest. What zest is there in enterprise, if there be for thought no homecoming, if even beyond the seas there is no land where we can settle, and establish our ancestral institutions? The new is only the old in disguise; tear asunder the veil and you find the old love returned from the tomb.

Which way will the strife end? Or will it end at all? Is not ultimately the sceptic right who mocks the self-importance, equally of the plain man, of our latter-day self-assertive poets and playwrights, and of our philosophers ancient and modern, monistic and pluralistic? The demand for unity seems to be due to an ideal which our intellect holds before us, at least the intellectual interest seems to be the strongest motive for taking a monistic attitude. On the other hand, it is our moral nature which maintains that the scheme of things is not finished and fixed, that there is real scope left for effort and initiative. Here, says the sceptic, is the root of the whole difficulty. We find two diverse elements in our nature, two incompatible interests; swayed now by one force, now by the other, we pass from monism to pluralism, and perhaps back again. But either interest has an equally good title to the field. Hence this endless conflict.

But it is perhaps possible to take a more hopeful view, and hold that the contradiction is not inevitable, that there is a unity which allows for the reality of the finite, a pluralism which does not insist upon the inadequacy of the intellect. We are perhaps beginning to discover a basis of agreement between the two doctrines. Present-day pluralists at least allow that logically—as an object of thought—the world is one. Monists rarely try to represent the seeming separateness of human souls as illusory. Let it then be agreed that the world is both one and many. The next problem is of the precise relation of the many to the one. Here generally we find violent disagreement. Single things, according to the pluralists, have a nature independent of the system in which they are placed. We may compare them to straws floating on water, wet, no doubt, because of their fortuitous presence in that medium, but not requiring to be there. Monism maintains that individuals are like the waves or eddies on a stream, capable of no existence apart from the river. In response to the pluralist who protests that many systems exist in which the parts are not so unified, the monist declares that only so are individuals integrated with the total system. If his opponent denies that there is a total system (as apparently Professor James does on p. 328), it will be pointed out that this once more is scepticism. On the other hand, it is only fair to mention that we seem miles away from any acquaintance with the sort of total system the monist describes. It is merely an ideal of thought, not any object of experience. To the physicist, just as the eddies are to the pool, so are the water and the straws floating on it to the medium in which they are themselves both placed. Matter is a differentiation of the universal ether. But in the realm of the spirit no such medium can be descried. Take us human beings as we are; we do not seem to be necessarily implicated in any of the systems in which we find ourselves. Perhaps the system which shall absorb us perfectly does not yet exist; its potentiality is there, no doubt, but a potentiality of future action does not now determine anything. My prospective salary of a thousand a year does not pay my present expenses. Hence, there may be plenty of chances in life left; we need no more to be subdued by our present medium than the boats that ply across the sea share the fate of the waves that sink back upon its bosom. On the other hand, what have we to hope for but the coming into being of that order which shall bear us along in the direction to which our own inner tendencies direct us, of which we shall be but one aspect, with which we shall be in one indissoluble unity? So we are left with the conclusion that, unless the world be the heart-breaking business the sceptics maintain, ethically as well as intellectually, monism must have the last word. But neither has even the spiritual eye seen, nor the spiritual ear heard, tale of the ultimate synthesis of things, though perhaps Plato dreamed of it.

---

THE FATHER OF THE ANALYTIC NOVEL.*

The French literature of the nineteenth century includes few writers at once so interesting and so inexplicable as Henri Beyle, who adopted the name of Stendhal. Beyle himself foretold in 1830 that people would begin to understand him about 1880, though he added a doubt whether he might not be again forgotten by 1930. The first part of his prophecy only erred in putting the date of his fame too late. Balzac, writing in 1840, declared in the "Revue Parisienne" that Stendhal's novel "La Chartreuse de Parme" was a masterpiece, and Stendhal himself one of the closest observers and most original writers of his age. And Balzac was but the first of a crowd of distinguished men of letters who have written in Stendhal's praise. Sainte-Beuve devoted two lengthy articles to him in his "Causeries du Lundi"; Taine acknowledged his influence and pronounced him the greatest psychologist of the nineteenth century; Zola claimed him as the founder of the naturalist school; Mérimée predicted that with the lapse of time his genius would be seen in its true proportions; and M. Bourget, writing forty years after Stendhal's death, stated in the "Essais de Psychologie Contemporaine" that he had said the last word on the group of writers who after 1830 were called "les enfants du siècle," the legion of "melancoliques révoltés." In England he has received less attention, but what has been written about him is nearly all praise. "The Edinburgh Review" published an extended notice of him, written by Abraham Hayward, in 1856, and Mr. Maurice Hewlett, in introducing the English translation of "La Chartreuse de Parme," expresses his "sober belief" that that work is "the greatest novel in France."

From all this it is evident that if Stendhal is never likely to enjoy a wide popularity he is at least capable of stirring those who care for him to a high degree of enthusiasm. And his votaries are to be found in the most unexpected places. The Stendhal Club, in spite of the banter of M. Casimir Stryienski, one of its ablest members, shows a disposition to treat Beyle's least significant letters as inspired scripture. And remembering Nietzsche's verdict that he was the last great psychologist of France, it does not surprise us to be told that not to admire Stendhal is to be outcast from that menacing band of cosmopolitan supermen of whom Dr. Oscar Levy occasionally throws out vague and disturbing hints. It was also inevitable that Mr. James Huneker, an American critic who revels in supermen and iconoclasts, should sooner or later write on Stendhal. But we cannot help conjecturing that when it became known that an English lady had chosen the author of "De L'Amour" as the subject of a thesis for the doctorate, the Rue des Ecoles was moved by a feeling not unlike that which greeted in heaven the news that the penguins had been baptized. We hasten to add that Miss Doris Gunnell has performed her task with great ability; "Stendhal et L'Angleterre" is an interesting and solid contribution to the literature of beylisme.

"Stendhal et L'Angleterre." Par Doris Gunnell. Paris: Bosse. 6fr.

"The Egoists: A Book of Supermen." By James Huneker. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.

The earliest impression left on the mind by reading Stendhal is one of disappointment. His defects are obvious and upon the surface. He was an unblushing plagiarist. There are passages in his "Rome, Naples, et Florence" directly translated from Jeffrey. He borrowed freely from Goethe, and his "Histoire de la Peinture en Italie" is little more than a réchauffé of Lanzi's famous work. He wrote of music in a style that earned him Berlioz's contempt, and of Michel Angelo's Moses his only criticism was that ferocity could not be better depicted. Although he said that he often spent more than a quarter of an hour in choosing an adjective to fit a substantive, his style is dry, jerky, and repellent. He had no ear for the music of verse, and Mérimée tells us that he was unable to repeat a French line with any sense of its metrical value. Even in his three great novels, there is not the slightest trace of any skill in the management of a plot. Incidents jostle one another in the most amazing fashion, and it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the order of many of his chapters might be reversed without causing the reader to feel any disturbance.

In what, then, is his greatness? He answered the question himself when he said he was an "observer of the human heart." Within his own sphere no keener or more clear-sighted annotator of the play of the will and the passions has ever lived. He had the rare combination of deep, if transient, feeling, and the power to note and analyse his own emotions with all the coolness of a detached spectator. Hence his books are filled with general ideas and brilliant flashes of insight. Unfortunately, the materialist philosophy which he accepted from the eighteenth century shut him out from understanding some of the motives which, after all, play the greatest part in life. He believed with Helvétius, whom he admired, that the springs of human conduct reduce themselves to the desire for pleasure, and the different methods of its pursuit formed the unvarying theme of his discussions. He poses a moral problem as if it were a mathematical exercise and solves it with the same directness, adding by way of corollaries maxims which guide to the solution of other analogous problems. He was firmly convinced that everybody who pretended to religion was a hypocrite Mérimée calls him "l'ennemi personnel de la providence," and adds, "il niait Dieu et nonobstant, il lui en voulait comme à un maître." One of Stendhal's own phrases was "La seule chose qui excuse Dieu, c'est qu'il n'existe pas."

And poetry in its deeper meaning was as alien from his mind as religion. Verse, he said, was invented as a help for the memory, and with the invention of printing its value, of course, came to an end. He would have all tragedies written in prose. To everything in poetry but its psychology, to its music, its elevation, its lofty mission of purifying by the presentment of tragic passion, he was blind and deaf.

Mr. Maurice Hewlett says that two ideas moved Stendhal greatly—Italy and Napoleon. He ought to have added a third, to which Stendhal gave far more thought than either of the others—the theory and practice of the domination of women. The famous distinction between amour-goût and amour-passion was made by Stendhal, but he seldom rises to a comprehension of anything more than the sensual aspect of love. It is on this that he lavishes his fullest powers of analysis and psychology. His hero, Julien Sorel, who is a closely-drawn portrait of himself, lives for nothing but intrigue, and his own treatise, "De L'Amour," might be called the breviary of a seducer There is nothing like it in all literature except "Les Liaisons Dangereuses" by Chaderlos de Laclos, a book to which Stendhal, beyond question, owed much.

The one quality which secured Stendhal's undivided admiration was the resolute expression of individuality at all hazards, and in defiance of all laws. His teaching is the quintessence of unabashed egotism. To know your aim and to march resolutely towards it, heedless of what pain it may bring upon others—this, he considers, is the only quality that can claim to be great. "In the nineteenth century," he wrote to Byron, "one must either be a monster or a sheep." Like most of those who hold this theory of life, he was content to regard it as a pious opinion rather than a practical habit, and he himself was neither a monster nor a sheep. He was merely the French Consul at Civita Vecchia. But it is expression of such views that have won him his place in the Nietzschean hierarchy. Those of us whom creed or character shuts out from the circles of super-humanity must be content with regretting that Stendhal's powers of observation and analysis were confined within a section of life which is neither the largest nor the one in which they might have won the most distinction.

A NOVEL OF IRISH CHARACTER.*

The characters bestowed by rival or neighboring nations one on another are nearly always staring parodies of truth, the finer qualities being unrecognised by the foreigner, some of the more obvious characteristics being exaggerated out of measure. Some national writers have the gift of disclosing the fundamental differences in racial temperament, and a recent book, "The Arran Isles," by the late J. M. Synge, brings home to the Englishman why it is that the Celtic Irish and the Anglo-Saxon are so little in sympathy. In "Fancy O'Brien," Miss MacMahon has produced a very interesting, unflattering study of Irish life and Irish temperament, and if any patriot feel himself affronted, let him reflect that a less pleasing study could be produced to-morrow of the life of any countryside between John o' Groats and the Land's End. It all depends whether the author chooses to lay the stress on the defects of the national qualities, or whether, as a pure artist, he is delighted with sharp manifestations of temperament, and can weave as pleasing a tapestry out of sinful human weakness as out of its fineness and strength. It is easy to see Synge, for example, treating the story of Fancy O'Brien's seduction of Bridgie Doyle with a much keener sense of the man's vanity and cowardice, and yet revealing depths of loveableness in his nature, which Miss MacMahon, with her fastidious and severe standards, has inflexibly passed over. All depends upon the personal equation in such cases, and it is more than foolish to expect any artist to defer to the idealistic headlines of patriotic copy-books which, at best, are merely flattering abstractions of partial truths.

Fancy O'Brien, the son of the deceased Dublin dairyman, Michael O'Brien, is "a slim, slightly built youth, with a certain innate gracefulness of carriage and bearing." He has "great dark eyes, slumbrous and burning, with delicate pale features, contradicted by a hard, vacuous, and sensual mouth." Under the cover of visiting his aunt, Mrs. Farelly, who keeps a huckster's shop in the neighborhood, Fancy arranges clandestine meetings with the appealingly innocent and modest girl, Bridgie Doyle, who serves in the shop. All the exquisite purity and shrinking modesty of soul, which is the heritage of the finest type of Irish womanhood, is typified in the figure of this humble girl, just as the tendency to pose, vanity, false eloquence, and fickle sensibility of nature, which are characteristic of a certain type of Irishman, are the mainspring of Fancy O'Brien's actions. But Fancy, who is fast throwing away his little inheritance in betting and sport, has also an understanding with Miss Corcoran, the coarse and vulgar daughter of the great publican of the district. He is tacitly understood to be going to make a match with her, and the neighborhood recognises that Miss Corcoran, being nine years his senior, is nothing loath. The picture of the gross vulgarity of these lower middle-class Dublin types is evidently done from life, and as such is effective, but it

* "Fancy O'Brien." By Ella MacMahon. Chapman & Hall. 6s.

Now Ready. With Portraits. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 24s. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A LONG LIFE

By LORD BROUGHTON

(JOHN CAM HOBHOUSE)

With additional Extracts from his private Diaries.

Edited by his daughter, LADY DORCHESTER.

With a Preface by the EARL OF ROSEBERY, K.G.

Mr. afterwards Sir, John Cam Hobhouse, who in later life was raised to the peerage as Lord Broughton, is too well known to require a detailed description. As the intimate friend of Lord Byron, both at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards, he was brought into close touch with the poet in all the affairs of his life. They travelled together in the Mediterranean when Childe Harold was written, and when Byron's domestic troubles were passing Hobhouse was his confidant and daily adviser. These volumes throw much new and most important light on Byron's affairs. In 1813 Hobhouse made a lengthy tour in Central Europe, Austria, Hungary, etc., and saw many of the leading personages of the day. He succeeded in reaching Paris during the Hundred Days and was there while Waterloo was fought and when Napoleon returned. In 1816 he joined the exiled Byron in Switzerland and Italy. Besides all this the volumes contain many new and interesting reminiscences of le beau monde in London and the principal European capitals, and Mr. Hobhouse's full and careful record of the circumstances attending the Byron separation.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

VOL. 2, No. 4. MONTHLY, 2s. 6d.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

CONTENTS FOR JULY

1. MODERN POETRY:
One Poem — LAURENCE BINYON
Four Poems — THOMAS BURKE
THREE POEMS — F. S. FLINT
2. TWO INDIAN SKETCHES — M.N.
3. OTHER KINGDOM — E. M. FORSTER
4. MIRAHUANO — R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM
5. ILLUMINATION — GERTRUDE BONE
6. THE OPEN SEASON — CHARLES L. MARSON
7. THE HOLY MOUNTAIN (Conclusion) — STEPHEN REYNOLDS
8. THE MONTH—EDITORIAL
AN ANALYSIS OF SIR EDWARD GREY'S POLICY
9. THE HUSH IN EUROPE — H. N. BRAILSFORD
10. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BUDGET — J. A. HOBSON
11. LE ROMAN FRANÇAIS COMTEMPORAIN (ii) — CAMILLE MAUCLAIR
12. COMMUNICATION — R. D. H.

With the July number is given, as a Supplement, Mr. Arnold Bennett's new play "What the Public Wants," now being acted at the New Royalty Theatre. This is the first and only form in which Mr. Arnold Bennett's play is published.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

Works by Dr. Adolf Harnack, of Berlin.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?
Sixteen Lectures delivered in the University of Berlin. Third and Revised Edition. Crown 8vo, Cloth 5s.

Three Volumes of New Testament Studies. Uniform, Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s. each.

LUKE THE PHYSICIAN
The Author of Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles. Second Edition.

THE SAYINGS OF JESUS
The Second Source of St. Matthew and St. Luke.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES
Sir WILLIAM RAMSAY.—"I feel specially interested in the question of Luke's nationality. On this the author has some admirable and suggestive pages."
Rev. Principal ADENEY.—"Professor Harnack displays his perfect genius of insight in summing up general conclusions."

Ready. Demy 8vo, 336 pages. 6s. net.

MAN AND THE BIBLE
A Review of the Place of the Bible in Human History.
By J. ALLENSON PICTON, M.A., (Lond.)
"It is delightful to recognise the mental grasp, the wide-ranging and accurate scholarship, and the trenchant vigour of style which characterise this volume."—Christian World.

NATURALISM AND RELIGION
By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen. Crown 8vo, Cloth 6s.
Sir OLIVER LODGE says:—"Professor Otto's book 'Naturalism and Religion' should become well known to the thoughtful persons in this country through this admirable translation."
"It reviews biological and scientific facts and theories from the Theological and Philosophical standpoint in a remarkably broad and well-informed manner, and as a popular treatise it is both eloquent and interesting. I heartily commend the work of this eminent scientific theologian to English readers."

Author Awarded Nobel Prize for Literature.
Second Edition now Ready.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIRIT
By RUDOLF EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy, Jena.

Ready. 300 pp. 5s. net.

THE GOSPEL OF RIGHTNESS:
A Study in Pauline Philosophy.
By C. E. WOODS.

July Number Ready. 2s. 6d. net. 2s. 9d. post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE AND THOUGHT IN GERMANY TO-DAY.
By Professor WEINEL, of Jena.

JESUS OR CHRIST? A Reply to Mr. Roberts.
I. By G. K. CHESTERTON.
II. By Professor J. H. MOULTON.

MORAL FORCE IN WAR.
By Lieut-General Sir REGINALD, HART, V.C.

THE CONFUSION OF PRAGMATISM.
By Professor G. T. LADD.

CHOICE. By Dr. F. C. S. SCHILLER.

A NEW DEVELOPMENT IN OLD TESTAMENT CRITICISM.
By Professor B. D. EERDMANS.

IS NATURE GOOD? A Conversation.
By Professor John DEWEY.

LE CULTE DES SAINTS DANS L'ISLĀM.
By Professor E. MONTET, D.D.

ATOMIC THEORIES & MODERN PHYSICS.
By Professor LOUIS T. MORE.

THE SCOTTISH ESTABLISHMENT FROM AN INSIDE POINT OF VIEW.
By the Rev. D. FREW.

KANT'S TRANSCENDENTAL ÆSTHETIC IN THE LIGHT OF MODERN MATHEMATICS
By Professor W. B. SMITH.

Discussions. Reviews. Bibliography of Recent Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.

is obvious that Miss MacMahon so detests these people and their outlook that she stands in relation to them as the prosecuting counsel to the prisoner in the dock. While hesitating to propose marriage to Miss Corcoran, Fancy seduces Bridgie, and on the day that Miss Corcoran squeezes a proposal out of him, the unfortunate girl realises that she is going to become a mother. In the painful chapters that follow, the psychological analysis deepens in interest. When Bridgie breaks the news to him, Fancy is badly frightened, and, in the paralysis of his fear, acts brutally towards her. He can think only of himself, and that he will be ruined if the truth comes out. He tells Bridgie that he will see to finding her a shelter, but that she is not to come near him till he gives her word. And then he repulses her, and goes off to drown his fears in drink. This scene is true, of course, to masculine cowardice all the world over, but we confess that we feel there is something lacking in the author's analysis. Miss MacMahon knows her own countrymen best, but we should have expected to find more oscillation towards good impulses than she credits Fancy with. There is, in fact, a relentlessness in Miss MacMahon's dissection of Fancy's impulses which leaves one speculating. When Fancy has practically abandoned poor Bridgie to her fate and has fixed the date of his marriage with Miss Corcoran, he falls, by chance, under the spell of the preaching of a great Redemptionist, a Catholic priest, and, moved by fears of the terrors of hell, Fancy confesses his sin to gain absolution. But even in his momentary repentance and in his spasmodic resolve to atone, the lad is moved chiefly by vanity and "a desire to see himself in the centre of the picture," and when the reaction comes he writhes at the thought of facing the ridicule and the jeers. "The Irish imagination," says the author, "is never more active than when under the spur of terror," and the scene in which Fancy repulses Bridgie with brutal concentrated fury, when she has come to try and warn him that her father is seeking to do him a mischief, again has a curiously photographic effect. There are surely better elements hidden in the whirling conflict of Fancy's emotions which the author has chosen to ignore? Miss MacMahon is, perhaps, inclined to draw her characters in too austere a scheme of black and white. The ungainly and colorless Jamesey Murphy, her former suitor, who comes to the suffering Bridget to tell her pleadingly and humbly that his love for her is unchanged, is no doubt as true to Irish nature as the violence of her father, John Doyle, who, in his cold and inflexible ferocity, tracks down and knifes his daughter's seducer; but we are at a loss to understand why we are not more affected. It is true that we see pretty clearly what is going to happen all along the line of the story, and perhaps the author's moral feeling is a little too much in evidence. In any case, Miss MacMahon has made a powerful study of a not uncommon type of Irishman. John Doyle's brutality to his daughter is far more shocking than Fancy O'Brien's, and the attitude of both men seems to be a temperamental reflection of that of the people at large, "where a lapse stirs a whole community to almost tragic horror and dismay." A virtue can be too dearly paid for when mercenary marriages of the nature of Fancy's contemplated union with Miss Corcoran are held in honor.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"Their genius is irresistible, their character is elusive as water, their charm is undeniable, their indifference to ethical ideals and strenuous united efforts for reform, is deplorable." In this way Miss Mabel Moore, on p. 150 of "Days in Hellas" (Heinemann, 6s. net), sums up the people in whose country she sojourned for two-and-a-half years. Apart from the study of modern Greek character it presents, the book is in many ways a delightful one to read. Though discursive, the style is essentially personal and fresh; certainly it gains more than it loses from the fact that it is not compiled from systematic memoirs but from the nebulous material of memory impressions. Nothing very exciting happens. A mild adventure with a brigand on Mt. Pentelicon provokes entertainment rather than thrill. There are no very decided animadversions, with the possible exception of that directed against the Greek Society lady in connection with family life, and even she is granted the excuse of her vicious training. Where political corruption, leading as it does to the leaving undone of sanitary and other reforms, is attacked, it is with persuasiveness rather than invective. The author went her way among town and country folk, visiting an island here, a monastery there, always in that tolerant spirit that seeks to reconcile the classical ideal and poetry with the modern fact and prose; learning something at every turn, reviewing it in its relation to other things learnt, gradually building up a mind picture of the race—a race that enforces respect for its ancestry, and enough kindliness for itself to make even its serious shortcomings excusable. Naturally we learn a good deal about the Greek beggar and the Greek child, often one and the same; there is also a delightfully intimate character sketch of a Greek innkeeper, and word pictures of scenery, sincerely felt at the time and lovingly treasured in the memory, give a special fragrance to these pages. The book, which is amply illustrated by photographs, is ostensibly a travel book, but it is written with the pen of a born essayist, and belongs to a class of literature that is unhappily not often encountered in these days.

* * *

There are few people better qualified to write a history of the Volunteers than Sir John Hay Macdonald. He was "the first sergeant of the first company of the first corps in Scotland," the first Volunteer whom Queen Victoria saw on parade, and he took part in the review of the Motor Volunteer Corps held by King Edward in 1905. He is, besides, widely known as a writer on military topics, and many of the changes in the organisation and training of our military forces during the past half century have been largely due to his advocacy. In "Fifty Years of It: The Experiences and Struggles of a Volunteer of 1859" (Blackwood, 10s. 6d.), he deals both with the amusing and with the serious sides of soldiering. It contains much matter for the military expert to ponder and a store of lively anecdote to amuse less serious readers. We can only find room for one of Sir John's anecdotes, which may possibly go a little way towards explaining the ridicule for which the Volunteers were often a target. At a review, Sir John Macdonald's brother, who was one of the officers, wished to give proof to some ladies of the heavy weights which the pioneers had to carry. To do this, "he stooped down and picked up the sergeant's crowbar, but although the lady held out her hand, he did not give it to her. He found it was made of wood, carefully blackened and polished." But incidents of this sort were rare, and Sir John Macdonald has good reason to speak with pride of the force to which he has given up so much of his time and energy. Sir John Macdonald resigned his command of a Volunteer regiment in 1900, but he still keeps up his interest in soldiering and is now chairman of his Territorial Association. He ends his book by saying that he earnestly prays "that the nation may be roused to a sense of its duty to provide an efficient system of defence against invasion, and not be content till it is no longer a sham that can deceive nobody except those who, for motives of selfish ease or false economy, practise an unpatriotic self-deception." We are far from agreeing with his estimate of our present system of defence. But at least Sir John Macdonald has practised what he preaches.

* * *

The ninth of the series of color books dealing with the English counties, which Messrs. Black have in progress, is devoted to "Hampshire." It is a good example of the series, for the reproductions of Mr. Wilfrid Ball's water-colors give an excellent idea of the landscape and architectural beauties of the county, while the Rev. Telford Varley's historical and descriptive chapters are very well done. There is a great deal of English history connected with Hampshire, and Mr. Varley begins by a survey of Roman, Saxon, and Norman times which the general reader will find most interesting, and the antiquarian student full of suggestion. The chapter on Winchester is perhaps the best in the book,

YOUR SUMMER READING!

If you want to know about the new books just out and the new books just coming out, get the July BOOK MONTHLY, which you can do for Sixpence from any bookseller, or from the publishers, Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

Buy

The Saturday Westminster

Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette."

Because

it contains all F.C.G.'S Cartoons of the Week.
of its unique page of "Problems and Prizes."
of its Book Reviews and Literary Columns.
of the Variety of General Articles and Short Stories.
it is the only Weekly Magazine-Review of the kind.
It costs but a Penny a Week. By post, 6s. 6d. (Home), and 8s. 8d. (Abroad) per annum.

It

Never Fails to Please & Satisfy

Offices: Tudor House, Tudor St., London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. BY POST, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2 COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,650,000.

Directors.

Hon. Sir ERIC BARRINGTON, K.C.B.
JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
Right Hon. Viscount GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.
Sir THOMAS JACKSON, Bart.
WM. McKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Head Office Manager—H. R. WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—F. J. BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—F. W. HOWETT.
Assistant Country Managers—J. W. BUCKHURST. E. F. ROBINSON.
Chief Accountant—F. J. CARPENTER.
Secretary—G. PAGET.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

Foreign Branch—80, Cornhill, E.C.

269 Branches in London and Country.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE BUSINESS UNDERTAKEN.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the World.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given or the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.
SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TONIC FOR THE FEET.—For all Relaxed, Tender, Swollen conditions of the Feet, Pedestrine gives instant relief. It allays inflammation and the painful smarting that keeps you in perpetual discomfort. A trial will convince. 1/3 and 2/6 post free. Marshall & Co., 70A, Basinghall Street, E.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER,"

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

for the burying-place of Alfred, with its famous monastery, cathedral, and college, and its large Jewish settlement, abounds in picturesque material. Mr. Varley believes that William the Conqueror was guiltless of undue severity in creating the New Forest. He tells us that no documentary evidence for the destruction of villages can be found, and that no ruins can be traced, so that the work of devastation can hardly have been of so wide an extent as is generally supposed. The literary associations of Hampshire are not neglected, and altogether the book is a welcome addition to the number of county histories intended more for the general reader than for the specialist.

* * *

The necessity of making people recognise the evils of our social system was never more apparent than it is to-day, and we accordingly welcome the two contrasting collections of statistics published in "Wealth and Want," by Mr. W. B. Northrop (Francis Griffiths, 5s. net), which present these evils in a very forcible light. The author's main contention that poverty and unemployment are wholly traceable to our existing land system—"the great land trust"—is largely true. "The one effective remedy" for this state of things, says Mr. Northrop, is a tax on land values of 20s. in the £! He says that this would not only break up the land monopoly and so remove the cause of destitution, but would simplify the country's taxation very considerably, since no other taxes would be necessary. But 20s. in the £!

The Week in the City.

The City—by which I mean only the magnates—is just now divided between desire for "Dreadnoughts" and dislike for supertaxes. The Rothschild meeting was packed, and the platform was so full that an eminent, but portly, magnate, arriving late, could not be squeezed on to the platform. But the speeches were very badly delivered, and there was a lack of enthusiasm. Otherwise the week has been rather dull owing to the general belief that Stock Exchange prices are generally very high. Speculation downwards never excites much enthusiasm, as bullishness is always more popular than bearishness. The money market is again easy, and the closest observers prophesy abundance for several weeks to come, as the Bank reserve is again strong. Business prospects continue to improve, now that the danger of a coal strike is avoided. The political crisis in Germany, following on the defeat of the Government's Budget, at first sent down the price of German bonds, but they have since recovered. Home railway traffic returns have been highly encouraging, especially on the main trade lines; and perhaps this is now the most promising market, as prices have kept low owing to fears about the coal dispute. Argentine rails are depressed, as the weather has not been good, and poor crops are anticipated. In Canada, on the other hand, a fine harvest is expected. The new Dominion loan ($3\frac{1}{2}$ per cents. at $98\frac{1}{2}$) offers an excellent security, and the Canadian Government has again wisely made it available to small investors, as £10, or any multiple of that amount, may be applied for. Details of the issue are advertised in another column. The increasing cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific is a serious matter. But the line will be a good investment for the people of Canada.

A Japanese Loan.

At the beginning of June there was issued in Japan a new loan for the Kobe Harbor Works in bonds to the total value of Y2,500,000, equal to about £250,000. These bonds bear interest of 6 per cent. and the issue price was Y95. But applicants were invited to make offers above this figure, the highest offers taking precedence on allotment. The "Japan Chronicle," a very trustworthy paper, described the bonds as "a favorable investment." The total indebtedness of the Kobe Municipality does not much exceed Y3,000,000, which was raised to defray the expense of waterworks and is therefore of a productive character. Most of the municipal loans in Japan may fairly be regarded as ranking next to Government securities. The loan was a great success, being subscribed about seven times over. It is the poverty of Japan that accounts for these high rates of interest; but the difference in interest between external and internal loans can hardly be justified.

The Republic of Panama.

One of the chief concerns of President Taft is to provide for the finance and completion of the Panama Canal and for its maintenance as a purely American enterprise. A visitor who has just returned from Colon, after collecting information on the spot, sends me the following note:—The Republic of Panama is the youngest State in the world and probably is the only civilised State that has neither Army nor Navy. As Mr. Mallet's last report says: "The Republic has no external or internal debt, and no Army or Navy to provide for, as its independence is guaranteed by the United States." It is probable that at some future date it will be a valuable field for the investment of capital, but at present the canal does not bring a very large direct increase of trade, because the commissaries indent for their supplies direct from the United States. In 1907 the imports of the Republic were £1,912,889, and the canal supplies were £2,282,726, whilst the imports for construction alone were estimated at a million sterling in addition. These last come in absolutely free of duty, while general canal merchandise enters the canal zone at a 10 per cent. duty, with the exception of alcohol, tobacco, and a few similar articles which pay a higher duty. It is to be regretted that the United States maintain the policy of the closed door with regard to canal supplies. A States contractor is preferred over a foreigner, unless the latter's tender is lower than that of the American, minus the duty which the article would have to pay under the American tariff. Thus competition has been entirely destroyed, and out of over $2\frac{1}{4}$ million imports the foreigner supplies only £7,115. Consequently, everyone on the Isthmus, high and low, complains of dearness of living. Of the general imports the United States supply more than half, England nearly one-fifth, and Germany about one-ninth. Of cotton, woollen, and silk manufactures, England supplies one-quarter. There is practically only one export—bananas—which accounted for £277,000, out of the meagre total of £392,000. Panama exports barely £1 a head, while Costa Rica exports £5. Panama might export large quantities of rubber, cocoanuts, hides, gold, timber, and drugs; but, as an experienced resident says, "The people will only do enough work to get their food and a little rum to get drunk on when they are not working." Apparently none of the canal work is supplied locally; the great majority of the navvies are Jamaican negroes. It would, however, be unfair not to recognise that the little Republic has made remarkable progress since it detached itself from Colombia. In 1905 the foreign trade was little over a million, while in 1907 it was over £2,300,000. The Vice-consul of David reports: "The extensive open plains provide splendid grazing for horses, mules, goats, and cattle, which are increasing in numbers now that the days of civil strife are over." Still, it is certain that the people will be quite unable to take advantage of the vast possibilities which the canal will afford, and the exploitation will be done by foreigners. Panama and Colon, towns of about 30,000 inhabitants, are collections of wretched wooden shanties, relieved by a few handsome churches. Both ought to be laid out with wide streets and spacious squares, nor is there any excuse for the Government in neglecting this work, as it has very few expenses. It may be added that there are far too many Chinamen on the Isthmus. "An immigration law prohibiting persons of Asiatic descent—Chinese, Turks, and Syrians—from landing . . . is in force," or, rather, in weakness, for nearly every shop of any merit is kept by a Chinaman, and in Panama itself few other names appear on the signs. Hindu traders are also not uncommon. The whole State is little better than a jungle, but when the canal is finished, it will, no doubt, be developed, as its tropical products will be near a great distributing centre.

Lucellum.

The Lists will close for Cash Applications on or before Monday 5th July, and for Conversion Applications on Monday 12th July.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

Issue of £6,500,000 3½% Stock

Redeemable at par in London 1st July 1950, with option to the Government to redeem at par on or after 1st July 1930, on giving six months' notice.

Interest payable 1st January and 1st July.

Six months' Interest payable 1st January 1910.

PRICE OF ISSUE £98½ PER CENT.

Holders of the £4,295,776 outstanding 4 per cent. Reduced Bonds and Stock, maturing 1st January 1910, can exchange for an equivalent amount of this Stock on the terms stated below, and applications from such holders will receive preferential allotment.

The Government of the Dominion of Canada having complied with the requirements of the Colonial Stock Act 1900, Trustees are empowered, subject to the restrictions set forth in the Trustee Act 1893, to invest in this Stock.

The BANK OF MONTREAL, the Financial Agents of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, is authorised by the Minister of Finance to offer the above Stock for subscription at 98½ per cent., payable in respect of cash applications as follows:—

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| £ 5 | per cent. | on | Application. |
| £18 10s. | ,, | ,, | 19th July, 1909. |
| £35 | ,, | ,, | 24th August, 1909. |
| £40 | ,, | ,, | 23rd September, 1909. |
| £98 10s. | | | |

Payment in full may be made on or after 19th July under discount at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum.

The Loan is issued under the authority of Chapter 23 of the Statutes of Canada, 1909, to provide for the outstanding balance (£4,295,776 of the Loan maturing 1st January, 1910, and Chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1909, to provide for the advance of $10,000,000 (say, £2,054,794 10s. 5d.) to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to assist in the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway.

By an Order in Council, dated 23rd June, 1909, the Government of the Dominion of Canada has created a Cumulative Sinking Fund of ½ per cent. per annum in respect of this Stock, including the £8,000,000 previously issued.

Holders of 4 per cent. Reduced Bonds and Stock maturing 1st January, 1910, should apply on the prescribed form, lodging it and their Bonds (with the coupon due 1st January, 1910, attached) or Stock Certificates at the Bank of Montreal, and they will receive in exchange an equivalent amount of 3½ per cent. Stock and an immediate cash payment of £2 6s. 0d. per cent., being £1 10s. 0d. per cent., the difference between the par value of the maturing Bonds and Stock and issue price of the new Stock, and £2 per cent. for interest due 1st January, 1910, less £1 4s. 0d. per cent. for interest on the instalments to that date (less Income Tax). Receipts will be given for Bonds and Stock Certificates, which, in due course, will be exchangable for Definitive Stock Certificates.

Cash applications for £10 and multiples thereof should be lodged, with a deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount applied for, at the Bank of Montreal, 47, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C.

Scrip Certificates to bearer in respect of cash applications will be issued against Allotment Letters, and, when fully paid, will be exchangeable for Definitive Stock Certificates.

Interest will be paid by the Bank of Montreal, London, on 1st January and 1st July (a full six months' interest being payable on 1st January, 1910) by means of warrants, which will be sent by post to the registered holders at the holders' risk. In joint accounts, the warrants will, in the absence of contrary instructions, be made payable and forwarded to the first-named holder.

The Stock will be registered and transferable in any amount by deed, free of stamp duty, at the Bank of Montreal, London, at which Bank the principal will be payable.

The Revenues of the Dominion of Canada alone are liable in respect of this Stock and the Dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom and the Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury are not directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the Stock or of the Dividends thereon or for any matter relating thereto.—(Colonial Stock Acts, 1877 to 1900.)

Stock Certificates to Bearer, with coupons for the half-yearly dividends attached, will be obtainable in exchange for Registered Stock at the Bank of Montreal on payment of the prescribed fees, and such Certificates can be re-registered as Stock at the will of the holder.

Copies of the above-mentioned Acts may be inspected at the Office of Messrs Bischoff & Co., 4, Great Winchester Street, London, E.C.

In the case of partial allotment, the surplus deposit will be applied towards payment of the amount due 19th July, and failure to pay any instalment when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bank of Montreal, 47, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C., or of Messrs. R. Nivison & Co., Bank Chambers, Princes Street, London, E.C.

LONDON, 1st July, 1909.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work, Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£11 11s. NORWEGIAN FJORDS CRUISES.
Sailings:—July 17, July 31.

£18 18s. ST. PETERSBURG for MOSCOW, COPENHAGEN CHRISTIANIA, &c., August 14.

Full particulars from the Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

HIGHEST QUALITY
TURKISH TOWELS
AND SIMILAR GOODS.
SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

Head Master: ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

PREPARATION FOR UNIVERSITIES.
CITIZENSHIP COURSE.
LEISURE-HOUR WORK.

For Copies of Prospectus, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

In the County of Cheshire, four miles from Crewe. Preparatory Department recently added. Next Entrance Examination July 27th. For prospectus and particulars of admission on the Foundation apply to the HEADMASTER, or to the CLERK TO THE GOVERNORS, 38, Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Moulton and other Scholarships in July.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

SOUTHPORT MODERN SCHOOL.

A First-Class School for Boys. Staff includes B.A., M.Sc., F.C.V., Mus. Bac., etc. Languages, Science, Commercial Subjects, Gymnastics, Swimming, Cadet Company. Prospectus from Secretary.

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,

STAFFORDSHIRE.

Excellent Health Record. Over 500 feet above sea level

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class. Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.
A limited number of boarders received.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION safeguards morality in the school. First convince yourself, then help a great cause.—Box 698, "The Nation," 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

ST. HELENS, CLIFTON, GLOS.

SCHOOL for a limited number of Girls of good social position. Thorough education on modern lines. Healthy outdoor life, with due attention to Games and Physical Exercise. Principals: MISS WINGATE, M.A. Dublin (Math. Trip. Cambs.), and MISS POTTER.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, London." Telephone No. GERRARD 1854.

SCHOOLS IN ENGLAND OR ABROAD

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

Messrs. J. and J. PATON, having an intimate knowledge of the BEST SCHOOLS and TUTORS in this country and on the Continent, will be pleased to aid parents in their selection by sending (free of charge) prospectuses and full particulars of reliable and highly-recommended establishments. When writing please state the age of pupil, the district preferred, and give some idea of the fees to be paid.—J. and J. PATON, Educational Agents, 143, Cannon-st., London, E.C. Telephone 5053, Central.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE, SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

ONE & ALL SEEDS.

The Brand Guarantees One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure and guaranteed. They are supplied in sealed packets:—1d., 3d., and 6d. each.
Each packet bears the Trade Mark, "One & All," in a garter.
Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

One & All Half-Crown Collection of 10 Asters.
One & All Five Shilling Collection of 10 Stocks
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Annuals.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Perennials and Biennials.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Salading Seeds.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetable Seeds.
One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Sweet Peas.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete manures.

ONE & ALL FERTILISER No. 24, for Vegetables and General Garden Purposes:—Half-Rod Packets 6d.; Bags: 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/-. Carriage paid.

ONE & ALL is the Registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED, Mutual Society founded in 1867 to ensure purity of supply. Name and Address of nearest local agent, catalogues, and other details, post free on application to

Edwd. Owen Greening
Managing Director.

Wholesale Seed Warehouses,
92, LONG ACRE,
LONDON, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every Floor, Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hote, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London." Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.
WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

BLACKPOOL.
67, ALEXANDRA ROAD. Board and Residence. 5s. per day

PROSPECT HOUSE BOARDING ESTAB., 33, Central Par. facing Sea, Central for Amusements. S. Aspect. Tel. 575 Manageress

BOLTON.
THE THREE CROWNS, Deansgate, Bolton. Convenient and Central. Frank Shore.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.
Ideal Residence.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.
THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.
THE HOTEL METROPOLE. H. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.
ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.
THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.
BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.
CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.
ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.
HILLS MARINE VIEW BOARDING HOUSE.

MELTON LODGE Residential Mansion. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.
THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.
RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta Course

ILFRACOMBE.
COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.
CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.
BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

STONEWELL RESTAURANT. T. M. Hey, Proprietor

MARKET HALL RESTAURANT. Prop., J. E. Dowthwaite

LEEDS.
HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.
COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.
The WHITE HOUSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.
CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).
ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.
HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MANCHESTER.
"OLD SWAN," Victoria Station Approach.—Best and most reliable train information.

BRITISH STANDARD, River St., Hulme, Manchester. Football and Cricket Resort. T. Livesay.

MATLOCK.
SMEDLEY'S Hydro. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Manager

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.
RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

NELSON HOTEL. Convenient, Central, and Popular

OXFORD (near).
SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c. Lecture

PENTRE.
PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

PORTSMOUTH.
SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director

SOUTHPORT.
KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other Baths; Excellent cuisine; Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclists' Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

SOUTHSEA.
STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress

TEIGNMOUTH.
REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner

WHITBY.
WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.
HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.
THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

NOTICE.

The Nation is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to The Nation Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

Home, 26s. per Annum. Foreign, 30s. per Annum.

Cheques should be made payable to The Nation Publishing Co. Ltd., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

The Nation may be obtained from the following booksellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

| | FULL PAGE. | ½ PAGE. | ¼ PAGE |
|---|---|---|---|
| Back Page, or Page facing matter ... | £10 0 0 | £5 0 0 | £2 10 0 |
| Other Pages ... | 8 0 0 | 4 0 0 | 2 0 0 |

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational

13 Insertions ... ... 8d. per line.

52 ,, ... ... 6d. ,,

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS

Published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF ROME.

From the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age. By J. WIGHT DUFF, M.A. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. (A New Volume in the "Library of Literary History.")

COUNTRY RESIDENCES IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

By LOUIS VALCOULON LE MOYNE. With about 450 Illustrations. 4to, 21s. net.

Descriptions of the most interesting country residences of Italy, France, England, and America.

THE WARS OF RELIGION IN FRANCE:

The Huguenots, Catharine de' Medici, and Philip the Second.

By JAMES WESTFALL THOMPSON. 21s. net.

This work is based upon a careful examination of original sources, and contains a valuable appendix of hitherto unpublished documents from the archives of Paris and London.

SOUTH AMERICAN SERIES—NEW VOLUME.

MEXICO.

Its Ancient and Modern Civilisation; History and Political Conditions; Topography and Natural Resources; Industries and General Development. By REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME, a Map, and 64 Full-page Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

THE SOVRANTY OF SOCIETY.

By HUGH E. M. STUTFIELD. 5s. net.

This book is an analysis of the influence exerted by social ideas and aspirations in this country among all classes and in every field of the national activities. The universality of the caste instinct in Anglo-Saxon communities, the authority wielded by English Society in politics, religion, commerce, and finance are dealt with successively and in considerable detail, in their economic as well as their social aspects.

AN EMPIRE IN PAWN.

Being Lectures and Essays on Indian, Colonial, and Domestic Finance, Preference, Free Trade, etc. By A. J. WILSON. 10s. 6d. net.

THE MERMAID SERIES—NEW VOLUME.

THE COMPLETE PLAYS OF ROBERT GREENE.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOMAS H. DICKINSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Also a Thin Paper Edition, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THROUGH UGANDA TO MOUNT ELGON.

With Glimpses by the way. By the Rev. J. PURVIS. Illustrated with Photographs, 6s.

Will appeal to the general reader as an interesting, entertaining and instructive volume of travel.

A TRAMP'S SCHOOLING.

By A. M. COOPER, M.A. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

The Chapter Titles include: Walks in My Own Country—How I Walked Across Denmark—The Road to Pompeii—Across Sweden on Foot—What I have Seen of Society.

ABEL. A Mystery.

By DR. DAVID SANDLER. 2s. 6d. net.

TURKEY AFTER THE CRISIS. By Charles Roden Buxton.

THE FEMALE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT. By the Editor.

AGRICULTURAL CO-OPERATION IN IRELAND. By Laurence P. Bryne.

SOCIAL REFORMS IN FINLAND.

THE MIRACLES OF LOURDES. By Abbé Paul Naudet.

See the July Issue of

THE INTERNATIONAL.

Now Ready. 1s. net.

BAEDEKER'S GUIDES

for Tourists. Write for List.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

NOW READY.

THE RAMBLINGS OF AN OLD MUMMER

By RUSSELL CRAUFURD.

An interesting volume of bright, breezy anecdotes of well-known theatrical favourites—past and present.

Price Six Shillings.

"Well said, old mole! can'st work i' the earth so fast?"—SHAKESPEARE.

THE HUMAN MOLE

By COLIN COLLINS.

Price Six Shillings.

"Seldom have we come across a brighter or more entertaining story than this."—Daily Mirror.

THE SPITFIRE

By EDWARD PEPLE,

Author of "Semiramis."

Price Six Shillings.

"God made the lovers and the devil married them."

THE WANTON

By FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON.

At all Libraries. Price Six Shillings.

"The author has a knack of weaving plot and counter-plot and piling peril upon peril that is somewhat reminiscent of Dumas."

The above criticism has appeared in "BLACK AND WHITE," and is in reference to

DAVID WHITELAW'S

New Story

MOON OF VALLEYS

which the publishers unhesitatingly can recommend as a bright breezy tale in which humour and pathos are admirably blended.

MOON OF VALLEYS

By DAVID WHITELAW.

Author of "The Gang."

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

Other Fiction still in demand includes :—

| | |
|---|---|
| THE OLD MAN IN THE CORNER (3rd Edition). | Baroness Orczy. |
| HENRY OF NAVARRE (6th Edition). | May Wynne. |
| PENELOPE ANN | J. Henry Harris. |
| THE TRAGEDY OF A FLIRTATION | H. B. Vogel. |
| ONLY APRIL | Gurner Gillman. |
| DELUSION | Joseph Prague. |
| BEAUTY RETIRE | Dora Mellor. |
| A SON OF DESOLATION | M. Y. Halidom. |
| A STUDY IN SEPIA | Robert Castleton. |
| THE BREATH OF SCANDAL | Ella Sawtell. |

All at Six Shillings each, at all Libraries.

Another droll story by the Author of "We Three and Troddles."

THE RUNAWAYS.

By R. ANDOM. 3/6

FROM LAND'S END TO THE LIZARD

By A. G. FOLLIOTT STOKES.

A companion volume to "From St. Ives to Land's End," with many illustrations and map. One shilling net, cloth.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1909.

The Nation, July 10th, 1909.
SPECIAL FICTION NUMBER.

The Nation

Vol. V., No. 15.] SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1909. [Price 6d.
Registered as a Newspaper. Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE
Diary of the Week ... ... 513
Politics and Affairs:—
The Pessimism of England ... 516
The Self-defeat of Violence ... 517
The Protection of Animals ... 518
Unearned Increment and Windfalls... ... ... ... 519
A Revolution in Education. By Graham Wallas ... ... 520
Life and Letters:—
The Wild Man ... ... ... 521
The Power to Suppress Opinion ... ... ... ... 522
Found at the Zoo ... ... 523
Pictures of Travel:—
The Home of Catullus. By Professor C. H. Herford ... 524
Present-day Problems:—
How the Country Districts like the Budget. By a Country Candidate ... ... 526
Communications:—
A Working-class View of Lord Curzon's Manifesto. By Albert Mansbridge ... ... 527
Letters to the Editor:—
Calvin. By J. Allanson Picton 528
The Visit of the Tsar. By A. MacCallum Scott ... ... 528
Faith and Conduct. By Elizabeth Cobb and J. Henry Hocken ... ... ... ... 529
PAGE
Feminist Arguments. By Emily Tomlinson and Josephine Evans Williams ... ... 529
The Official Valuation of Ireland. By Murrough O'Brien 530
Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt. By B. W. Matz ... 530
One Way of Paying Budget Duties. By S. L. H. ... ... 530
The Destruction of Dialect. By T. Maben and D. H. Kemp 531
Mr. Hudson's Butterflies. By G. G. Desmond ... ... ... 532
Poetry:—
Death. By John Drinkwater ... 532
Reviews:—
"Frank Burnet." By W. Hale White ("Mark Rutherford") 532
The Making of a Nation ... 534
Mexico. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham ... ... ... ... 535
The Free Catholic Church. By the Rev. G. Tyrrell ... ... 536
Side Lights on Roman History 537
Leconte de Lisle ... ... ... 537
Middle-class Fiction ... ... 538
A Budget of Novels ... ... 540
Books in Brief:—
The Monthly Reviews ... ... 544
The Place of History in Education ... ... ... 546
Round the Lake Country ... 546
The Trials of Five Queens ... 546
Brush, Pen, and Pencil ... ... 546
The Green Finch Cruise ... 548
The Week in the City. By Lucellum ... ... ... ... 548

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

The King, accompanied by the Queen, has made a tour round some of the great industrial centres of the Midlands and the North. On Saturday he opened a new speech-room at Rugby, made famous, he said, by the mastership of Arnold and Temple, and as the school of Landor, Clough, and Arnold's famous son. This week he reviewed the two divisions of the Lancashire Territorial forces, opened the Royal Infirmary at Manchester, and, finally, the Birmingham University, expressing in graceful language his grief at the enforced absence of its Chancellor and chief founder, Mr. Chamberlain. Returning to town on Thursday he laid the first stone of the new buildings of the Imperial College of Science and Technology at South Kensington. Lord Crewe, in his address, treated the new development as the latest effort of the great movement towards scientific and technical education which sprang from the Exhibition of 1851 and from the Prince Consort's initiative. The King, in noting the event, declared his conviction that the prosperity, "even the very safety and existence," of the country depended on the quality of its scientific and technical training.

* * *

The assassination of Sir Curzon Wyllie, Lord Morley's political aide-de-camp, an amiable and excellent man, and of Dr. Lalcaca by the Indian student, Dhingra, has caused an almost universal and passionately worded repudiation of the deed by Indian students in this country, and by the whole Indian community of all races and creeds. This feeling was expressed with remarkable force at a meeting of Indian students, addressed by Mr. Banerjee and Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal, both of whom spoke with horror and detestation of this crime and of the doctrine of political assassination. Mr. Banerjee also strongly denied the Prime Minister's suggestion that Dhingra's act might be that of a "conspiracy," and we believe that on further information the Government do not adhere to it. Mr. Banerjee insisted that the policy of violence was not only fatal to the Indian Reform movement, but directly contrary to Hindu faith and morals. The same view has been taken by Mr. Lajpat Rai, in a telegram from Lahore, and the vernacular Press appears to have been unanimous in condemnation. The one sinister incident is the disclosure of the language of an obscure sheet, called the "Indian Sociologist," a paper edited by Mr. Krishnavarma, who now directs it from Paris, and practically preaches the comparative morality of political murder.

* * *

But the most dramatic repudiation of the murder has come from Dhingra's family. On Tuesday his brother came forward at a meeting of Indian residents in London, hand in hand with Mr. Theodore Morison, a member of the India Council, to express his personal horror of the crime. This action was followed by a telegram from Dhingra's father, in which he spoke of the murderer as "my cursed son." Finally, Mr. Gokhale, by far the ablest contemporary Indian statesman, sternly declared at Poona that the London murders had blackened the Indian name, and that the idea of independence was impossible in view of the grave defects of the national character. This faithful language will probably do more to check the madness of the anarchist movement than any foolish talk of a new plan of coercion, to which, it is safe to say, neither Lord Morley nor Lord Minto pays any heed.

* * *

The Prime Minister, speaking to the National Liberal Federation at Southport on Friday week, made another clear and powerful defence of the land taxes, which, he agreed with Mr. Pigou, were more properly described as taxes on "windfalls." He defended their progressive character on the ground that Gladstone's succession duties of 1853 and Harcourt's death duties of 1894 had the same gradually developing element. He insisted that considering the vital necessity of land for the community, especially in the neighborhood of towns, and the continual growth of its value owing to social causes, it presented by far the most tangible case of unearned increment that could be found, and therefore the most suitable for taxation. As to the taxes on undeveloped land, what was there wrong in putting pressure on landowners to sell their land when the community wanted it? All the alternatives to the Budget, Lord Avebury's, Lord Cromer's, and Tariff Reform—the policy of taxing bread and butter—had broken down, and the Budget therefore was as practical an expedient as it was morally and economically equitable.

* * *

Meanwhile the House has still got no further than section 3 of clause 2 of the Finance Bill, while the Chancellor, only closuring after each substantial amendment has been fully discussed, and treating the House with perfect tact and temper, has made a number of material concessions to the landed interest. We have no space to describe these in detail, though we shall recur to them at a later period when they can be seen in full perspective. Generally, we think that they do not weaken the Bill, but the Chancellor must be on his guard against the cutting away of masses of land values from the operation of the new taxes. One of the concessions is, indeed, already embodied in the Bill, that which provides for a "datum" value, and exempts from the increment tax recoveries from a fall below it. This will prevent repeated taxation of the same growth of value.

* * *

Another concession is that the tax shall only apply to increments exceeding 10 per cent. on the last transfer, which will save the collection of a number of small taxes. This seems to us fair, for in Frankfort, where the increment tax is in force, and yields good results, no increment below 15 per cent. is taxed, and there are allowances of 5 per cent. for legal charges, and 4 per cent, for interest. He has also hinted at some power of appeal from decisions of the Commissioners. Meanwhile, the concession is a handsome contribution to the cost of valuation. Finally, he has offered to replace the elaborate machinery of the Bill for deducting permanent improvements from any rise of value in agricultural land, by definitely franking all increments up to 40 per cent. But as the Junkers in the Commons have not accepted the offer, it has been withdrawn, and the scheme of the Bill will stand. It would have been specially favorable to Ireland. The owner is also to be allowed for all sums spent in redeeming the land tax, and a hint of the Chancellor points to a coming exemption of small holders.

* * *

But the serious feature of the situation is the extreme slowness of the pace at which the Budget is moving through the House. We calculate that at the present rate of progress it will be impossible to finish even the land clauses before the end of September, and then a whole forest of intricate clauses remains to be discussed. The truth is that if an Opposition deliberately intends to stop a complex Bill, it has the power to do so, and no one can doubt both the destructive purpose and the dilatory methods set in motion against the Budget. The Government may therefore be driven against its will to an allotment of time to the various parts of the Finance Bill. This can surely be so contrived that every important provision is fairly discussed. And on the entire scheme, could the keenest partisan say that four or five months of continuous criticism on one measure was inadequate?

* * *

We hear excellent accounts of the work of the Budget League, which has everywhere found a powerful and enthusiastic body of opinion in the country answering to its call for demonstrations. We are glad to see that members of the Cabinet are taking their coats off with the rank and file. The occasion is not a common one, and calls for uncommon effort. But we miss from the list of speakers the names of Mr. Burns and Mr. Runciman. We hope that this gap will soon be filled. Mr. Burns and Mr. Runciman are very effective speakers, and Mr. Burns was one of the main supports of the Free Trade campaign. The party will look to him to do as much for the instrument which aims at securing the future of Free Trade and at laying down the lines of democratic finance.

* * *

The "Times," we imagine at a hint from the responsible leaders of the Conservative party, published on Monday a long communication from its Parliamentary correspondent on the power of the House of Lords in regard to finance. The article, which in the main adopts the conclusions arrived at in these columns, affirms the nominal right of the House of Lords to reject finance Bills, but declares that its expediency has become more questionable since 1861, when the entire financial provision for the year was compressed into a single Bill. The "Times" itself concludes that the House of Lords has practically "to accept the Finance Bill as it comes from the Commons or to reject it in toto," and quotes with approval, as we have quoted, Lord Salisbury's dictum on the Budget of 1894, that "such an act will create a deadlock from which there was no escape." It therefore thinks that the Lords had better leave the country to "correct its own mistakes." This is a signal lowering of the flag.

* * *

A grave step seems to have been taken in the new regulations for the training of teachers. They are of a dual character. They stipulate that in future all training colleges must provide a course of training which shall "prepare teachers to give such instruction in, and explanation of, the Bible as are suited to the capacities of children." The inspectors are to report on the fulfilment of this requirement. It seems to us that these orders infringe the principle of the Act of 1870, which leaves the provision of religious instruction at the option of local authorities. Now this option is withdrawn whenever an authority happens to be responsible for a training college.

* * *

Furthermore, the managers of denominational colleges are permitted to require a written profession of faith from half their candidates and to submit the other half to an examination in religious knowledge in which both the questions and the standard of passing are to be settled by themselves. Is not this an absolute exclusion from the residential colleges of agnostics and also of Nonconformists whose parents do not choose that their son's religion shall be defined by Anglican ministers or professors? The conditions of admission to denominational colleges will, in fact, be much more rigid than they were before Mr. McKenna attempted to liberalise them, while even in the undenominational colleges the student who does not take steps to obtain the new certificate of "training in religious teaching" will be a marked man. The new regulations seem, in fact, to open up a new educational situation of the utmost gravity.

* * *

The Bakhtiari and the Constitutionalists from Kazvin are almost at the gates of Teheran, but a Russian force several thousand strong has been landed at Enzeli and is pushing on to the capital. The Russian Government explains that this is not "intervention," but only a way of safeguarding the Caspian-Teheran road, which is a Russian concession, and of protecting Europeans. The expedition, it says, is to halt at Kazvin unless there is trouble, but is to stay in Persia until order is "completely ensured." As a matter of fact, it is now expected to enter the capital straightway, and the "Novoe Vremya" indicates its true character by protesting against the waste of time in remonstrating with the Nationalists and Bakhtiari "which has led to open and aggressive disregard of our authority." This means, of course, permanent occupation and annexation.

* * *

Nevertheless, the measure has Sir Edward Grey's approval, though he admitted that our Minister at Teheran had not asked for it, and had expressed no fears as to the safety of British subjects. It is not clear yet what the Nationalists will do. They refused to turn back at the request of the English and Russian Legations, but formulated demands for the withdrawal of the Russian troops, the disbanding of the Cossacks, and the dismissal of the Shah's reactionary ministers and councillors. The "Times" correspondent, however, says that the sending of Russian troops has taken the wind out of their sails. At this critical moment in Persian and Indian history the House of Commons is completely gagged by a comprehensive "blocking" motion put down by Mr. Rees.

* * *

THE Ministerial changes are now completed. Mr. Masterman passes from the Local Government Board to the Home Office, having well earned his promotion. Mr. Herbert Lewis properly takes his place at the Local Government Board, while Mr. Partington and Mr. Gulland step into the vacancies in the Whips' office, opened by the withdrawal of the Master of Elibank and of Mr. Lewis. This latter arrangement has the disadvantage that it deprives the Welsh members of a Welsh Whip, while the selection of Mr. Partington forces a contest in an always dubious constituency. Excellent accounts, however, arrive of the situation in the Cleveland and the Mid Derbyshire divisions.

* * *

THE Conservative-Clerical majority has been rapidly passing its taxes—including a new set of duties on stamps and cheques, the railway tax, the maintenance of the sugar tax, and an increase of the matricular contributions—through the Reichstag. The rejected members of the former bloc have resisted with some heat, but the Government has accepted the new indirect taxes. With regard to the direct taxes negotiations are proceeding and though the majority will make some concessions it will get its will pretty completely. The Federal Council went out of its way to announce to the Reichstag that there were no differences of opinion between it and the Chancellor, but the fact remains that, while the Council will take finance reform as it pleases the new majority, Prince Bülow is going. The date for his retirement has not been fixed, but the new taxes will be voted in a very short time. Prince Bülow has, therefore, already given a farewell dinner to the Federal Council and begun to pack. His successor is said to have been selected by the Kaiser, but if that is so the name has not leaked out.

* * *

THE same curious alliance between political opposites to oust the Labor Party which Mr. Deakin has effected in the Commonwealth Parliament is being tried in South Australia. Until the death, a few weeks ago, of Mr. Price, the Labor Premier, the South Australian Cabinet was a coalition government of Liberal and Labor. The new Premier, Mr. Pearse, is a Liberal, and he has come to an agreement with the Conservative Opposition. The two parties are not to fuse, as in the Commonwealth Parliament, but the Conservatives will accord the Ministry its general support and reinforce it against a Labor attack. This means, of course, that the Conservatives, while remaining out of office and responsibility, will compel the Liberals to abandon their own programme. The arrangement is not less precarious than remarkable, because the Labor Party can muster twenty votes to only twenty-one votes by the allied Conservatives and Liberals. Thus the strongest single party in South Australia, as in the Commonwealth, is excluded from any share in power by a coalition which is one of persons rather than principles.

MR. SCHREINER, who has come to England to represent the native interest in connection with the South African Constitution, has issued the text of his petition to the Imperial Parliament from citizens of the Cape, a petition subscribed, among others, by a former Speaker of the Assembly, the Archbishop of Cape Town, and several members of the Cape Parliament. The petition insists that the native question is an Imperial, not merely a domestic concern; and that the drawing of the color line not only excludes from Parliament and threatens with loss of the franchise men of culture and ability who have never abused their rights during two generations, but marks the reversal of the Cape policy of helping the natives to rise from barbarism. The petitioners ask that the Constitution should be amended so as to restore constitutional freedom of opportunity, and they point out that many M.P.'s gave their consent to the exclusion most unwillingly. A correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian" sends us a quotation from a Basuto paper which leaves no doubt as to the fears of the most powerful native tribe in South Africa.

* * *

THE general debate on the new French tariff was closed on Monday by a speech from the Minister of Commerce. M. Cruppi argued that the changes since 1892 justified a revision, but only a partial not a wholesale revision, of customs. That was the general opinion of the country as expressed by the Departmental Councils and the Chambers of Commerce. The country, too, was in favor of commercial treaties, and the Government had suggested, and the Committee approved, giving the executive authority to negotiate by setting up a progressive general tariff as well as a minimum tariff. The Government was against tariff wars, and retaliation was a double-edged weapon where nations had such great commercial interests in common. That was another reason for moderation, and in his opinion there ought to be a permanent organisation for dealing with tariff legislation.

* * *

THE third Test match was won on Saturday last at Leeds by the Australians by 126 runs. The English team were handicapped by an accident to Mr. Jessop, who sometimes appears to be the only batsman who plays naturally and boldly in a crisis. The rest of the team failed miserably in the second innings, and, though the wicket was quite true, only made 87 runs. This ignominious defeat has led to a great outcry against the Selection Committee, and it is now clear that their choice both of Mr. Fry and of Mr. McLaren for the three matches was unjustified, and that the infusion of younger and more mettlesome players is necessary. Certainly we should not be beaten by a team whose strength in batting and bowling, though not in fielding, is decidedly inferior to our own.

* * *

GENERAL DE GALLIFFET died on Thursday at Paris in his eightieth year. No modern soldier embodied so brilliantly the vanishing and peculiarly French ideal of the beau sabreur. Three episodes distinguished his rather wild, but always fascinating, personality—the famous hopeless charge of the cavalry brigade at Sedan under his command, his fierce reprisals on the Communists, and his attempt, as Minister of War, to make peace between the Republican Government and the Army over the Dreyfus case. Few personalities have been more assailed or more admired. With all his faults, a certain chivalrous loyalty was a steady characteristic of Galliffet's career.

Politics and Affairs.

THE PESSIMISM OF ENGLAND.

Lord Curzon's rebuke of the pessimism of our times is, we have no doubt, directed at something more serious than the passing gloom of the Press over the loss of two successive "test" matches to Australia, a polo match to America, and the Grand Challenge Cup to the Belgian oarsmen. The cynic might even perceive in these events a dim and distant promise that in future we may waste a little less time on these amusements, and some of our industrial rivals a little more. This country has inoculated the world with its love of sport, with the double result that it is losing its own exclusive and superior skill, and that the growth of professionalism increasingly neutralises the amateur's powers and destroys or qualifies his pleasure. Let us accept these inevitable fruits of Anglomania and the passion for "records," and remember, with Lord Curzon, that if we have given polo and the modern art of rowing to the nations, within the same period of time we have set up a batch of ancient peoples with tolerable imitations of the House of Commons. If they, in turn, produce more excellent Parliaments than our own, we shall have no more reason to feel jealous than because of Mr. Noble's victory over Mr. Maclaren. Great Britain still contributes amply to the commerce of life; the important thing for her to discover is not whether her pupils improve on her inventions, but whether she has given them of her best or her worst.

The pessimism of the sporting newspaper will, as we have suggested, pass, but it is clear that the national mind maintains a deeper mood of self-distrust. So far as this is a phase of self-criticism, there is no reason to wish it absent. The British nation lacks much of the fineness of observation that comes natural to the Frenchman, and is cultivated in his politics to a degree that hampers action and imparts an element of malice to his censure of his public men. If the real defects in our society, such, for example, as the extreme degradation of a side of our city life, were firmly impressed on our minds, and if the superiority of the modern German industrial centre were thoroughly explored, even Mr. Kipling's defamation of his countrymen might take a useful turn. But this is not the usual current of our thoughts about ourselves. Singularly enough, those who most deplore the failure of Great Britain to hold her intellectual place in the world, are also the first to insist on an expansion of her material activities, forgetting that if the salt of character and will, the elements of wisdom and power in a State, are lost, an ambitious policy, backed by a gigantic army and navy, is bound to come to grief. The true moral of the pessimists is that it is time not to shake out sail but to take it in. If England is really given up to football and folly, she will not vote for universal military service, any more than the classes who urge her to this sacrifice will submit to the slight curtailment of personal luxury which the rising of the standard of naval expenditure involves. And if on the other hand, the original force of the British stock remains undiminished, its objection to conscription will be that the vital energy of the people is amply absorbed in the war services and their maintenance, but is feebly and quite inadequately devoted to the essential tasks of civilisation. There is no decadence in this rejoinder. It is the natural reply of the instructed Englishman, who, while he is quite aware of where his weakness lies, does not accept the pessimistic conclusion of the Protectionist that because the world is becoming richer, and no method of wealth-production is our monopoly any longer, the store of our wealth or the means of its expansion is diminishing.

This kind of national pessimism is therefore serious only so far as it reveals a certain pathological condition in our "directing" classes. It springs from the "wild," unreasoning, fear about life which a great modern writer declares to be the chief source of unhappiness in the individual. The mass of the people do not share it, any more than, with a shorter and less secure existence than the rich, they are everlastingly plagued with the timid rich man's forebodings about the loss of health, or money, or repute, or the Imperialist's incessant perturbation about the Empire. And it is perfectly clear that certain definite advances are taking place, both in the material and in the moral fabric of British life, which are sufficiently accounted for by the partial withdrawal or defeat of its enemies, such as internal and external war, virulent diseases, ignorance of sanitary law, and the unchecked encroachment of wealth and power on the vital force of the working nation. If we still suffer in comparison with some of our neighbors, it is partly because we began the industrial race earlier than they, and have passed on our sad experience to them, and because, with all our gifts, the idea of the organisation of the State as a beneficent force, sustained by the mutual efforts of all its members, is still but feebly developed. This is a reason, not for pessimism, but at least for "meliorism." No observant man can read "Mark Rutherford's" sketches of what the inner circles of North and Central London were like forty or fifty years ago, and fail to see that out of all this dark chaos of human life some measure of order and light has been evolved. Let him who realises this think hopefully not only of the progressive tendencies of his people, but of the wide field of social energy still open to his endeavor.

The backwardness of the nation does, indeed, affront the eye until we realise that, if education has done little, it has done as much as the soil in which it was planted could bear. Could one expect the mass of over-driven toilers of the early and middle years of Victoria to renew the moral and intellectual stuff of the race after less than forty years of national education? Has not Lancashire done wonders since then? The people are soberer, more self-restrained, quicker mentally, outwardly far better clothed and mannered. They have, to some extent, fallen into the toils set for them by cheap journalism and its triple cult of sport, crime, and snobbery. They are material in outlook; they have not gained stability of mind, or attained the unity of thought which delivers man from "a multitude of opinions." But few expected them to do anything of the kind. The faith and the politics of England could not stay on the seemingly solid ground which they occupied two generations ago; a new complexity has come into the social order and the spiritual outlook. But it is easy to see that, on the whole, the main body of the British people has effected a more significant improvement than the classes familiarly known as "their betters." The aristocracy has rather declined than advanced, and the sons and grandsons of our "captains of industry" are by no means as good as their fathers. How much of the pessimism which Lord Curzon rebukes is the fruit of mere idleness and over-pleasuring, of life ended for serious pursuits in the 'fifties, or never begun on lines which the rational intelligence of man can approve, of vulgar contempt for "trade," of incapacity even to make money, or to force any kind of meaning out of the riddle of the world? England, thanks largely to the unparalleled store of accumulated capital with which she began the new century, has more than her due share of this toneless existence; and Mr. Lloyd George will be a benefactor to his kind if he squeezes a little of it out.

THE SELF-DEFEAT OF VIOLENCE.

The double murder at the Imperial Institute is a horror for which no shadow, we will not say of palliation, but even of explanation, has yet appeared. The act appears to lie entirely outside the ordinary track of political crime. It bears no relation, for example, to the attempt on the life of Mr. B. C. Allen, which was definitely motived by revenge for the active prosecution of a previous murder committed by members of a secret society. Nothing has occurred to suggest that it was the result of a conspiracy. There is no evidence that anyone was cognisant of the murderer's intention. The very atrocity of the deed, its motiveless cruelty, has perhaps helped to check those indirect effects which are not the least serious consequences of an act of violence. Irresponsible talk of widespread sedition has no support in the facts of the case, as hitherto ascertained, and the rage against Indian students in England, as a body, of which at first one heard the mutterings, has been held in check by the glaring fact that one Indian suffered along with Sir Curzon Wyllie, and apparently in the abortive attempt to protect him, while another Indian was the first to fall upon the assassin. In the face of such facts, even the talk which one hears at such times in the railway carriage, wherein good people let their indignation explode in wholesale denunciations of entire classes or nations, was in some degree silenced. It hardly needed the prompt and sincere protest of the Indian community to dissociate Indians in general from so brutal and senseless a deed, though it was perfectly right and natural that the protest should be made.

Thus there is good reason to hope that the evil effects of the murders will be limited to the private suffering that they entail on the families and friends of the victims, and that they will have no wider reaction on the course of public events. Too often it has been the achievement of some irreconcileable to thwart the plans of a humane and liberally minded statesmanship, to postpone the day of reconciliation between classes and nations, and to invest the cause of humanity with associations of unscrupulousness and brutality. For every act of violence committed in the name of liberty the cause of liberty has to give an account which is not wound up with any vengeance, however severe, upon the offender, but runs on through the generations, perpetually renewing the argumentative forces whereby the champions of authority keep the mass of moderate, timid opinion on their side. History knows no perspective in dealing with the violence of revolutionaries. The single execution of Servetus by Calvin has, perhaps, filled as large a space in the judgment of mankind as all the murders and all the nameless cruelties inflicted on tens of thousands of Calvinists. The total of innocent blood spilt in the Reign of Terror is small compared with that shed by the Tsardom, and a trifle measured against the outpouring of the Hamidian massacres. Yet the Reign of Terror threw back European progress for thirty years, and serves to this day as the means of inculcating in the minds of youth aversion to the exercise of reason, disinclination to justice, and contempt of mercy. Still less are the cruelties of anarchy comparable to those at the disposal of despotism. Anarchy has no Schlusselburgs, and though it has often murdered wantonly and sometimes with jeering cruelty, it has never drawn out the process of revenge upon its victims in years on years of solitary confinement unrelieved even by hard labor. The sufferings of Marie Antoinette, great and tragic as they were, are not comparable to those that Mme. Vera Figner has endured, yet Mme. Figner's endurance will never inspire a Burke, partly because imagination recoils baffled from the attempt to conceive the life of a Schlusselburg cell, partly because literary society will never open its ears to the tale. After all, the world, or some part of the world, thinks that to suffer perpetually is the natural lot of those born to hate injustice and love mankind. The scaffold and the prison are their natural environment, and, accepting comfortably such liberties as these have won for it, the world passes to the spectacle of Charles I. or "the martyred Laud."

It may be that there is some occasional deviation from perfect justice in these judgments of history. But the practical point which the revolutionist has to bear in mind is that, justly or unjustly, his offence will be weighed in one scale by the world, and the punishment meted out to him in quite another. His resort to the dagger or the bomb, even if it succeeds in its immediate object, will be a weapon used against his cause long after he is dead. If the Tsar's Government employs spies to organise assassinations, to decoy men into becoming murderers, and then bring them to the scaffold, it loses nothing by exposure. Its head will still be welcomed in the courts of the world. He will receive the freedom of the City of London to make up for that of Moscow. As long as he has power he will find, abroad as at home, all the respect that he can require. The revolutionist is differently placed. He professes to show the world a more excellent way, and if he simply exhibits it a new form of the old creed of violence, the world will both deride and hate him, and not him only, but his principle and his cause. Could we eliminate from the history of the modern world the reflex effects of the violence of extremists and fanatics, it is difficult to estimate the progress that might have been made. Who can judge how much the assassination of Lincoln did to retard the re-settlement of the South, and so, by embroiling the conquered Southron with the enfranchised negro, to saddle the United States with an unsolved color problem? Who can estimate the permanent effect of the Phœnix Park murders in alienating the average unreflecting Englishman from Irish sympathies. Perhaps some measure may be obtained from considering the converse case of South Africa, where the absence of any violent section in the Dutch community left the way open to so rapid a reconciliation.

Fortunately, for reasons stated, we have no cause to fear that the mad act of last week will impinge with any serious effect on the movement of reconciliation between this country and India. Here, indeed, is a case where, more than ever, violence is without excuse. Those who take the most unfavorable view of British government in India must also recognise that, at least here in England, every Indian is free to speak, to plead his country's cause and voice his own grievances. It is the refusal of a hearing that is the one plea for physical force. Fortunately there is no reason to doubt that the vast majority of Indians are thoroughly penetrated with these views. They need no converting to the paths of peace. Nor is Lord Morley the man to be deflected from his self-appointed task by the fact that there may remain fanatics whom no possible measures of justice will appease, or who may even use violence as a means of stopping reforms.

THE PROTECTION OF ANIMALS.

The impressive International Congress for the protection of animals which Miss Lind-af-Hageby's society has brought together during the past week, though it happens to be the first which has ever met in London, might, we imagine, have been summoned with equal success at any time in the past ten years. But, as one travelled back in time, a point would soon be reached at which such a congress would have been utterly impossible, partly because we had not yet acquired the habit of thinking as Europeans, partly because the number of people who cared to work systematically for the welfare of the beasts was still too small, and also because the general attitude of public opinion would have been contemptuous, or even hostile. There has been a notable increase in sensitiveness where the sufferings of animals are concerned, during the last generation, but the astonishing fact is not so much this increase as the survival of so many forms of wanton and almost undefended cruelty. Vivisection stands in a category by itself. It has ardent and influential defenders. But does anyone, not a peer, uphold the more repulsive of sports, the hunting of tame deer, and the coursing of captive rabbits? Does anyone, save the trader in fashion, justify the cruelties of the traffic in sealskins, in osprey plumes, or in tortoiseshell? Does anything save mere inertia prevent us from adopting the humane methods of killing which are in common use in the German municipal slaughter-houses? There is, in short, a whole range of wanton and unpopular cruelties connected chiefly with our sports, our dress, and our food, which seem only to await a resolute and organised attack in order to disappear as completely as cock-fighting or bull-baiting. Yet despite this growth of humane feeling, and its concentration on special abuses, it would be an exaggeration to say that our thinking has really made any progress flattering to our clearness of intellect in reaching any generally accepted theory of our relations towards the animals. We are all agreed that it hurts us to think of an animal in pain, but few of us have taken the trouble to give this sentiment a reasonable basis, or to decide how far we mean to follow it when it happens to conflict with a pleasure or an interest.

The one definite progress which has been made towards a rational theory has been the discarding of certain assumptions of bad metaphysics which stood in the way of humanity. When Descartes taught that animals are mere automata, he was partly putting into scientific language the callous practice of a rude age, and partly framing a doctrine which justified the ruthless experiments which science, in the days before the discovery of anæsthetics, was just beginning to organise. To Newton, Locke, and, above all, Voltaire, belongs the credit of destroying that pseudo-psychology. Almost as obsolete among us is the religious prejudice—still strong, however, in Italy and Greece—which held that animals deserved no regard because they have no "souls," and possess only a limited intelligence. "The question," as Bentham put it, "is not, can they reason, nor can they speak, but can they suffer?" Since the earlier humanitarians fought this battle, science itself has, without intending it, come to their aid. The doctrine of evolution, by breaking down the isolation of man in nature, has made an end of any argument for ignoring the claims of the beasts which might have been based on the assumption that there is an absolute break in the chain of organic life. Yet neither the law nor popular sentiment has yet faced the necessity of revising its practice. The law takes no cognisance whatever of cruelties inflicted on wild animals. There is no check upon the sufferings which a "trainer" may inflict upon the beasts in his menagerie that happen to be ferœ naturæ. The average sentiment of the upper classes is equally partial. Cruelty, or even carelessness, towards horses and dogs is regarded as something worse than inhumanity. It is bad form. A woman who will wear the skin of a seal flayed alive, will be indignant if she sees a carter beating his dray-horse. Others again would approve vivisection if only dogs were exempted. Such partiality in pity deserves the name only of sentimentality. Those who indulge in it are thinking not of the sufferings of the beasts, but of their own fine feelings. A seal is probably quite as sensitive a creature as a horse. A guinea-pig may not be so highly organised as a dog, but the difference when it comes to the crude and violent pains of the operating-table must be quite unimportant. If we mean only to spare our own unevenly developed sympathies, then no doubt it is quite logical to say that we will tolerate cruelty to seals as far away as the North Pacific, but forbid much less gross cruelty to horses in our streets, and quite reasonable to declare that we will allow the torture of guinea-pigs, rabbits, or rats, while we protect dogs, whose fidelity touches our hearts. But if we are not sentimentalists, if, that is to say, it is for the sufferings of the animals themselves that we are concerned rather than our own emotions, then we must cease to distinguish between the distant misery and the pain which we see, and extend an equal protection to the wild and the domesticated animal.

The main difficulty, it seems to us, in reaching a clear ethical judgment about vivisection is that the problem usually presents itself wrapped up in generalities and complicated by accomplished facts. We are told that it is expedient that animals should suffer in the higher interests of science or of humanity at large. The mouse and the guinea-pig shrink to insignificance before such dignified abstractions as these. The more skilful defenders of this form of research have learned to appeal to our pity and our altruism. Do we care nothing, they ask, for the sufferings of the poor in our slums, whose children are awaiting the discovery of new serums? It is a specious appeal, to which, however, it is legitimate to answer that to reform the slums is a still more radical remedy, and also that the working classes and organised Labor are generally opposed to vivisection. We are all of us capable of doing, or allowing to be done, on behalf of those we love, things of which our colder judgment would not approve and things which we would not permit to be done for ourselves. When we are offered the serum, the sufferings it entailed are already over, and someone else has borne the responsibility. So long as we allow our minds to use the current coin of abstraction, we never reach the possibility of a sharp and decisive verdict. It is only when it is presented with a concrete case that our whole mind reacts and renders a really personal judgment. Animals in general and mankind in general we neither visualise nor realise. We shall arrive at what we really mean only by asking ourselves in some given emergency how we should wish to act. "Mankind" is a collection of selves; "animals" mean this and the other cat or dog. If each of us, faced in his own person with the risk, let us say, of cancer, is ready to say that to avoid the pain of it he is prepared to hand over some definite dog or cat, standing healthy and happy before him, to be cut open with the knife or artificially inoculated with the disease, on the chance that a remedy may be found, and then if this experiment fails, to condemn a long succession of other individual cats and dogs present before him, to the same fate, then, and only then, can we pronounce for vivisection. To take refuge in the argument that we should do it for the sake of the poor, or for mankind at large, or even for our own children, is really to evade the issue. The poor and our own children do not suffer more than we do ourselves, nor are their lives sub specie æternitatis worth more than our own. Nor would the dog in question suffer less if vivisected for their sakes than if vivisected for our own. It is, we think, useless to argue or to preach on this point. It is enough to state the question, sharply and firmly. We do not prejudge the answer. There are two or three possible answers; the answer which most Englishmen would give to-day is not the answer which our great-grandfathers would have given—and perhaps it is not quite the answer which our own children will give. To continue the theoretical debate is of immense importance. Meanwhile there are, we think, certain preliminary reforms in which there is a general agreement—that adequate and disinterested inspection is necessary in the laboratories, that the obligation to anæsthetise fully and to kill the victim when the experiment is over must be rigidly enforced, and that the repetition of old experiments, more especially in public and in lecture-rooms, should be unconditionally forbidden.

---

UNEARNED INCREMENT AND WINDFALLS.

Mr. Balfour's excursions into the debate on increment duty have been of the usual dialectical order, only interesting as a relief from the parade of "hard cases" which has occupied most of the time of the House. Last week he played Socialism against land taxes, by urging the claim of other sorts of unearned increment than that of land to contribute to the revenue. This week he feigns to discover two alternative and inconsistent principles underlying the proposed taxation. The one principle is that land should pay upon a rise of value, the other that a person owning land should pay upon a windfall. Here, it is triumphantly proclaimed, is a double contradiction. First there is a contradiction in the nature or character of the object of taxation, for a windfall, which no one has earned, differs essentially from a rise of value which is earned by society. Secondly, there is a contradiction in the mode of levying the tax, which, in the one case, is imposed upon a person, in the other on a piece of land.

Now, in truth, there is no such contradiction as is fondly imagined by Mr. Balfour and his dialectical henchman, Mr. Cox, between these two supports of the land taxes. It is quite true that a "windfall" in the strict sense of that term is not co-extensive with that future unearned increment a share of which the Budget aims to secure for the public revenue. Mr. Asquith, misreading, we think, the term as used in a letter by Professor Pigou, somewhat incautiously defended the whole body of these taxes as designed to secure a "windfall." Now, increments in the value of land may be due to three causes: first, the applied enterprise and expenditure of the owner; secondly, a known and calculable growth of population, or some definite public improvement; thirdly, some unanticipated stroke of fortune. The first sort of increase lies outside the proper scope of this taxing policy, for it is not land value, but improvements; both the second and the third are unearned increments; but only the third is a "windfall." The term "windfall," though rightly applicable as a defence of the taxing policy, only covers a portion of the ground. The reversion duty is definitely based upon this view, aiming, as it does, to take a portion of the benefit which the lessor obtains in excess of the capital value of the consideration of the lease, some gain which was not and could not have been present to the mind of the parties negotiating the lease. Again, when the increment duty is applied, a part or the whole of the increment may be a windfall arising as an unexpected stroke of fortune. But in most cases it is not wholly or chiefly of this nature, but is due to known causes more or less calculable in their action. In a word, while all windfalls are unearned increment, all unearned increments are not windfalls. But, as Professor Pigou expressly recognises, there is no contradiction, no sort of inconsistency in defending some of the taxes on the windfall argument, and others on the broader ground of unearned increment. The general defence of the new taxing policy must certainly rest upon the wider claim of the State to take a share of enhancements of value which are unearned by their owners, whether or not such enhancements are expected. In applying this doctrine considerate treatment must, of course, be accorded to such portions of unearned increments as are represented in present prices, as well as to past increments which have become parts of the actual value of the land. But we cannot abstain from touching future unearned increments on the sole ground that they have been expected and that this expectation is reflected in a higher value of last April. A landowner has no more right to expect that he would be allowed indefinitely to receive further rises of value due to public expenditure and public needs than the owner of a licensed house to expect that the extravagant annual gift he had been in the habit of receiving from the licensing authority would be continued through the centuries. It is the social origin and nature of "unearned increment" that designates it as a proper subject of taxation. Where such increment is a windfall, i.e., unexpected, its recipient no doubt parts more easily with the share claimed by the State than where he had foreseen its occurrence and had sought to keep it for himself. But now that he knows that the State intends to take a considerable and an increasing share of such publicly created values, he will no longer form such unreasonable expectations, and will soon lose all sense of grievance at the deprivation of a property which he never had a right to regard as his.

As for the other contradiction between taxing persons and taxing property, that is equally illusory. Every tax is imposed upon a person in respect of some property which he has or is supposed to have, and which endows him with ability to pay. Even a poll tax, which takes no direct account of possessions, is a tax upon or a deduction from the property of the payee. Now, in cases where there exists a close causal connection between the origin of a property and ability to pay, it will be more convenient for the State to fix its eye upon the property as the object of taxation than upon the person who happens to be its owner. This is what the State will do in respect of these increment and development taxes. It will follow the history of each piece of land, taking toll wherever it gathers a stable rise of value, and wherever it is withheld from its best development. This method of following the taxable object is in no wise opposed to the theory that it is persons with ability to pay who are called upon to do so. But, by tracing the actual emergence of increment in real pieces of land, the State can best discover and measure this ability to pay, which it will rightly impute to every owner found in possession of such increment.

There are, as Mr. Balfour and his Socialistic supporters insist, other windfalls, other increments, than those of land. If Mr. Balfour will help to discover them, the Government will doubtless be glad to satisfy his sense of distributive justice by taxing them as well as land. Indeed, the reformed graduation of income tax and death duties have their rationale in this very purpose. The reasons for imposing separate taxes on land increments are that land is fixed, and its increment of value can be watched and measured, that such increments are more normal and less fluctuating than those of other property, and that they can be separated more easily from those increments which are legitimate fruits of the skill, enterprise, and expenditure of their individual or corporate owners.

A REVOLUTION IN EDUCATION.

The new Regulations for the Training of Teachers raise constitutional and religious difficulties of many kinds. For the first time, for instance, since 1870, the provision of religious instruction is made compulsory upon local education authorities, and, by a direction of at least doubtful legality, H.M. Inspectors are to report on it; while the managers of denominational training colleges are encouraged by a Liberal Government to require a written declaration of faith from half their applicants for admission, and are empowered to submit the other half to tests which will have the same effect.

But it is in the case of the Universities that Mr. Runciman may find that he has raised the most important question. There are in England eight Training Colleges for which Universities are responsible, in addition to five for which University Colleges are responsible; and the Welsh University Colleges are responsible for three others. No official return is made as to the number of these colleges which at present give religious instruction, but I believe that the majority of them give none. In future all will be required to provide to the satisfaction of H.M. Inspector "a course of training which shall prepare students to give such instruction in, and explanations of, the Bible as are suited to the capacities of children" (p. 42).

Now, one of the points on which it is most necessary that a democratic community should think clearly is the relation of its Government to the Universities. What is a University? It is an institution which originally grew of itself, but which all civilised nations have maintained and multiplied. Its essence is its intellectual freedom. Men have learned by bitter experience how fallible are the opinions and prejudices of the "compact majority" at any given moment. We therefore have set up permanent corporations of learned men, the reason for whose existence is that they are the servants not of opinion, but of truth. To them, in order that thought may progress, a large part of the higher education of the community is entrusted.

Human beings are imperfect, and this ideal is very imperfectly realised. Universities sometimes come to think that their main business is not the pursuit of truth, but the aggrandisement of a church or a class. A wise Government is then compelled to interfere. It may demand freedom of access to the University for the whole community, and may even alter a University curriculum by abolishing a restrictive regulation like compulsory Greek. But wise Governments only interfere with the greatest caution. University reform is introduced only after an enquiry by men who understand and venerate the life of learning. Reforms, when they come, are confined to the abolition of restrictions or the provision of adequate material resources. The methods of study, and still more the conclusions which are to be the result of study are left unfettered. The University, it is always hoped, will follow, like Plato, "whithersoever the argument leads."

Such caution is more necessary in the case of religion than in any other study. It was the Universities which, in the Middle Ages, prevented the Church of Rome from stamping out intellectual life in Europe. Who will contend that Canon Driver would, even now, have been allowed to teach the results of his Old Testament studies if he had been dismissible by either the Archbishop of Canterbury or Mr. Runciman? The love of truth for its own sake is, indeed, a delicate plant, and, to preserve it, Governments respect, not only the rights, but the dignity of Universities. A feeling must be created that the service of truth is a sacred calling, and that the one unpardonable sin in a University is to make any statement on matters small or great, without adequate study and complete sincerity.

For all these considerations and traditions Mr. Runciman seems anxious to show his contempt. Just as last November he brought in his Education Bill with an announcement that it was to be closured through Committee within a week, and almost avowed that his motive was to prevent discussion, so now he brings in his Regulations in July, and relies on the fact that Parliament is busy with the Budget and the Universities are in vacation to carry him on till August 1st, when it becomes law. The course of instruction is to commence in September next with no time for discussion or preparation either by the University authorities or the men and women who are to teach the subject in the colleges. The adequacy of the course offered by a University is not to be judged by serious and responsible students of the Bible, but by an ordinary inspector. Above all, the man who may condemn the teaching offered, and so close the college, will not do so on the ground that he sincerely believes it to be careless or superficial. The inspector will necessarily look to see whether those statements are made which he thinks the Board of Education wants, and will feel that his own ideas on the subject are as irrevelant as they are unskilled. In fact, an ambiguous sentence in the Prefatory Memorandum (p. v.) implies that as long as he carries out the legal requirements of p. 42, and sees that the "explanation of the Bible" is "suited to the capacities of children" his criticism shall go no further.

Mr. Runciman himself may find it difficult to understand any of these objections. He told us, last November, that in such matters his line is "good feeling and bad logic." He may refer, for instance, to the religious syllabus of the London County Council, with its lives of Elijah and Elisha, Samuel and Daniel, and those "stories from Genesis" which are so "suited to the capacities of children." He may tells us that he is a plain man, and that plain men have no difficulties about such matters, and that if learned persons at the Universities make trouble, they must be shown their place. What would happen then? If I were on the Continent I could no more conceive of the Universities submitting than I could of a Liberal Party requiring them to submit. But I am in England, and I am absolutely unable to prophesy.

GRAHAM WALLAS.

Life and Letters.

THE WILD MAN.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD stumbled into a fine exactitude of language the other day when, speaking of Mr. Stead and his co-alarmists, he dubbed them "the wild men." "What do the wild men want?" We need not trouble ourselves about the answer to this question. For wild men do not, as such, want any object in particular, whether it be sixteen "Dreadnoughts," a message from Myers, or the canonisation of Abdul Hamid: they simply want to be "wild" because it is "their nature to." We can best approach this nature through instances of uncontested validity enabling us to distinguish the type from the others to which it has a superficial likeness. Mr. Stead is a chief among wild men. It is not because he holds eccentric views, expresses himself with a certain picturesque violence, keeps a bureau of spooks, wishes to save England and feels that he alone can do it. Faddists, extremists, eccentrics, abound, but they are not necessarily wild men in our proper sense of this term. Your anti-vaccination monomaniac is a faddist, but he is not a wild man, your bomb-throwing anarchist is both eccentric and extreme, but he is not wild. For it is of the essence of the wild man that he be not merely extreme but variable and incalculable in his extremity. A fixed principle sterilises wildness by giving direction to its violence. So, in the world of thought, such men as Tolstoy or even Nietzsche do not rank as "wild." The term, indeed, is sometimes used in politics of independent natures who refuse party ties: in Germany Mr. Harold Cox would be "ein wilde," as in America he would be called a "kicker." But this is really an abuse of the word. A wild man in the world of thought is an intellectual swashbuckler, a reckless improviser of speculative audacities, a confident plunger into the arcana of Nature or humanity, half-quack, half-genius, sometimes a precursor of ordered thought. In older times it is hard to distinguish them, for in the beginning of thought all men were perforce adventurers, carrying their lives in their hands, stumbling in a maze of mystery from paradox to paradox. Even in Plato one catches at times this call of the wild. To moderns, indeed, there is an air of wildness in the work of all pioneers, who tread unmapped regions studded with unseen and incalculable hazards. The alchemists, astrologers, mechanicians, herbalists, who groped in the foundations of the sciences stand in such contrasts to the cautious and the ordered march of modern scientists, that they seem little else than superstitious charlatans.

Nor can we deny to such a case as that of Paracelsus the propriety of the epithet wild man, any more than in a later age we can refuse it to a very different sort of man, Rousseau. In such instances it becomes evident that what Bacon styled "intellectus sibi permissu," the loose play of reason, is a badge of wildness. But it affords no sufficient explanation of this nature. For wildness is more of the blood than of the brain. Though we find to-day in intellectual circles an occasional example of "wild" rationalism, men who run riot in academic logomachy, or spend unmeasured energy in barren iconoclasm, or in weaving fancy dresses for the universe, there is too much temporary earnestness of purpose in these pursuits to merit the true censure of wildness. In the real wild man his intellect must be the mere servant of his passions. It is not merely that "he thinks in little pieces that lie about loose," as Mr. Wells has said of the ordinary "educated" man, but that he puts his intelligence at the free disposal of a diseased and dramatised ego which is allowed to use it to feed a sheer lust of self-importance. Put a man with this abnormally developed craving into any field of thought or action, it drives him to seek a spectacular notoriety which can only be achieved by becoming a quick-change artist. The slow, continuous, consistent pursuit of any purpose or policy, however much publicity attends it, will not satisfy this sort of craving.

This brings us round again to the case of Mr. Stead and to the fields of journalism and politics which are the fittest feeding-grounds for the wild man. "Me, me adsum qui feci!" is the perpetual cry of the wild man. He must ever be crowning heroes or unmasking traitors, now pushing two nations to the verge of armed conflict, now appearing as their sensational saviour with a hot scheme of universal peace, denouncing a foul conspiracy while pouring adulation over the chief conspirator, doing all, daring all, in order to enjoy the sense of "being a cause." For it is this sheer crude egoism, the itch to see the world moving at your will, or, more psychologically rendered, the itch to enjoy this itch, that drives the wild man. Even in journalism this wildness may be qualified by other less ignoble motives—in fact, some generosity of nature is essential to a distinctively imaginative career. Cobbett was a wild man in the same craft as Mr. Stead, but no one can follow his career intelligently without seeing in him other passions strong enough at times even to over-ride the master passion and subdue it to self-sacrifice. Proudhon, the revolutionary scribe of 1848, the centenary of whose birth is celebrated next week, was a typical wild man who will live as the maker of a single phrase he did not really mean: "La propriété c'est le vol." Yet there is no reason to deny him some disinterested desire to benefit mankind.

So it is commonly with the wild man in politics. He may, perhaps even must, have some strong genuine convictions, however fleeting, some real attachment to a party, a cause, a movement, more commonly to several parties, causes, movements. For narrowly concentrated egoism cannot feed on itself for an adequate career: it requires a number of disinterested suckers to draw sustenance for wildness. This gives us Mr. Roosevelt as the wildest of the wild men in modern politics, hors concours. A creature of a thousand impulses darting from a complex personality, he probably "presents" himself to himself as a man of destiny with a closely welded unity of purpose, consistently pursued through many tortuous paths of thought and action. This firm conviction of consistency and mission—to grapple with the trusts, to plan a triumphant campaign for the party of the trust-makers, to force on a Spanish war, to herald the age of arbitration, to punish corrupt officials, and to safeguard the Tariff—citadel of all corruptions—remains a supreme source of self-satisfaction, and a perpetual fountain of folly in act and utterance. There are, of course, especially in public life, many men of this type of character who are not dignified by the name of wild men. For the instability and caprice of a weak nature is not wildness: Lord Rosebery is not a wild man. There must be force without control, the instability of fire not of water, for the wild man is preeminently a destroyer. Journalism here again affords the test, it is a veritable menagerie of wild men, roaring and rampaging to the public ear and eye. Your wild man in the pulpit, the academic chair, even in the House of Commons, must observe some limits in range of subject and in treatment—his personality is more or less in constant evidence, and pride itself imposes some restraints. But the wild man behind a newspaper becomes impersonal, inhuman, "either god or beast" (and there is little doubt which he tends to be): he can take all ignorance for his province, can darken an illimitable sphere of counsel, can play upon the wild instincts of the horde from an inexhaustible supply. Thus it comes about that a certain type of wild man takes to the Press as to his natural lair, and issuing nightly sows his tares in the fallow field of the common mind. The only way of disarming him and making his sensational egoism innocuous is to prepare the common field with wholesome crops of sturdy growth. This is the chief function of culture, of that "sweetness" which shall teach men to shun the crudeness of violent emotions, of that "light" which shall expose the falsehood of extremes, that culture which, in the familiar words of Roman wisdom, gives men grace of manners, "nec sinit esse feros."

THE POWER TO SUPPRESS OPINION.

When John Brown was hanged, it was an inspiring belief that, though his body lay mouldering in the grave, his soul went marching along. The invisible spirit of one man who had died for a cause led armies to victory with more devoted assurance than any royal standard, battle cry, or Labarum revealed by heaven. We know with what blood the seed of faith is watered, and it is the final consolation of martyrs that they do not die in vain. To light some candle that shall not be put out serves to make the flames less savage, and only a stoical and superhuman virtue suffers execution for a principle which would be immediately sunk in oblivion. For mankind is possessed with a fond belief that truth is great and will prevail. If the struggle availed nothing, it would hardly seem worth while to continue it, and hope is so optimist that after a thousand failures the lost cause is always on the point of triumph.

Yet causes have been lost, and even the blood of martyrs has produced no visible harvest. Mill was as truly a leader of forlorn hopes as any hero who sprang into the ditch with powder-bags, yet he writes: "It is a piece of idle sentimentality that truth, merely as truth, has any inherent power denied to error of prevailing against the dungeon and the stake," and in the same treatise "On Liberty," he says: "That truth always triumphs over persecution is a pleasant falsehood." For instances he goes only to one small phase of human experience—the struggle of thought for freedom against the bondage of medieval theology—and he shows that the effort after freedom had been stamped out many times before it was partially successful in the sixteenth century. The doom that crushed the Albigenses and Waldenses, the Lollards, Hussites, and Savonarola's disciples, supplies obvious examples, and Mill even maintains that, but for the general tolerance of the Cæsars, Christianity itself would have been overwhelmed by a similar fate. In regard to those very Albigenses it is recorded that, during the assault upon their town of Beziers, the Abbot of Citeaux, being asked by an over-scrupulous soldier how he should distinguish heretic from orthodox, felt such confidence in eternal justice that he replied: "Kill them all; God will know his own." But the course of history shows no such discriminating judgment, and if success were always the test of divine selection we should be driven to strange conclusions.

In Italy and Spain the movement for mental emancipation died under pressure. Even in Germany, after a century's struggle, ending in a prolonged and devastating war, it could only secure terms on the inept condition that each region should believe its ruler's religion. In France the Huguenots disappeared under Louis XIV.'s persecution and Louvois's dragonnades, fit prototypes of the present Tsar's "punitive expeditions" against the subject races clamped and ironed in the Russian Empire. But, indeed, if we seek a modern instance how false is the pleasant theory that truth always triumphs over persecution, we need only regard the actual situation of Russia herself. It still wants three months of four years since that day when the melancholy clouds of Russian history were at last broken by a gleam of joy. We doubt if in the whole course of time any single act ever gave such widespread happiness as the October Manifesto, in which the Tsar declared "his inflexible will to grant to his people the immutable foundations of civil liberty, based on inviolability of person and freedom of conscience, speech, union, and association."

The advance to freedom had been long and bitter. How many unknown lives were flung away, how many men and women surrendered all that is thought valuable in the world, passed decades entombed in solitude, endured every torment of agony, shame, and madness, disappeared into Arctic wildernesses, and took on themselves the dishonor and even the remorse of criminals, so that the day of joy might rise at last! It rose, and the land was filled, as it were, with the intoxication of its light. Clouds gathered, but still it was day. Never again could that horror of interminable darkness brood over Russia. Less wild in rejoicing, but with promise of steadier radiance, was that May morning when for the first time a Parliament assembled amid all the glitter and ceremony of the Church, the Army, and the Imperial House. But more significant than the Tsar's address, or the regalia glittering on stools around him, or the Archbishop lavishly sprinkling holy water upon the representatives of the people, were the cries of "Amnesty!" with which the crowded streets met the Duma members as they drove to their House, and the sight of handkerchiefs waved through prison bars by prisoners of freedom, imploring not to be forgotten on the day of liberty.

It is three years and two months to-day since Ivan Petrunkévitch made the first speech ever spoken in a Russian Parliament, and it was for amnesty he spoke, while the whole House rose in reverence to those who had suffered in the common service. In that short time the light of freedom has gone out, the hope has faded, every pledge of the Manifesto has been broken, and the Parliament itself exists only as a shadow. The whole glad movement of those days already seems extinct as the Albigenses. It has followed down the path of history with the "Decembrists," the movement "To the People," the movement of "The People's Will," the Tchaykovsky Circle, the trial of "The 193," and the workmen's appeal on Bloody Sunday. Rarely has the outlook seemed blacker than to-day. Partly, no doubt, the darkness is heightened by contrast with that brief radiance, but the worst sign of all is the news that the spirit of youth is turning in despair from the thought of freedom, and clutches at the easiest passing pleasure, seeing how brief an interval life leaves for enjoyment, and, as to the future, the martyr's end is the same as the sensualist's, nor has his influence upon destiny any more weight. Never, we are told, has the literature of brothels enjoyed such a sale in Russia as now, and never have the young followed with such despairing pleasure the simple doctrine it inculcates.

To quote again from Mill, let us remember his sentence that "the peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is that it is robbing the human race." When we recall the debt that the human race has owed to Russia during the last century, when we recall how profound has been her influence upon the thought, art, music, and literature of Europe during the last thirty years, we begin to realise how harmful this robbery has been. It is sometimes said that the very possibility of such suppression reveals a weakness inherent in the people upon whom it is exercised. It is frequently said that all might have been well if only Russia could produce a leader—"some Cromwell," fit to confront tyranny's established powers. In saying so, perhaps one falls into the same "idle sentimentality" as in supposing that truth will always prevail against the dungeon and stake. Before we condemn, let us at all events consider where the cause of progress would be if similar repression were applied to ourselves now. Hang an average of three men a day for nearly three years, including, it is true, some murderers and "expropriators," but including also many hundreds whose only offence was their idea of progress. Exile some 80,000 of our Liberals and Socialists without trial. Imprison 237 of our Liberal and Labor members of Parliament. Fine or imprison over 400 of our Liberal editors. Suppress over 1,000 of our Liberal and Socialist newspapers, and shut up at least 90,000 men and women in overcrowded prison cells for their political opinions, exposing them in many cases to such tortures and shame that they willingly seek death by starvation or fire. Then if, at the end of the years, with our leaders slain, their followers sunk in gaol or exile, and ourselves in peril of death or torture from day to day—then if the flame of freedom remains among us unquenched as ever, we may, perhaps, have some right to bring the charge of weak will and failing courage against the liberationists of Russia.

If anyone suppose this account of repression to be overdrawn, let him first recall Tolstoy's pamphlet, "I Cannot Be Silent," written a year ago; let him next read an account of prison life for political offenders by I. T. Youvatshev—"The Russian Bastille," lately published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus; and, lastly, let him read Prince Kropotkin's brief pamphlet called "The Terror in Russia," issued this week by Messrs. Methuen for the Russian Parliamentary Committee. In that pamphlet he will find what political repression means under the Government of the Tsar. It is there shown on official and public evidence that the prisons are so overcrowded with political and common offenders that in many gaols five prisoners are crammed into the small cubic space constructed for one, and that, in consequence of the overcrowding, scurvy is common and the gaols have become pest-houses from which typhus spreads through the cities. The iron beds and chairs are removed from the cells to make room, and prisoners live on a bare floor furnished with an open sewer. At Tiflis and other prisons, if they approach the window, they are shot from outside. At the caprice of the gaolers, they are stamped upon and beaten without mercy. The condemned are flogged up to the foot of the gallows. They are hanged while bruised and bleeding with torture. They are hanged while raving in the delirium of typhus. They are strapped to iron planks without moving for days and nights together. They are overrun with bugs and lice. They are carted like logs to the hospital in fetters, and their irons may not be removed without the doctor's certificate of death. Women are stripped and flogged by men, and at Kazan the governor of the prison incited the common criminals to violate the "political" women and offered them rewards.

There are forms of torture which are thought too hideous to be spoken of, but they were not too hideous to be perpetrated at Riga, nor too hideous to be pardoned or rewarded by the man in whose honor the City of London is preparing a golden casket. We have not space to tell of the 160 suicides in little over two years among prisoners in their despair, nor of the hunger-strikes in protest against cruelty, nor of the starvation and misery of Siberian exiles, nor of the Government's paid agents who tempt to crime in order to betray. We return only to that melancholy note of disillusionment which we heard from Mill, a teacher so courageous and hopeful in the cause of freedom. Here are the people, or the sons and daughters of the people, to whom Europe at this moment, perhaps, owes more than to all other contemporaries, and under the tyranny of the Tsar and his representatives, this is their fate.

To-morrow has been set aside by many Christian churches throughout this country as a day of special intercession for all Russian prisoners and captives, and, indeed, the sufferings of all alike demand compassion. But it is for the many thousands of political offenders that we chiefly speak. For they have devoted life and happiness to a cause which is equally ours, and if, after all their unselfish generosity, it is now to be overwhelmed in their persecution, the whole world will be the loser in their defeat, and another instance will be added to the list of those miserable crises in history where the powers of evil have triumphed and truth, however great, has not prevailed.

---

FOUND AT THE ZOO.

"Now let's go and see the elephants." Having just seen the diving birds fed, they would drag us at the gallop down the slope and under the tunnel. It is of no use trying to show them that the bees have bitten holes in the comfrey blossoms and are sucking the honey out at the back door. That is not one of the things we came to the Zoo to see. The bees are not in cages, neither have they been turned out of cages, like the squirrels or the crested doves that nest by the capybara's paddock. Sparrows in an empty monkey house, or mice running in the hippopotamus den are amusing, but we draw the line at the bees and the flowers, the latter occupying such spaces as ought to contain the jabberwock and other animal celebrities at present unrepresented in the collection.

So we have to content ourselves with the discovery of things that have been put into the cages as exhibits but are, as it were, "hidden in sight." Nothing could well be more conspicuous than a well-grown white bear in a cage measuring ten feet each way, the front all bars. He is artfully obliterated, however, by the rival conspicuousness of two white bears next door but one, dripping with water and about to plunge again into their pond. No one looks at the solitary "polar," except here and there an imaginative child who thinks it a shame that he, too, cannot have a lovely plunge bath. Under him is painted the discouraging word "hybrid," and lower down in very small print "three-quarter polar and one quarter brown." Ah, there is his secret. Not merely is he a hybrid, but the descendant of a fertile hybrid, the browner mongrel in the next cage. The mark of a natural species, say the anti-Darwinians, is the sterility of its hybrids, the limitation of domesticated varieties, their fertility when interbred. Our polar bear with a brown streak on its back compels them either to say that brown bear and polar bear are one or to forego a favorite argument against Darwin's theory of the origin of species.

"Hidden in sight" is a favorite game in the insect house. We have many times seen a visitor look into a cage and declare it empty, when it has contained twenty or thirty stick-insects. By the kindness of the keeper we hold one of these in the hand. Even to the touch it seems a stick with smaller sticks glued to it by the edges for legs. At one end the dead wood has apparently been broken off roughly. The older the insect is, the blacker and older seems the wood of which it must be made. The young "sticks," in shape exactly like their parents, court or defy destruction by waving their tails over their heads like scorpions. Probably their agility saves them while they are young; their resemblance to inedible morsels when they grow staid. The keeper, having enjoyed our wonder at the stick insects, shows us his land crabs. He points out that one claw is larger than the other, that being the one most used for feeding. Then, in answer to a question, "Oh yes, it is always the right claw that is bigger." He is roughly right, yet of his four crabs there is one left-handed. "Why, so it is," he says, "I never noticed it before."

Some have gone to the Zoo many times without seeing the Tasmanian Devil. A short time ago, the label said they were three. As we passed then, there came from within the shed blood-curdling howls as the Devils played together or quarrelled over their meal of live babies or what not. Now the three is crossed out, and a two put in its place, while one stiff-jointed, big-headed, blear-eyed, bored, dog-like creature totters out from the shed and stretches himself in the sun that flecks his yard. Poor Tasmanian Devil! How fallen from the picture we had of him when, out of sight, he contributed to that chorus of really horrible howls.

After such disillusionment we hardly dare go and see the Tasmanian wolf. He is asleep as usual, but a keeper consents to call him. Gasping a shriek of protest he bounds out. That monosyllabic yelp is ten times more thrilling than even the howls of the Devils. It hangs in the memory like the last cry of a drowning man. And this time the creature matches his howl uncommonly well. He might be the caricature of a wolf executed in clay by some artist of India whose art we know leans towards the horrible. He is a gaunt wolf, a long-bodied wolf, with long sharp jaws, large eyes whose mildness instead of detracting from his fierceness adds to it. Then, having made this wolf in the likeness of Chiche-vache for lean voracity, the artist has added the cruel treachery of the hyena by painting stripes across its loins. Only take care, Artist, that you do not overdo the horrible and make your friend ridiculous.

The intervention of the keeper was once needed in order to see two promising young otters. But now they have been put into the pond, where they play all day like water kittens, next door to the foxes that, by standing on the top of their bank and looking hard over the heads of the people, try to imagine that they are in the midst of a moorland solitude. There is another animal in a den here that must be routed out in order to be seen, an animal labelled with the unstimulating name of "Common badger (var)." But he is to the badger-lover an astonishing specimen. All that is black on an ordinary badger is sand-color in these two from Rutland and Staffordshire respectively. Truly a delightful "var" of the common badger.

There are two ways of seeing the squirrels. One is to take pea-nuts or other delicacies and walk round the enclosure, followed by the lithe mendicants. Another is to stand there quietly and witness their manœuvres with the floating capital that is already theirs. One has a pea-nut in its mouth, which after much reconnoitring it pretends to bury twice or thrice, then really buries it, smoothes the grass over it, and leaves the place as nonchalantly as possible. He has been closely watched, however, and has scarcely gone a yard when another pounces straight on the cache, digs up the nut, and pretends to eat it. But he in turn only buries it again after several feints, and thus the game goes on.

In the reptile house there are some tenderfoot rattlesnakes from Texas. They are magnificent serpents, nearly six feet long, and the charm of them is that they do not yet know all about glass. When we put our hand close to one of them he draws back his head by looping about a yard of his person into a figure of eight. It is so evident that by releasing the springs he could dash his fangs even into our face that we hesitate to try him further. The heart comes into the mouth as we and he face one another—he a practised poisoner and we but a soft-skinned amateur in every grade of wild life. He, in his certainty that glass is nothing, mesmerises us into the same belief. We draw respectfully away, and he disdainfully uncoils and moves on about his business.

Another of the Texans is busily rattling. We can see the instrument quivering so rapidly that its outlines are blurred, and by leaning very near the glass we can hear "the rattling terrors of the vengeful snake." They are but the whirring of a grasshopper. "Why does he rattle?" asks a little girl of her uncle, and he has the prudence to think well before he answers. Surely the main purpose of the rattle is to lure insect-eating birds within reach. As the bird comes nearer, the tail quivers more, and the grasshopper seems to the bird more and more real. Then, when the snake is about to strike larger prey, or an enemy such as man, still the tail quivers, and the second man, if not the first, converts the allurement into a warning. Sometimes at this Zoo there is an ally of the rattlesnake that points this theory with convincing force. Instead of a rattle, its tail ends in a white, scaleless point nearly two inches long, which wriggles and crawls just like a white maggot or grub. The grub, like the rattle, is in the middle of the snake's coils, and guarded on the outside by the watchful, death-bearing head. Midway between the rattlesnake and the maggot-tailed serpent stands the rat-tailed. That is still represented in the collection, its equipment hard to find a use for, but offering just a shred of hope to the evolutionist on the look-out for an organism in the making, yet not of any use till it is fully made.

Pictures of Travel.

THE HOME OF CATULLUS.

For nearly an hour the steamer had furrowed the glassy surface of the Garda Lake, leaving dazzling lines of foam across the intense blue water in its track. The great company of snow-crowned mountains that throng about the lake to northward lay behind. In front appeared nothing at first sight very conspicuous; only the long low expanse of the south shore, where the lake, released from the pressure of the hills, spreads itself out, like Loch Lomond under exactly similar conditions, in miles of gleaming shallows. But half-way along this low south shore lay what appeared to be an island several miles nearer; an island surrounded with low cliffs and crowned with groves of olive. Looked down upon, however, from any high point in the mountains, this "island," inlaid in the gleaming expanse, is seen to be connected with the mainland by a slender thread, a ridge of rock some three miles long, and about five times broader than the road it carries—to be, in fact, no island at all, but the most famous and romantic of peninsulas—"Sweet Catullus's almost-island"; or, as Catullus himself apostrophised it in splendidly fearless hyperbole: "Of almost-islands and of islands, Sirmio, thou gem!"

"—Paene insularum, Sirmio, insularumque Ocelle!"

The little town of Sirmione, at the pier of which the steamer presently draws up, stands at the outer end of the isthmus, abutting upon the lake at either side. Quite an imposing place it looks from the pier, with two or three pretentious hotels along the lake front, a tribute to the still rising fame of the "gem of peninsulas" in a tourist-world eager for new sources of interest, and convinced that they can only be adequately investigated under conditions of complete bodily well-being. But behind this imposing mask you arrive, promptly enough, at the familiar features of squalid, picturesque Italy, repellent to many of the senses, but irresistibly charming to the imagination; a huddle of narrow lanes, dark in the shadow of tall grey houses, archways, and balconies; irregular little piazzas which seem to be rather the odd leavings of irregular streets than designed spaces; and everywhere a glint of light and color, flowers, bits of gay dress hung out of upper windows; and overhead the intense blue, at once dark and glowing, like Milton's violet. In the midst, too, towers the massive castle built by the Scaligers of Verona in the thirteenth century to control the passage of the peninsula, which is here cut across by a moat. It is still intact, but the Scaligers have slept for centuries under the magnificent tombs which are among the chief glories of Verona, and a frugal municipality uses their armories and muniment rooms, their banqueting halls and echoing corridors, as quarters for its beadles and bursars, and for the peaceful but unexciting activities of the post office.

But if the Scaligers are quite clearly dead at Sirmione, there is no question that Catullus, more ancient by a dozen centuries, is alive. Or, what perhaps comes to the same thing, the little town is profoundly aware that Catullus is a very important condition of its being alive itself. Every member of the population helps to recall Catullus to your memory, should you be inclined to forget him. They are all for the ancients, or, at least, for this ancient, these moderns; they do not dream of our bitter divisions over the place of Latin in the school; for them there is no classical question, and, if there were, they would not improbably solve it by delivering Horace and Vergil and Tacitus to whatever limbo the educational reformer might prefer, provided Catullo, Catullo, the bread and breath of Sirmione, were preserved. At every turn you are invited to mount vehicles destined to bear you, for the sum of one lira, to the "Grotti di Catullo," a distance of about three-quarters of a mile. Little ragged boys, who, it is to be feared, never read a line of the poet whose name is so familiar a household word in their mouths, offer their guidance, tumultuously, to the same shrine. The inns follow suit, and a very dingy tavern, formerly known as the "Trattoria della Pescheria," now bears the prouder legend, "Albergo di Catullo."

Quietly, but decisively, rejecting the services of these devotees, we find our way out through the north end of the little town, under a gateway partly built of Roman material, and adorned with several ancient inscriptions. The olive groves, which crown the end of the peninsula, almost at once begin; interrupted only by narrow, winding lanes, by two private estates with villas, and by the old Romanesque church, whose low-peaked tower is seen above the olive groves as one approaches by water. It may be surprising, but is certainly matter for congratulation, that only two individuals have sought to imitate Catullus in the one respect in which he is imitable, by anyone with a sufficient purse, to wit, in the choice of a place of secluded repose; but it remains, that only these two—the one a retired minister of Anhalt, the other the mayor of Sirmione—have sought oblivion for such imperial cares as the government of Anhalt or Sirmione may involve, in the scene he chose. Yet it is pleasant to think that his example was not wholly lost, and that the excellent mayor, in particular, whose villa is planted on the verge of the cliff, within sight and hearing of the beach, can walk his half-mile of shady road after a stormy meeting of the municipal syndics, and lay himself, like Catullus, upon the beloved and familiar couch, and let the same lapping laughter of the same idle waves chase the perplexities of rates and factions from his (it is to be feared) less poetic head.

Mystery, however, surrounds the actual site of the abode which Catullus has made so unforgetable. The so-called "grottoes" to which his name has clung are the remains of a building far more colossal than any villa which can have housed his modest Lares. The monumental ruins extend for some 600 feet along the cliff, to which they seem to serve as huge bastions; steep grassy paths lead in and out of ruinous archways, up to the shadowy olive groves, and down to the gleaming beach; and everywhere thrills and trembles a pervading presence, the blue radiance of the Italian lake and the Italian sky. It is, after all, less Sirmio itself, with all its gracious charm, that exercises so unique a spell, than its marvellous situation, with the noble background of mountains looking down upon it over the vast endlessly changing spaces of the lake. This is one of the points in which modern sentiment is more alert than that of antiquity. Catullus loved the lapping of the waves, but he loses no word upon the mountains; and Virgil alludes to the lake only to compare its stormy tumult to that of the sea. But the moderns who have celebrated Sirmio—Tennyson, Carducci, Heyse, and many lesser names—give the mountains their due. Heyse built a villa for himself, not on the peninsula, but far away at the foot of Mount Lavino, facing it, on the Fasano shore. Carducci's splendid ode to "Sirmione" is really inspired by the glory of the whole Garda Lake, in which Sirmio is the most brilliant incident. A "barbaric" ode indeed, enshrining the unadorned classic simplicity of the Catullian verses in a jewelled framework of interpretative comment; comment only possible to a poet no less inspired, and barbaric only as Milton is barbaric after Sophocles, and Goethe after Euripides. "Radiant bowl, bordered with olive and laurel, which Italy the Mother offers, with lifted arms, to the gods, and they in return cast down the gem of peninsulas, Sirmio!" That is how Carducci saw the Garda Lake, as he stood on Sirmio. The mountains in the background become an indispensable portion of the scene, part of the character of Sirmio. Monte Baldo, the huge mass to the east, is the "fatherly mountain," defending the fair divine gift with stormy brow; and Gu, the snowy peak to west, "a Titan fallen in battle for her sake." And he recalls, too, the tragic and romantic histories of which the cities and castles round the lake have later been the scene: Ghibelline towns rased to the ground by Guelphic Brescia in what is to this day a deserted and silent inlet; Vittoria Accorambona (the heroine of Webster's play) besieged with her second husband, who had murdered her first and his own wife at her instigation, in the Castle of Barbarano; and many more. But no one, either, could render more exquisitely the intense joy of the homecoming, of the "port after stormy seas," which is the central inspiration of Catullus's poem. "Here the busy tumults of your life seem but a far-off murmur of bees, and in this cool silence its frenzies and fevered cares dissolve away in gentle oblivion." It is a simple, universal experience, the coming home and finding rest; yet the peculiar sentiment of that experience we are apt to claim as something specifically modern, or even Teutonic, nay, English. This Roman poet has expressed it with an intensity which carries his lines home to our hearts like hardly any others of similar purport in literature, and brings all the world to the spot where he found this enchanting peace; where not only the toils of Bithynian campaigns, but the perfidies of Lesbia, were forgotten.

We stand on the edge of the cliff, at a place as likely to be that spot as any other. Below, almond trees in full flower break the blue of the lake with their feathery profile. In front, for many yards out into the lake, spreads the smooth marble-like beach, turning the water, where it shelves under, to the intensest emerald. The ring of waves—the gentle waves of a large lake—on a beach of marble such as this, is a real "laughter," such as Catullus heard; a lapping, lulling laughter, from which Matthew Arnold himself could have elicited no mournful symbol of decaying faith, had he stood here, and not by the "melancholy, slow, withdrawing roar" of the shingled beach of Dover. And if Arnold's beach brought him the profounder thought, it was yet a thought of less permanent and universal significance than that simpler emotion that Catullus uttered in those "club-foot" verses of his, with their grave ritardando movement, a rhythm very fit for the utterance of weariness of motion, and the desire to be at rest.

C. H. Herford.

Present-Day Problems.

HOW THE COUNTRY DISTRICTS LIKE THE BUDGET.

By a Country Candidate.

In what follows I am speaking of a single strip of country twenty-eight miles long by fifteen broad. That is my world. It is mainly agricultural, though it contains one or two small industrial towns. It is at some distance from London.

Of this little world I can speak with confidence, for I have lived in it a considerable time. During the last month I have visited most parts of it; I have held twenty meetings, and engaged in innumerable conversations. I am one of the "spade-workers" whom the protagonists at Westminster admire so much—in the abstract. Night after night I have spoken in the open-air, and generally for something like an hour. In the country we like long speeches; we admire them for their duration quite as much as for their quality. With a local chairman and two or three friends, working men as a rule, I have stood on various platforms—now a waggon, now a bank, now the sloping pavement of a village street—and looked into intent and alert faces. The audiences are large. Everybody comes who can. In some parishes I have been told that practically every voter was present. The interest in public affairs is extraordinary. And for the moment it is all concentrated on the Budget. We talk of nothing else. If we speak of the fiscal issue—which with us has not yet lost its freshness—it is always in connection with the Budget. It is that which "holds the field." You need not be eloquent. You can plough through the taxes one after another, figures and all, and the people will listen still.

Thus far I have been speaking of the public interest in the subject, and that interest is felt by foes as well as friends. But what I want to say, for the confusion of doubters and compromisers, is that the Budget, once explained, is immensely popular. If in other districts than mine it is not so, that must be due, in my opinion, to the negligence or weakness of its supporters. Questionable details which, to judge by the papers, loom large in London, are not prominent here. The name of Lloyd George is the invariable signal for a cheer—and applause means something at a village meeting, for it is generally "safer" not to applaud at all. When I say that the Budget is popular, I do not mean that there is not some wavering on the part of well-to-do Liberals here and there. There will be secessions and "conversions." Nor do I mean, of course, that the rank and file of regular Conservatives are conscious of any weakening; on the contrary, the threatened pinch in the upper ranks will stimulate the campaign funds, and the new object of attack is already giving a new inspiration. What I mean is, first, that practically the whole of our local Liberal party has been fired with fresh enthusiasm; and, secondly, that we have got something to say which touches the imagination of the large intermediate class who cannot be claimed as adherents by either party. The bigness of the thing, the variety of its aspects, the novelty of some of its proposals, have brought a sense of reality, of stir, into our political discussions. We feel—for both sides are rubbing it into us—that something is being done, or going to be done, which will make a difference to us. And to the majority, I believe, the thing seems good.

The Conservative attack, of course, centres round tobacco, whisky, and beer. It starts with the initial advantage; for hitherto the only tangible outcome of the Budget is an extra ½d. an ounce on tobacco, and the threat—in most cases not more than the threat—of a ½d. a pint on beer. But this attack can be met. We point out what we are getting for our money—national defence and old age pensions. We show how small a proportion of the new taxes really falls on working people. We boldly claim that every class should bear some share, however small, of the new burdens, since all should know that both armaments and reforms cost money. Incidentally, we turn the flank of the attack by pointing the moral that the smoker (not the "foreigner") pays the tax. Every one of these points is simple enough to be readily understood. There is—at the least— a feeling that there is "something in them."

The raising of the price of beer is a formidable political weapon; but it is a dangerous one to the user. I do not know how it may be in London—the only place where the process has been carried out in any organised manner—but elsewhere I am inclined to think that it causes at least as much resentment against the liquor-seller as against the Government. There is no new tax on beer, and the attempt to shift manufacturers' and retailers' licence duties on to the consumer is a business that creates suspicion. When we see that the extra half-pennies, if maintained, will yield the liquor-seller several times the amount of the new licence duties, we begin to be disagreeably conscious of being "done." Further, there is a feeling that the rise of prices can only be maintained by bluff. A railway-worker told me yesterday that a friend of his, who buys a dozen bottles at a time, received with his last dozen a demand for an extra fourpence. He sent them back. They returned in half-an-hour with a message that, if it was only a matter of the price, threepence would do. He sent them back once more with the reply, "If they've come down a penny in half an hour, I'm quite ready to wait two hours and get the whole fourpence off."

I have put these taxes in the foreground, because when we have once disposed of this line of attack the rest is easy. We carry the war at once into the enemy's country. The initial advantage is theirs; the ultimate advantage is ours—overwhelmingly—if we use it. The income tax, the death duties, the motor taxes, the land taxes—simply and popularly explained—commend themselves immediately as just and reasonable. On these points at least our leaders need not fear. Hardly any defence is attempted by our opponents. The facts about the nation's wealth are too much for them. I encourage every possible kind of question, and thus gain some idea of what is in their minds. I have been asked whether the motor taxes do not "injure industry," and whether the land taxes do not "burden agriculture"—questions which give invaluable opportunities for further illustration. The argument of the rural landowner, that if he has to sell his estate the people on it must suffer, is a perfect treasure; it looks so specious on the surface, and yet it can be made to crumble so effectively before the eyes even of the simplest. It may be said that we are appealing to cupidity. My reply is that the desire to benefit one's fellow-workers at large is not cupidity, and that this desire is latent in all our people. There is cupidity too, but only so much as must inevitably be present where injustice is being removed, and where the sufferers themselves have some voice in removing it. We are in for a big struggle, certainly, between the privileged and the unprivileged. The former are strongly supported, in the rural districts, by the ingrained snobbery which admires wealth and display. We have need of every weapon that we can fairly use. The contrast between the patriotic outcry for "Dreadnoughts," and the shabbiness of refusing to pay for them, is one of these weapons.

The Budget is popular, then, once it is explained. But I must insist on the condition. Explanation, thorough and repeated, is absolutely essential. The Budget League has not been established a moment too soon. The electorate, left to itself and nourished on the Conservative Press, thinks that the licence duties and tobacco and spirit taxes are the chief part of the Budget. It thinks that the land taxes are new taxes on agricultural land; we Liberals are to blame, by the way, for not having expounded the principles of land taxation sufficiently. On these and many other points it must be enlightened or this great effort at redressing the unfairness of our taxation will undoubtedly fail.

But once we have explained the Budget we have no need to apologise for it. All my experience goes to show this. It is a great measure, and if it is to be commended at all, it must be commended as a great measure. The Prime Minister has given an admirable lead in this matter. Liberal members, in my opinion, have their heads too full of Committee details and London gossip when they come to meet their constituents. The Budget must not be defended; it must be preached. If we do not very much care for it ourselves, we shall never make it acceptable to others. But if we believe that the Liberal Party has to-day an opportunity such as has seldom been put into its hands before, and if we are prepared to commit ourselves heart and soul to a measure which gives tangible form to so many of our hopes, we can, in my judgment, communicate our enthusiasm to the electorate.

Communications.

A WORKING-CLASS VIEW OF LORD CURZON'S MANIFESTO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Suspicion of Oxford exists everywhere amongst workpeople, not only "here and there," as Lord Curzon assumes. It is true that in time it may be dispersed; but it will not give place to the simple trusting faith of the imaginary working-classes of the Memorandum, but to a fixed determination that the University shall some day really supply that "liberal and humane scheme of mental training which workpeople regard as indispensable." There are not wanting working-class leaders who fear Oxford, and regard any negotiations with it as, at least, dangerous, and who accordingly urge workpeople to turn to the "modern and provincial Universities," forgetting for the moment that the real defects of Oxford are common to all English, and, perhaps, Scottish, Universities also.

Such real defects are not those which Lord Curzon exposes so effectually; they follow rather upon the divorce of Oxford from much that is worthy and true in the national life—and mainly, the working man considers, upon its divorce from the real mental and spiritual influence of well-conducted labor, which is never antipathetic to high scholarship, even in the strict Oxford sense.

A University monopolised during many years by one class, unconsciously takes the point of view of that class—its scholarship is affected; its understanding of life is vitiated. A University which is not independent alike of poverty and riches, or of any other external distinctions between men, is incapable of performing its complete work. In so far as it co-operates with true and therefore eternal things, it is worthy, and not otherwise. Obviously, therefore, that Oxford which is so constructed and constituted as to need the addition of a "Poor Men's College" is "tied and bound" by some chain, whether "of its sins" or otherwise.

Workpeople do not desire this college; they would regard it as a flat misfortune if the "public spirited benefactor"—hoped for so pathetically by Lord Curzon—presented a million pounds for the purpose; although they would rejoice if some benefactor gave the same amount of money unconditionally to the University. It must be made quite clear that workpeople regard a conditional gift as degrading to the University which receives it, even though it be for the abolition of compulsory Greek. The £30,000 referred to in the Memorandum ought to be refused at once for fear it may come to hand when such essential reform takes place, unless indeed the University uses the money for the promotion of Greek studies. It may be urged that counsels of perfection such as this are absurd, but Universities are not second-rate institutions sustained by barren metal. They live by the spirit of the people.

It is clear from the report of the Joint Committee on Working-class Education, that workpeople desire to use the existing colleges. They have an indefeasible right to them, provided that they can do the high work which ought to be demanded, and they will never rest until they are assured that the best men, irrespective of wealth, birth, or athletics, are working in them. They owe a debt to Lord Curzon for his recognition of the validity of this claim. It is surely true that out of the vast number of working men who leave school at twelve, thirteen, or fourteen, there are many who, having kept true to an intellectual ideal whilst working in the factory or in the social organisation, have drawn to themselves high gifts which would enrich Universities with added mental and spiritual power.

There should always be interchange between the world and the University; laboring men or commercial agents should go for a period to the College, and University teachers should be enabled to go for a period into social, industrial, or commercial life. Commerce should not be permitted for ever to smile at the pretensions of the Oxford graduate, and turn elsewhere for assistance.

It is not a workman's province to concern himself with the burdensome details of University organisation; indeed they are unintelligible to him; he has not shared in the deliberations and practices of the several bodies. On the other hand it is plain to him that the Master's degree no longer represents the essentials which justified its governing prerogative; and now that the University subserves, or should subserve, national ends, he would fain see the Government vested in a large body of representative graduates, elected after they had served the community for several years in their several capacities as teachers, religious and secular, lawyers, doctors, merchants, craftsmen, and what not. In other words, each activity in the outer world corresponding to the schools or courses of studies in the University should have representatives upon the main governing body. That is a clear issue. It would be efficient and safe. All committees of the University would be appointed by such body and would be subject to it; so would the Colleges also in aspects such as the financial, where experience has proved autonomy to be wasteful and injudicious.

The workman may sympathise with the difficulty of reducing scales of living, clearly set forth in the Memorandum; but no living power will convince him that Merton did not waste substance intended for scholars, if in 1906 it paid £13 10s. per undergraduate for College servants, as against £4 10s. paid by Worcester. Lord Curzon might, as his own figures suggest, assume the rôle of a twentieth-century Archbishop Peckham, and say to the Fellows of Merton: "Some there are among you who, desiring to live more delicately, make the modus of your expenditure notably to exceed that which your founder by rule appointed."

At present, workpeople who are keen about education will make the best of the Joint Committee's scheme, which is clearly defined, and secures the best teaching on the part of the tutor, and the co-operation of workpeople who, being anxious to get at the truth of things, are not in the least disposed to accept Oxford at Lord Curzon's valuation—and, indeed, the Oxford men, who know them, would not desire them to do so. There is much unification yet to be accomplished. The conditions of work in the Joint Committee's classes are onerous, and form a sufficient intellectual equipment for study in Oxford. The lack of this preliminary work handicapped Ruskin College, which, by the way, was not founded by Labor Organisations, but assisted by them. It is desirable that Labor should not desert Ruskin College, which subserves a useful end, provided that it remains independent of the University. There will be need for such a College to minister to the needs of a certain type of student, until the day comes when Oxford conforms to the ideal of a University. At the same time there is a strong movement in Labor, accelerated by recent events, towards the establishment of a purely Labor College. The wisdom or unwisdom of this, from an educational point of view, can only be pronounced upon when the scheme, constitution, and practice of the College are defined.

It is not likely that Oxford will alone have the privilege of responding to the working-class demand; for every University and University College in the country is developing in that direction, and Joint Committees are at work at Leeds and Manchester, and have met at Cambridge and London, whilst Birmingham, Sheffield, and other Universities are working upon lines which approximate thereto. The workpeople who sat on the Oxford Joint Committee will always remember the experience as one of fruitful work, and will look back to Oxford with real appreciation, as on that occasion at least the joint exponent of their views; and they rejoice in the results which, thanks to the Oxford Tutors, as well as to the determined students, have been already attained in eight towns.

There has always been affinity between the workman and the scholar, and real affection when engaged in a common task, but such affection increases rather than diminishes the desire for the drastic reform of Oxford. Lord Curzon's manifesto is welcome as a preliminary step in the right direction. He has revealed out-of-date and cumbrous machinery to the vision of the man in the street, who cannot fail to be convinced that reform from within can be at best influential, unless indeed Oxford sloughs the faults common to human nature in the quadrangle as in the market place. The instinct of self-preservation will operate strongly in bodies vaguely conscious of their fitness for the scrap heap. After much talking and showers of placets and non-placets, enough will be done to strengthen the case for reform by external agency. Representative workpeople are already included among its advocates. Lord Curzon has indubitably helped by the Memorandum to increase the number of their fellows, who will join them in making clear and insistent demand for a Royal Commission, which will be granted in default of any satisfactory alternative. Oxford will not lose, but gain, from the fact that the larger spirit of the last few years has prompted her to take men like David Shackleton, C. W. Bowerman, and J. M. Mactavish into her friendship and confidence. These men are not enemies with no other perception of her than that obtained through the mists of suspicion. "They possess a first-hand knowledge of the conditions of Oxford," and will work for her development in a spirit true alike to labor and scholarship.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT MANSBRIDGE.

July 3rd, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

CALVIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With all respect for the Dean of Ripon, who in years long ago, when he was in London, laid me under obligations which I can never forget, I really must venture to suggest that his defence of Calvin's conduct in the case of Servetus by comparison with Sir Thomas More's severity toward heretics has this weakness, that it is not in pari materia. Sir Thomas More believed firmly in the infallibility of the Catholic Church—not of the Pope. In his eyes, therefore, whatever the Catholic Church decreed was the decree of God. However much ecclesiastical severity might wound his kindly human heart, his conscience bound him to submit. But how different was the case with Calvin! He himself was a rebel against the Catholic Church—at least as the term was understood in his day. Now, if Calvin might depart from the teaching of the Catholic Church in one direction, what right could he possibly claim to decree that another man should not depart from the same teaching in another direction on pain of death?

Less learned people than the Dean of Ripon might, of course, say that Calvin stood in defence of the Bible, which he had substituted for the Catholic Church as the ultimate infallible authority. But the Dean surrenders that line of argument when he tells us truly that Calvin in his "Commentaries" was very free in his treatment of the Bible, and, indeed, was in advance of "The Speaker's Commentary." It comes to this, then: that it was not the Bible, but John Calvin's interpretation of it, which was the infallible authority substituted for the Catholic Church. I think this must make a great difference in our judgment of the Genevan dictator's conduct in the case of Servetus. With all that the Dean of Ripon says about Calvin's human nature in other respects I entirely agree. I only wish that, in mentioning the Reformer's fondness for "quoits and bowls," he had remembered his practical rebuke of Puritan superstition by playing on Sunday afternoons when the morning's devotions were ended. Calvin's kindliness toward the "tolerabiles ineptiæ" of the Anglican Church is also interesting. But the fact that he assumed so much freedom for himself in the interpretation of the Bible only adds to the condemnation of his acquiescence in the savagery of the Genevan bigots toward Servetus. The fact is, John Calvin was a much better statesman than Christian.—Yours, &c.,

J. ALLANSON PICTON.

Caerlyn, Penmaenmawr,
North Wales, July 4th, 1909.

THE VISIT OF THE TSAR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me as a Liberal who has travelled far and wide through Russia, who has numerous friends there, and who has been closely associated with the leaders of the reform movement in that country, to give some of the reasons which induce me to dissent from the views expressed in the very able article which you publish to-day?

In the first place, it counts for much with me that the Russian Liberals as a whole are strongly in favor of the maintenance of friendly relations between their Government, such as it is, and ours. They believe that association with a democratic Power will help them. They dread that the rupture of these relations will drive the Tsar into the arms of Germany whose influence would be reactionary. There is no doubt as to the attitude of Russian Liberals on this point. They feel strongly, and even passionately, on the subject, as I know from having discussed it with their various leaders. The only people who dissent from them are the extreme Reactionaries, who dread British influence, and the extreme Revolutionaries, who are content to be mere wreckers. The extreme Revolutionaries hate the Liberals and Constitutional Reformers almost as much as they hate the Reactionaries, and they have partisans in this country who are engineering an agitation against the Tsar's visit with a view to forcing the hands of the Russian Liberals. The Russian Liberals regard this agitation as inflicting a grave injury upon the cause of reform, and those of us who profess to be their friends would be accepting a grave responsibility by joining in it.

I think you will agree that this view deserves consideration, but, on the other hand, I am willing to agree with you that it cannot be final for us. "We must," as you say, "be the judges of our own conduct to the Tsar." I will, if I may, mention two considerations from this point of view.

(1) As a Liberal, as a believer in peace and arbitration, I welcome the development of friendly relations with the de facto Governments of all nations. Other nations must, and can only, work out their own redemption. I am not prepared to make war on the Tsar in order to set his people free, and "freedom" established by such outside intervention would not be worthy of the name. It would endure only so long as the benevolent despot from outside remained to enforce it. Who would be free themselves must strike the blow. Short of intervention a policy of nagging the Russian Government is not likely to accomplish anything more than the embitterment of international relations, and an impetus to the already sufficiently alarming competition in armaments.

(2) By attempting to exclude the Tsar we expose ourselves to embarrassing retaliation in kind. Where is the line to be drawn? We may say good-bye to any hope of a reduction, or even a halt, in armaments if foreign Powers begin to refuse to receive our King every time their ideas of right and wrong are shocked by the methods of our Government. The caricatures of the Queen in the Paris Boulevards during the period of the Concentration Camps in South Africa, did not help those of us in this country who were fighting the cause of the prisoners. It is conceivable that the liberty-loving foreigner, following your example, might consider it a desirable way of expressing his horror of the executions in Natal, of the Denshawi episode in Egypt, and of the deportations without trial in India, to raise an agitation against King Edward visiting Paris or taking the waters at a German Spa. But I do not think the Reformers in this country would be grateful.—Yours, &c.,

A. MacCallum Scott.

5, Pump Court, Temple, E.C.
July 3rd, 1909.

FAITH AND CONDUCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The discussion aroused by Mr. Sidney Low's article has been very interesting. I should like to add a few words to it. Surely the divorce between these two has been posible, because of the false idea of what religion is, from which mankind cannot yet shake itself free. There is still abroad among us the belief that certain forms are necessary to make the righteous man, and that these forms omitted, a man lapses from true righteousness. None of those who adhere to the accepted forms of "worship" and profession prevalent in their own time and their own land, can attain to the wide conception of James Thomson when he wrote his Ode for the opening of the Secularists' Hall at Leicester, and said:—

> "All men and women, of whatever creed.
> We welcome gladly if they love their kind;
> No other valid test of worth we find."

Rockefeller did not believe that was the one thing needful; he was able to be content and happy, although he was working the ruin of thousands, as he was so certain he was good and righteous, adhering to the early forms which he had been taught were necessary to salvation. And other Rockefellers, or other men, pursue the same path, not understanding that a righteous life must be a complete life, a whole life, as Goethe says, it is the Whole (Ganzen) we must aim at, not only the Good and the Beautiful. We must wean ourselves from the half-gods.

In vain have been said the immortal words:— "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and then rememberest that thy brother has aught against thee, leave thou thy gift before the altar and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." People will persist that the gift at the altar is the essential. Is it not because of the creed that creed is essential, and creed is righteousness, that a divorce is possible between religion and conduct?—Yours, &c.,

Elizabeth Cobb.

July 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Mr. Sidney Low names John D. Rockefeller, the Napoleon of finance. In the same number of The Nation was a review of a book entitled "Napoleon's Love Affairs," which the reviewer justly condemns as a story of sordid lust without a redeeming feature. Mr. Low agrees that the millionaire's private life is singularly pure and simple. No one would saddle religion with Napoleon, despite his playing at Mohammedanism and with the Pope. Rockefeller was at least a cleaner man than Napoleon. Have we not as good a right to put this down to his religion as Mr. Low has to deny it any effect at all. Is a wholesome private life a small matter? Who shall say whether Napoleon wrought worse evil by his wars than by his poisonous example. I seem to have heard of other American millionaires equally grasping for money but infamous for their immoral life. If Rockefeller's religion saves him from their excesses it does something. Let us by all means condemn his business principles, but where do they differ from the average dealings of any Stock Exchange except in the magnitude of their results? Is not Mr. Low unfortunate in his example? It appeals too much to the transitory and false modern spirit which values and judges all persons and things by their relation to money. Shakespeare said, "He who steals my purse steals trash." Mr. Low says, "He who steals my purse is the blackest traitor." It would be interesting to examine the men whom Rockefeller has ruined. We are a little suspicious of ruined men in these days of wailing landowners and landlords. I should think we should find the bitterest cry comes from those whom Rockefeller has beaten at their own game and who still "do Europe" with the wrecks of their fortunes. Anyhow we may claim that religion has kept John D. Rockefeller from setting a scale of luxury which has the worst effect on those who would emulate him, from making beauty a hireling of passion, and from maintaining an army of overfed sycophants corrupting the community. Furthermore the very letter of Mr. Low proves that he, in company with all thinking men, expects that religion should influence conduct. He could not write to maintain that a knowledge of astronomy did not influence conduct. Is it true to human nature that any large body of men could have this expectation without result? On what is it founded if not on the ascertained facts of history and experience, despite many deplorable exceptions, and many more examples like Rockefeller's, where the conduct only very partially and lamely accords with the religion.—Yours, &c.,

J. Henry Hocken.

Kingswood, Rowsley Avenue,
Hendon.
June 30th, 1909.

FEMINIST ARGUMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Since that much battered engine, "the physical force argument," has been once more dragged into action, I should like to join front with those who face its fire.

To say that because all men are potential fighters they alone should vote is absurd. There would be reason in such an argument if all the incapables were disenfranchised, but as any man, handicapped by old age or bodily infirmity, who is otherwise electorally qualified is deemed fit to vote, the "potential fighter" argument cannot be put forward as a plea for the non-enfranchisement of women.

If all men are potential fighters, then so are all women. That the power to fight is not confined to men alone we have ample proof in daily life, and in special emergency the power makes itself strongly felt. Thus at the taking of Dahomey the women fought side by side with the men, and by their fierceness immensely increased the difficulty of the trained troops opposed to them; they were no mean factors in the fight.

That the "fighting potential" of our men is low has been demonstrated by the recent difficulty experienced in filling the ranks of the Territorial Army—the Army of national defence. Moreover, I would venture to assert that in the event of a great national peril the women of England would not be backward in accepting a fair share of the national danger.

If it could be shown that women, in the event of war, have more to gain and less to lose than non-combatant men, there would be some reason in the argument; but of this there is no proof. Women as non-combatants are affected in much the same way as all other non-combatants, not through personal danger, but by loss of property and friends, and in a state of society where man is regarded as the bread-winner, the loss of male relatives must of necessity affect women more deeply than it does the men, whose livelihood is not thus imperilled. The paid fighters do not come into this count; they choose and take the risks of their profession. Moreover, they do not exercise a vote.

The progressive enfranchisement of men has never been based upon the physical force argument. The widening claim to representation is put forward under the idea that the well-being of the community is best secured by the voicing of all interests, so that the wants of the weak may not be entirely lost sight of nor obscured by the clamor of the strong.

We demand our enfranchisement as a step towards a healthier condition of national life, when every individual will be given the best possible chance of mental and physical development, and we urge that our political freedom is essential to the securing of these ends. In a well-organised social community "Might is not Right," for that would imply internecine war, a perpetual uprising against oppression. Right for us is to be found in the weighing and just settlement of claims—claims which can never be fairly considered as long as the voice of one half of the nation can make itself but imperfectly heard.—Yours, &c.,

EMILY TOMLINSON, M.B. Lond.,
C.S., Girton Coll., Camb.

June 29th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—To hear some people talk, one would really think that the right to vote for a candidate for Parliament was granted to people as a reward for some mental or physical quality possessed by them. We know that this is not the case. No man is asked before his name is placed on the register whether he has ever written a poem or composed a sonata or even shouldered a rifle. If such qualifications are not necessary in the case of men, why should they be in the case of women? Women demand votes because they pay taxes and are therefore citizens. If a woman may not vote for a war, why should she pay for it?—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPHINE EVANS WILLIAMS.

Szabadka, Hungary,
July 1st, 1909.

---

THE OFFICIAL VALUATION OF IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article on the Budget Land Scheme, you say: "Ireland being already officially valued, returns are not required, &c." This statement, true in the letter, is not true in fact, for the existing official valuation would be of no use as a guide to real value for the purposes of the Budget. Ireland was valued officially by a department of the British Treasury between 1852 and 1866, but valued on a principle unknown in any Assessment Acts or proceedings in England or elsewhere. The inventor of the system, Sir R. Griffith, told a Select Committee that he "introduced a system of valuation based on the composition of the subjacent rocks."

The valuers, working under his instructions, were paid from 2s. 6d. to 5s. a day. I don't suggest that because of the small remuneration they were not competent persons, but their qualifications were thus described in an official circular: "Candidates for appointments as valuers of land, buildings, and other descriptions of property will be required to be examined by and obtain certificates of the Civil Service Commissioners in reading, writing, and arithmetic—the arithmetic to include the first four rules, and reduction, proportion, and practice."

Prices of certain kinds of produce, but not of all, were specified in the Valuation Act, but no prices for cost of labor and such outgoings. Sir George Cornewall Lewis said of this contemplated valuation: "I am unable to understand the principle laid down—the Committee will see to what absurd consequences the principle would lead." So it did. The Select Committee recommended that the valuation on this principle should be discontinued, and the recommendation had as little effect on the British Government as that of innumerable other Royal Commissions and Select Committees. Local knowledge is essential for the estimation of local values, but this valuation made fifty years ago by strangers to the localities, paid at the rate of 2s. 6d. to 5s. a day, whose qualifications were a knowledge of elementary arithmetic and being able to read and write, has remained in force to this day. What would be the conditions of rating and taxation in England if the assessment remained unchanged for fifty years?

In Ireland the population is half what it was sixty years ago; its distribution and circumstances have entirely changed; whole villages have disappeared; towns have decayed, a few have increased; railways and other means of communication have entirely altered the relative values of land, but the valuation of 1852 has remained unchanged, except as regards new buildings. Even in 1885 the glaring inequalities of the official assessment were such that the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes (of which the present King was a member) reported: "The system of valuation in Ireland is peculiar. The result is that the valuations have become very uneven. Thus, the poorest districts are said to be overtaxed, while the wealthier districts are undertaxed, and the local authorities who have the expenditure of the rates have nothing to do with the matter. Your Majesty's Commissioners recommend that a periodic and equal system of valuation be substituted."

This inequality of assessment between districts prevails also between adjoining occupations of both land and houses, and is a grievous burden on the poorer occupants and owners. Land in the suburbs of towns which has a selling value of from £500 to £1,000 an acre is rated on £1 and less; mansions and substantial villas are valued at very much less in proportion to their selling or structural value than cabins and slums which would have no value if the Public Health Acts were enforced. There is no official value of sites apart from buildings, and though agricultural land and buildings are separately valued, it is on a different system from the English.

In England the Agricultural Rates Act orders direct that the separate values of land and buildings must not exceed the gross value of the undivided hereditament, and that the area under buildings must be deducted from the gross area, so that it shall not be valued twice over—once as land, and again as buildings. In Ireland the value of buildings, in the case of farms or villas, or any buildings with ground attached, is estimated separately, but as an addition to the value of the gross area, and so the built-on area is valued twice over. But there is no separate estimate of area or value of sites. In these differing circumstances of assessment in Ireland and England, it will probably be that the provisions as to land taxes in the Finance Bill may prove quite inapplicable to Ireland. England has legislated, and omitted to legislate as to assessment in Ireland, with total disregard to both public opinion and the recommendations of Royal Commissions and Select Committees; and the official valuation to which you refer is quite useless for public purposes under the Finance Act and to private owners and occupiers.—Yours, &c.,

MURROUGH O'BRIEN.

Mount Eagle,
Killiney, Co. Dublin,

---

CHARLES DICKENS AND LEIGH HUNT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have just been reading Mr. Aaron Watson's letter on "Charles Dickens and Leigh Hunt," which appeared in your issue of the 5th ult.

There is one curious point in regard to it, to which I should like to draw attention.

In referring to Dickens's remark about a "little notice" of Leigh Hunt in "Household Words," he asks, "What was this little notice?" and goes on to say it was an article in that number of "Household Words," which is dated June 16th, 1855, the title being "By Rail to Parnassus."

For some time this article has been generally accepted as being by Dickens, but my recent researches in the Contributors' Book of that paper has revealed the author to be Henry Morley. With the knowledge of this fact, it may be assumed that Dickens was speaking merely editorially in the letter from which Mr. Aaron Watson quotes.

It may be that this bibliographical fact may be worth recording.—Yours, &c.,

B. W. MATZ.

July 3rd, 1909.

---

ONE WAY OF PAYING BUDGET DUTIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My wine merchant writes to offer me a dearer whisky than formerly supplied on account of the Budget. I propose to reply that I am quite ready to pay my quota of taxation for Navy and Old Age Pensions, but that, in order to ensure that my payments should reach the proper quarter, I propose to forward any extra charge made in my whisky bill direct to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This cannot injure my wine merchant if his extra charge corresponds with the extra duty.

Why should not everyone surcharged by the middleman adopt the same course? For every ½d. charged on a pint of beer consumed let the consumer produce a ½d. stamp, to be thereupon cancelled. By this means the Inland Revenue benefits, and no other illegitimate charger. If ½d. is too much, let ¼d. stamps be offered at the post-office for applicants.—Yours, &c.,

S. L. H.

June 29th, 1909.

THE DESTRUCTION OF DIALECT.

To the Editor of THE NATION

Sir,—As a Border Scot I am much interested in the letters now appearing in The Nation on the preservation of dialect. It seems to me that we are sometimes in danger of forgetting what a valuable aid dialect frequently is in the realm of comparative philology. As I write these words, I recall that amiable and eccentric genius, John Stuart Blackie, who always used to maintain that "comparative philology" was nonsense. With philology itself he had no quarrel, but when we begin to compare languages we deal with the science of words and not the love of words, and hence he insisted that the correct term was comparative logology. For this region of research we find in dialects the purest—that is, the least mixed—material on which to form our judgments. Let me illustrate this from the dialect of my own county, Roxburghshire, in some parts of which the purest Scotch is said to be spoken. Suppose you are in the train from Edinburgh to Carlisle, on the Waverley route, some summer morning, you will probably find at the village of Newcastleton an influx of Liddesdale farmers. Entering into conversation, you open with the time-honored remark about the hard, soft, or drouthy weather, and something like this may follow: "Where'll gaun the day, John?" "A's gaun to Carlisle." "'Ee'll be gaun to the market, neh?" "A's warn." Each of these sentences contains a typical example of the Scottish Border dialect, but they are by no means peculiar to Scotland, because comparative logology (à la Blackie) proves that they occur in other languages, and therefore that they must have had a common source. Two of these examples consist of the uncommon use of the particles "the" and "Neh" (ne). A Border Scot never says "to-day"; it is always "the day." The same form is seen in the use of "the now." "When will you be ready?" "A'll be ready the now" (that is, presently, immediately). "Are you ready yet?" "Aw'm ready now." This example illustrates the shade of difference between "now" and "the now." The latter is simply the analogue of the Greek τὸ νυν of which it is indeed a literal translation. The particle "neh" in the Latin enclitic "ne," which is used in certain interrogatives. The presence or absence of the final "neh" in a Border Scots question indicates a subtle distinction, just as do the various Latin interrogative particles. The verb formations are also instructive. "A's gaun" is identical with the negro's "I'se gwine back to Dixie," and it seems that the two forms must have had a common origin. According to Murray, the Scottish form is traceable to the influence of the Danes; whence did the negro borrow his?

The last example, "A's warn," is the most interesting of all, as it gives the clue to the derivation of the popular American phrase, "I swan." I frequently ask my American friends if they can give the derivation of "I swan," and never yet have I heard even an attempt to do so. Fifty years ago "I swan" was in regular use by poets and novelists, and to-day it is employed in current American speech, though a certain class of Americans seem to find it necessary to apologise for the use of what they think is slang. It is nothing of the kind. The Liddesdale farmers "A's warn" ("warn" being pronounced with a roll or burr in which the "r" is often almost entirely elided) is a contracted form of "I warrant you," "I'se warrant," "A's warn." The American phrase carries the process still further, the "r" being dropped altogether, and for reasons of euphony the "s" is joined on to the second word, thus becoming "I swan." Thus the Border Scots' "A's warn" is identical with the American "I swan," both as to meaning and formation.

The Scottish Border dialect is peculiarly rich in words borrowed from foreign sources. "You're a fashious child to be feared of fremd folk." Fashious (tiresome) is pure French (facheux), and fremd is pure German. Lunching with a Scottish lady the other day, she advised the use of a certain condiment, as it imparted a "gout" to the food in question. This sounds strange to me. In Border Scots it is common, or used to be, to hear of a "nasty gout," but very rare to hear the word "gout" alone in a connection that indicated a pleasant flavor. In this case the original meaning of the word has been perverted. This same lady propounded the conundrum: "Why is a dish of unripe strawberries like a pair of goloshes?—Because they are pu'ed ower shoon!" Lest this may be unintelligible to the average English reader, let me translate it. The strawberries were pulled too soon, and the goloshes are pulled over shoes. It has only one flaw. In many parts of Scotland "soon" is pronounced "sune" and not "shoon." But I am getting "wandered," and must close before your forbearance is exhausted.—Yours, &c.,

T. Maben.

Kenmure, Herne Hill, S.E.
July 3rd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read with interest your recent article on the preservation of dialect, as well as the corroborative and appreciative letters elicited from Mr. David Wilson and others.

Without any intention of raising a controversy or of disparaging the enthusiasm of your author and correspondents, may I be permitted to put before them the question of local dialect and phraseology from an unbiassed and purely logical standpoint?

The distinctive dialects in the Anglo-Saxon tongue—words, phrases, and accents alike—peculiar to certain districts, are the result of local isolation and familiarity of the few, and their gradual disappearance is due entirely to modern facilities for travel and intercourse, to improved education, and, by no means least, to modern literature.

Dialect cannot be fostered artificially, for it is a thing of nature and habit, and, above all, a thing of spontaneity, ever changing, ever disappearing, yet ever, to a certain extent, existing.

Burns wrote his finest works in the vernacular of his class, and was, being a genius, inspiring and convincing. And why? Because he was natural and spontaneous. Tennyson, great poet and genius, undoubtedly fell from his sublime level in the few dialect poems he wrote. And why? Because in them he was neither natural nor spontaneous.

The cultivation of dialect or its preservation by societies or other means are practical impossibilities, and we live in a regrettably practical age.

To attempt it has but one end—"pose."

Preserve your dialects, if you will, in literature, and give them hallowed shrines on your book-shelves, as one hangs the long-bow and arquebuse on the wall; but do not suffer them to enter the field of modern colloquialism. It were as well to enter the modern field of battle trusting to the aforesaid medieval weapons.

The allegory of the Tower of Babel proves by its antiquity that it has long been considered advisable that nations should speak a diversity of tongues, and a universal language would be to the great detriment of national individuality, character, and thought. Ab uno disce omnes.

The natural and first aim of speech is to give intelligibility to thought, and the more intelligible the speech the nearer the approach to the ideal.

Let us, therefore, not attempt to confound our speech with obsolete words and phrases, but strive to attain to an equality, a purity, and a beauty of word and diction that will transform our unruly members into organs of elegance and example.

Then, should a universal language at some time become a necessity to the economy of the world and the fittest tongue survive, we, as a nation, might fulfil the prophecy of the sixteenth century poet, Daniel, who wrote:—

"And who, in time, knows whither we may vent
The treasure of our tongue? To what strange shores
This gain of our best glory shall be sent T'enrich unknowing nations with our stores?
What worlds yet in the unformed Occident
May come defin'd with th' accents that are ours?"

—Yours, &c.,
Kirn, Argyllshire, N.B.

D. H. Kemp.

June 30th, 1909.

MR. HUDSON'S BUTTERFLIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—There is a passage on butterflies in Mr. Hudson's new book that is of a good deal of importance in view of a recent controversy. Mr. Hudson says that, one Easter, while he was at service in Kingsclere Church:—

"The sun began to shine very brightly and . . . the brilliance and warmth served to bring a butterfly out of hiding; then another; then a third; red admirals all; they were seen through all the prayers, and psalms, and hymns, and lessons, and the sermon preached by the white-haired rector, fluttering against the translucent glass, wanting to be out in their splendor and renew their life, after so long a period of suspension."

In other words, several red admirals had been hibernating in the church. Mr. F. W. Frohawk raised the question in the "Field" a few weeks ago, whether the red admiral hibernated in England at all. Many of us feel sure that Mr. Frohawk's doubt on the question is unwarranted, though not much positive evidence of the red admiral's hibernation has yet been forthcoming. I suppose Mr. Hudson has no doubt that his note on this subject is correct.
—Yours, &c.,

G. G. Desmond.

4, Pump-court, Temple, E.C.
July 7th, 1909.

Poetry.

DEATH.

The shadowy ways are deep
That girt the narrow path
Wherein man's feet are set,
Wherein alone is light,
The little light he hath
To lead him to the sleep
When he shall all forget,
Or all things see aright.

From out the shadowy ways
Forever comes the noise
Of Death's wings beating slow
Man hears, and asks in vain
If Death at length destroys,
Or leads to golden days,
Or shall he ever know
Who husbandeth the grain.

The shadowy ways hold fast
The thing his heart would hold,
Foreknowledge of his fate.
The little light is weak
The secret to unfold;
He cries, until at last
The shadows shall abate
Their mute disdain, and speak.

John Drinkwater.

Reviews.

"FRANK BURNET."*

In Miss Horace Smith's book events frequently are not successive. A misfortune, for example, happens to a certain person in Chapter XX. Time goes on in the usual way, but in Chapter XXIX. the same misfortune, because it has an important effect on people then at breakfast, meets us again, just as if we had not met with it before. This is not accidental, but a result of the author's method, which could not now be explained fully. The consequence of it is some difficulty to the reader; but he must not attempt any short and easy method with "Frank Burnet" as if it were a common novel. It is a work of singular genius, and it will be more useful if, instead of indulging in criticisms, I put together in the ordinary consecutive fashion a brief abstract of it, not suppressing a side remark now and then when I cannot help it.

"Frank Burnet" is the story, in the main, of three people—Frank Burnet, son of a clergyman, Phillis, a young heiress, Wattie, a blacksmith's boy—and of the way in which these three become intimately related to one another. We are introduced to Frank as a little child, deficient in courage; that is to say, the courage to do the right thing at once. He can do what is right if you give him time. He did not get on at Winchester, and was reported as showing "want of earnestness and application." He took no pains with his Greek. This was particularly disappointing to his father. The boy thought he had a gift for painting, and wished to be an artist rather than a clergyman—the profession for which he was designed. One afternoon he and Phillis, who was a distant relative, went for a walk to Marchington Church. Two ladders had been left by some workmen against the church tower, one half-way up, the other to the top. Phillis went to the top and called to Frank to follow her, but he "loathed heights." "Why don't you say straight out," was the reply, "that you are afraid of them?" "I am not afraid. I have been up that old tower before now." Phillis pins him at once "On the roof?" "Yes." He implores her to come down.

"It isn't safe."
"You've done it."
". . . No."
"You said you had."
"I—I meant this part—the roof I never went up there."
"You said you had."
She looked unutterable scorn. Frank clambered down. He waited for her at the bottom, wretched, miserable.

After leaving school Frank does not visit Marchington Manor or see Phillis till he is twenty-one, when he had adopted art as his profession. He goes there a second time after receiving an affectionate invitation from her, and meets a number of trivial, worldly people. At the former visit Frank and Phillis went to look at the graves of his father and mother, and were surprised during the walk by an outbreak of passionate love; but we hear nothing more of it at present. The conversation at the Manor, unless Phillis took part in it, wearied and disgusted Frank. "You could not say that it was false; it was neither false nor true, not to be weighed in any scales, but a feather-weight balance. It was rubbish—an odd, surface kind of talk." He hated it because it was, in fact, lying, and yet—listen. At a cub hunt all the party, excepting Frank, had jumped a formidable hedge. When he thought everybody out of sight, he led his horse through a gate. At breakfast the conversation turns on the jump. "They fell on him all at once. How had he jumped? Why didn't he speak? . . . Why should he speak? he wanted to know."

"My good people, if I had jumped the moon would it be absolutely essential to let the whole world hear of it? . . ."
"We are not talking about the moon, Frank," Phillis had swiftly said (how words burn into your brain!). "We are talking about that hedge."
"Well, there's nothing so special about that hedge. I dare say it's not the first time I have jumped it."
"Oh, then you did jump it," Phillis had said. "I almost began to think"——

Then suddenly, in an outburst of wrath, she calls him "coward and liar"! He had a higher standard of life, and even of truth, than Phillis's guests, and yet he was a liar, and he knew it. "I hate cowards and liars." She said it "with angry, flaming cheeks and hard tears in her eyes." He did not at once leave the Manor, nor even the room.

* "Frank Burnet." By Dorothy V. Horace Smith. Murray, 6s.

We must reluctantly admit that Frank did lie. Lying is generally considered a damning vice, which is, by itself, completely destructive of character, and yet the present writer must confess that, although nobody could say Phillis was wrong, he would have set Frank above all the other people at Marchington Manor, including Phillis, and that he was even loveable because of his veracity. The reader will, I think, agree with me before he gets to the end. An acute friend of mine has observed to me: "Do you notice that Frank always speaks the truth? He can never deceive himself nor anybody else."

Frank went back to town, "and the very next day he began his design for the pulpit which Phillis had asked him to do."

Wattie is an orphan blacksmith's boy, and works at the forge. He is a lover of horses. A former squire had put in Marchington Church a window with a representation in colored glass of two favorite hunters. At first they were considered a scandal, but in time people were reconciled to them. The window was smashed in a thunderstorm: the church was wrecked, and the vicar and his wife were killed. The boy Wattie crept down to the churchyard, although forbidden, and discovered the window on the ground—a few of the large pieces, that is to say, but mostly dust. He picked over the fragments and laid them on his coat. He carried his coat to some stone flags, kept clean by the arching roof, and set out the contents.

> It was a picture puzzle; he emptied his coat and came for more. Absorbing occupation, proceeding now how slowly, a fragment here and a fragment there; and then, again, with some larger piece springing out at a touch from under his hand! He lost all knowledge of time. The moments slipped away, the hours struck unheeded; they were striking now; he heard that—four. The boys would be out of school. There was the school-bell ringing; there followed a far-off hum. The listless afternoon awoke; a light cart rattled down the street; Wattie stretched himself . . . some of the children were coming this way; those were other children's voices. They came, a short cut under the wall, under the hedge, little companies of them, twos and three, in at the lychgate, up the path. This was something new to see, the parish church in ruins.
>
> Playmates of Wattie's. "Hullo, Wat!"

In this scene we have Wattie outlined in half a dozen strokes only, like a woodcut by Rethel, the last line, the "Playmates," serving as an effective contrast.

As Wattie grew up he was conscious of strange visitations. The things which he saw in common life began to group themselves occasionally into significant situations. . . . He felt "sudden seizures when horses and men sprang into life, and stood out for a moment (which seemed an age) in bold relief against the colorless and shapeless background of what generally went on." In a sudden surprise objects were translated, transformed, and became a unity. The boy had scraped together some drawing materials; the dustman had given him a sketch-book fished out of the dust-cart.

About three years pass after Frank's second visit to Marchington before he sees Phillis again. Wattie is now nearing manhood, and his genius has unfolded itself—at least, to Phillis's eye. She encourages him, and he forms a plan which he discloses to her of decorating the inside of the church tower wall, with a drawing of two horses which were in a picture he had lent her. The youth cannot help loving Phillis, and very beautiful is his love for her. She is so far above him, it never will, never can, be spoken, and he can suppress it without pain. What was Frank doing through those three years? We only know that he had become a professional artist, and that he had again confessed his passion for Phillis. My readers will be dumb. Three years only after she had declared him to be a "coward and liar"! I am sorry I must ask them to wait a little, but I will say now that Miss Horace Smith is unexpected, and that because she is unexpected it does not follow that she is untrue. It is extraordinary and unexpected that Frank could love Phillis, but it is perhaps still more extraordinary and unexpected that Phillis could love Frank. He was not then accepted, but that her love was profound and unchangeable is evident in every line of her reply to him. When Frank received her letter he rushed up to the Manor, but she had started for Scotland. The two lovers met again, however, in Italy, and there became formally engaged.

"Frank Burnet" is revolutionary in its refusal of ordinary standards and denial of common judgments, for Frank's failings as we go on become even more marked. The play of emotion also necessarily becomes more and more complicated and interesting. The conflict of attraction and repulsion is managed by Miss Horace Smith with wonderful skill.

The time for sending pictures to the Academy is at hand. Frank's friend, Raikes, in London asks him what he is going to do. Frank, lazy and loth to leave Phillis, names three pictures in his studio, and commissions Raikes to send them with his own. Raikes replies that he has selected three others much better. One of them is a drawing of two horses, which Frank does not remember. He ought, of course, to have stopped Raikes at once, but he does not. He goes back at last to London, to find the horses included in Raikes's private view, and he receives the congratulations of everybody present on his masterly design. He is certain he was never able to do such work, but, nevertheless, he tries to persuade himself that perhaps at some time or other he may have been clever enough for it, and have totally forgotten it. The attempt at self-delusion was quite unsuccessful, and at last he comes to the conclusion that he had bought the picture from some artist who was dead. It was Wattie's, the one he had lent Phillis. Frank had taken it away, but had laid it aside unpacked in his rooms. It is accepted in the Academy, catalogued as his; on the strength of it he becomes famous; and yet there is no disavowal. A protest after the day on which he first saw it in Raikes's room would have been absurd. Wattie, Frank, and Phillis meet accidentally at the Academy, and Wattie, recognising his own performance, tells Phillis the truth about it. She does not remember she has ever seen it before. Neither Wattie nor Phillis make Frank acquainted with the discovery.

Marchington Church is closed, and is to be restored. Wattie, unknown to anybody, except Phillis and two little children who have gone away, has been painting the two horses on the inside of the church tower wall, but it is generally believed that the wall is bare, and that Frank, who does not deny it, is going to decorate it with a drawing of horses resembling that which has been attributed to him. Phillis, enraged with her love for him (we are not expressly told it is she, but there can be no mistake about it), determines to invite a party including Frank, to see where the drawing is to be placed. She must have intended his humiliation, but she could not have defined it clearly to herself. The company meet in the porch, and find Wattie there. They are just about to enter the church when it is discovered that a storm, blocking up water-pipes, has ruined the inside of the tower, torn down the plaster, and not a trace of Wattie's work is discernible. Phillis is defeated! Happy Phillis! Frank stands in the aisle and begins to speak.

> "I want you all to attend. . . . You know that study at the show? It wasn't mine. I mean the horses. . . . I wish to be plain. . . . I tell you I did not paint those horses. They were a fraud." Everybody was confounded, but Frank went on.
>
> "The choice of that particular study for exhibition was a mistake. It was the mistake of a friend, but it was a mistake which I might have rectified any time during the last two months. . . . I cannot be sure, but I think it is more than probable that the artist who painted those horses has forgotten them long ago; he may be forgotten himself—may be dead, for all I know. They were found in an old portfolio."
>
> "Whose?" said Major.
>
> "Mine."
>
> "My dear chap, you painted them. Now are you satisfied? You painted them, and you forgot them, and you remembered them—I mean, you didn't, but somebody else did—and they were hung on the walls of the Academy, and the unprecedented success has turned your head, as I told you before."
>
> "That is just how I have been trying to reason," said Mr. Frank, "but it doesn't fit in with the facts."

"Then the facts are out, that's all I can say."

"No, the facts are facts, and they are all known except the artist's name, which, I fear, we shall never discover. If ever I learn it, you shall be told. Meanwhile, I have communicated all particulars to the Academy authorities, and I am glad to say they seem thoroughly to appreciate the situation, which you, I think, don't."

"Don't understand it at all," said Mr. Fred.

"I confess I don't understand," observed Miss Daisy.

"I understand," said Miss Phillis. At last she had risen. Risen? Yes, and came out of her place and walked straight to Mr. Frank's side . . she took Mr. Frank's hand; . . . bent her head and kissed it. . . . Mr. Frank never once looked at Miss Phillis and only kept hold of her hand.

Frank and Phillis were married, and Frank became Vicar of Marchington. I wish to repeat that Miss Horace Smith in "Frank Burnet" is thoroughly revolutionary, for, although indifferent to external, revolutionary incident, she pierces to reality. The motto of her book might well be the verse on the tombstone in Marchington Churchyard which marks the place where Frank's father and mother lie:—

"Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of."

We do not, neither our own nor the manner of others. The revolution begins when we come to know.

W. Hale White.

THE MAKING OF A NATION.*

Lord Milner's South African policy is dead; but it speaks in the last volume of the "Times" history of the war, not as an example to men, so much as a memory and a warning to them. Mr. Amery's object, in the thin and embittered advocacy of the political chapters of that book, is not easy of accomplishment. It is to exhibit Lord Milner, not merely as the promoter of war, but as the organiser of peace, the author of the policy of South African "reconstruction." Unfortunately for his argument, both fact and human nature are against him—how much against him Mr. Amery does not know enough either of human nature or of South African history to realise. Lord Milner had left South Africa before the movement either of race reconciliation or of the union which was the fruit of that reconciliation had begun. Both his policy and his temper were fatal to any such development. Before it could take place, a vital change in both these conditions had to be made. The entire machinery of bureaucratic officialism which he built up had to be overthrown. The Inter-colonial Council, the scheme of plantation, the attack on the Dutch language, the attempt to efface every vestige of self-governing authority in three colonies, were all to go. Milner's passion for centralisation and his zeal against the Dutch had to give way to Lord Selborne's tact, placable nature, and natural sympathies for the country folk. And, above all, the sense of racial unity had to find its natural expression through self-government. When all these transformations had taken place, then and then only was South Africa ripe for consolidation. The act was her act, conceived and matured by her statesmen. Neither the High Commissioner, helpful and sympathetic as he was, nor any Imperial officer, was present at the Conference which decided for union. The British Government, mindful of the error of 1877, was a wisely passive spectator. On the other hand the natural leaders of the people came forward. Steyn emerged from his watchful and, so long as the shadow of Milnerism remained in South Africa, his hostile retirement, and appeared as a warm advocate of unity. Botha, the Afrikander Bond, the Cape House of Assembly, moved together, and with them Farrar, Jameson and the other spokesmen of the Progressive party. A moral, no less than a political, change was essential to their success. It was necessary to eliminate the two forces hostile to union, British Jingoism and Dutch Afrikanderism—in other words, Krugerism and Milnerism. These spirits exorcised, the universal discontent of 1904 and 1905 easily and naturally gave place to the harmony of 1907 and 1908. A people growing into unity, "reached out its hands," as Mr. Fremantle well says, for the national institutions it wanted, and the "South African question" ceased to exist as a pre-occupation of British statesmen

Mr. Amery has, indeed, a different theory from that of Mr. Fremantle and of most fair and competent observers of the South African situation, a theory which will excite more amusement than anger in white South Africa. He cannot deny that the grant of responsible Government hastened the advent of union. He cannot deny, though he suppresses the fact, that Lord Milner was a bitter opponent of the Constitution of 1906, and prophesied every conceivable ill from it. He is compelled to record the fact that Milner endeavored to force the suspension of the Cape Constitution, in order, as Mr. Fremantle says, "to carry through federation without allowing the people to express any opinion about it through their representatives." But he insists that the real inspiration to the movement for unity came through the officials whom Lord Milner left to South Africa as a legacy and witness of his rule. The chief of these comforters was a Mr. Curtis, who, if we remember rightly, is chiefly known in South Africa as a member of the "Balliol Kindergarten," and the author of some amateur exercises in municipal government. From a memorandum of Mr. Curtis, it appears, flowed the first impulse to South African unity. South Africa, we fear, contains an ungrateful people, for the memorandum fell on somewhat listless ears, and neither Mr. Curtis nor any other member of Lord Milner's school for statesmen appears in a representative capacity at any stage of the movement towards unification. Not one ever sat for a South African constituency. The "policy of reconstruction" may have been of deep consequence to the country, and here and there doubtless it was of some material value, but its authors are mysteriously lost in the "illimitable veld." Some of the chief makers of the South African Constitution were Lord Milner's personal opponents. All were citizens of South Africa, who had made it their home long before the war. It is possible to argue that that event worked, in the end, for unification. But it is not open to any candid critic to deny that the disappearance of Lord Milner, of his agents, his institutions, and even his attitude of mind, was its indispensable preliminary.

It is this fact which, we suspect, accounts for the extreme bitterness of the polemic which Mr. Amery quaintly styles a "history" of the South African War and settlement. The Boers he can pardon, and even, in a lofty manner, appreciate. But he cannot forgive the Liberal Party and Liberal ideas for succeeding where Lord Milner failed. In his concern to show what South Africa suffered by Lord Milner's withdrawal, he is, indeed, somewhat embarrassed by the march of events. On page 199, he tells us, mournfully, that after the expatriation of the Chinese the "British population began to dribble away from South Africa in a continually increasing stream." But, on page 206, the "British population has stopped dribbling away from the Transvaal." Equally intractable are the political facts. On one page we are informed that the "military surrender of Vereeniging" had been converted by the elections to the new responsible Government into "a great political victory for the Boers," and that in "all the legislatures the champions of militant Afrikanderdom ruled supreme." On another he admits that the reconciliation of the Boers, the vital condition of unification under the British flag, had "come earlier and more spontaneously in response to the confidence shown" in them by the Liberal Party. It might seem to the average intellect that this was to concede the whole case for Liberal policy in South Africa. But Mr. Amery is bound to insist that no good can come out of the organised hypocrisy of Liberalism. The South African elections were fruits of a "reaction," which ought to have ruined South Africa. Unfortunately for Mr. Amery it led straight to union. The exasperating fact was that in neither political development had Mr. Amery's hero any share.

Pity these sorrows of a pamphleteer whose "history" will not bend to his purpose. If self-government did not ruin South Africa, then the repatriation of the Chinese coolies ought to have achieved that end. Here, indeed, the habitual falsity of a Liberal Government attained the pitch of working both for and against the cessation of Chinese labor. A "decisive struggle," he informs us on page 180, had taken place on that question between the Government and their supporters, which had ended in the victory of the party, and a resolve to cancel the ordinance. But (page 183) they retained the "hope" that some form of responsible Government in the Transvaal would enable them to continue it. Mr. Amery does not explain how a superseded ordinance could have been revived, or why the Liberals should have revived it, in face of the unanimous opinion of their party, the prevailing hostility of South Africa and the self-governing Colonies, the scandals of the Buckley report, which Mr. Amery crudely mis-describes, the disorganisation of the system, and its complete economic failure. Finally, the "acute depression" on the Rand did not, as Mr. Amery states, follow the repatriation of the Chinese: it preceded that event, and passed away as the capital error was gradually cancelled.

*"The 'Times' History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1902." Vol. VI. Edited by L. S. Amery. Sampson, Low & Marston. 21s. net.

"The New Nation." By H. E. S. Fremantle, M.A. John Ouseley, Limited. 5s. net.

We have said little of Mr. Fremantle's excellent work on the framing and the effect of the South African Constitution, but we have woven its main thesis into our criticism of Mr. Amery's book. Mr. Fremantle's political opinions are probably as strong as Mr. Amery's, but he can state them with candor, without a touch of bitterness or of meanness, and with a knowledge of the capital events of South African constitutional history and their bearing on the story of the last seven years which puts Mr. Amery's evasive partisanship to shame. There are few pages in the political part of the "Times" history which can be perused with pleasure or confidence in its pretentious generalisations by any one but an uncritical admirer of Lord Milner. On the other hand, Mr. Fremantle's intelligent summary of the last phase of South African history can be read with profit and without a touch of offence by all who took part in it on one side or the other. It is the expression of those persistent ideas of South African polity which, among recent governors, Sir Hercules Robinson best understood, and Sir George Grey and Lord Kimberley might have succeeded in bringing to their appointed end. Mr. Fremantle shows how every earlier attempt to secure a united South African Government failed because this country tried to impose it from without instead of watching it grow from within. After the bloody interruption of the war those ideas re-emerged, the clearer because of the dark background of strife and division against which they were thrown. The man who perceived them best and gave them their most fruitful expression was Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, to whose memory—"never to be forgotten by South Africans"—Mr. Fremantle dedicates his book. Campbell-Bannerman had neither Lord Milner's energy of mind nor his hardness of heart. He had only common sense and sympathy.

MEXICO.*

Major Hume begins his introduction characteristically with a quotation from one of the letters of Cortes, in which the conqueror dwells on the similarity of Mexico and Spain.

That similarity has subsisted down to the present day. In none of the republics of Spanish America, with the possible exception of the State of Antioquia, in Colombia, have so many Spanish customs remained. The great old houses, with their saguanes and azoteas; the huge tracts of territory, held both in Mexico and in Southern Spain by the descendants of the conquerors; the wealth of churches and convents; the aristocratic society with democratic manners; the great plains, with their intersecting mountain ranges, complete the outward similarity.

The many archaic words in the Spanish of country Mexicans, the trains of mules with tinkling bells, the deep-cut saddle of the horsemen, with its high horn and cantle, a modification of the "silla à jerezana," as was the latter of the saddle of the Moors; the riding dress, with its short jacket and trousers open down the sides, which is but the survival of the costume of the "charros" of the plains and hills of Salamanca, are identical. Thus the first sentence of the introduction strikes a fitting keynote to the book.

The book itself shows a marked step in advance from the author's book about Peru. This work is soberer, more analytical, less prejudiced, shows much less flag-wagging, and seems to point to the fact that the writer is not so sure the world was built after designs he himself furnished, as did his book about Peru.

It is better written, too, and has far fewer purple patches, and throughout shows knowledge of the subject and a desire to do full justice to the Mexicans. This attitude grows daily rarer in members of our "imperial" race, and marks the author for a man with an open mind.

A pretty humour now and then peeps out, as when he quotes the perhaps unconscious hypocrisy contained in the message of Cortes to Montezuma: "I have come to redress abuses and punish oppressors, and to establish the true faith." One seems to listen to some speech of one of our pro-consuls, when about to wipe out some tribe of "niggers" who have dared to cavil at our gin. The historical portion of the book is interesting, correct, succinct, and very clear, and takes one from the landing of Cortes, till the great Teocalli falls, and Guatemoc is taken on the lake. Cortes himself is treated fairly, and justice done to his great powers, both as a statesman and a general, and, above all, the writer treats the part the church had in the conquest fairly and sympathetically. The chaplain of the expedition, Father Olmedo, he styles, quite justly, "wise and pious," and might have stated that his strong common sense, on several occasions, restrained the proselytising fury shown by Cortes. The description of the retreat across the causeways ("La Noche Triste") is graphic in the extreme, and although taken, I suppose, partly from Bernol Diaz and partly from the letters of Cortes, is so well done as to seem like an original piece of work. The chapter on the country under the Viceroys is full of interest, and contains matter little known to ordinary readers, at least in England. It is evidence of how far true criticism has advanced in regard to Spain since Prescott's time, when we recall passages as liberal as this: "But it would not be just to proclaim that life under Spain's rule was hard or oppressive, or marked by continued ferocity and bloodshed. . . . Nor can the abuses of the natives be cast at Spain's door altogether." The contrary was held as an irrefutable axiom by almost all the other writers on Spain and Spanish rule.

One wonders if the writer has well weighed his words before he wrote the passage, "The colonists of Mexico, like those of Peru, or, indeed, of any of the countries of the New World, themselves were the greatest oppressors of the natives. . . ."

Had he but written, "both of the Old Word and the New," he would have hit upon a universal truth. One wonders what sort of Peralvido justice would be meted out to the mere niggers, either in India or Africa, unless in Paris and in London there still were men who can take larger views upon such things than the mere colonist, whose hand is naturally against all those not of his race, and especially against the natives, who occasionally do him material damage in his interests.

It is very well brought out, that the first efforts for Mexican independence were directed by churchmen, two of whom paid for their efforts with their lives. In treating of the Viceroys, either of Mexico or of Peru, the author might have quoted their famous phrase, when they received a foolish order from old Spain. Far too polite to treat it lightly, they used to write, after due compliments, "Order received, I obey, but don't comply with it," a formula that it would seem is often acted on, though not professed, by governors in other empires than that of Spain. The pages treating about modern Mexico, reserve still more surprises for the man who has read the author's book about Peru. We of the Anglo-Saxon race know so well when to suppress the truth, without exactly lying, that the following is almost startling in its brutal truthfulness. Speaking of Texas, the writer says: "Whatever may have been the faults displayed . . . the fact remains to the honor of Mexico that she forbade slavery, which showed her civilisation certainly not inferior to her Anglo-Saxon neighbors." If writers go on at this rate, speaking the truth after the fashion that it strikes them, good-bye, a long good-bye, to the old "bletherings" about the cruelty of Spain. No one denies, or seeks to palliate, the horrors of the conquests, either of Mexico or of Peru, or the annihilation of the Indians in Hispaniola; but still, nations who have exterminated a whole race of men, as we did in Tasmania, or who, only a generation past, burned men and women in a cave, as did the French, or treated people as the Belgians have the Congo tribes, or blown up men and women in the Matoppo caves with dynamite, have little right to talk of what the Spanish did three hundred years ago. Very interesting is the chapter on the Mexican people, and on the whole extremely fair. An attempt is made to hold the scales as between English and Spanish-speaking races in America, and with considerable success.

* "Mexico." By C. Reginald Enoch, F.R.G.S. With an introduction by Martin Hume. Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.

We are told about the native kindliness of Mexicans, their hospitality, their love of pomp, their class exclusiveness, their kindly, democratic manners, their love of using quite unnecessary long words, which latter habit most likely soon will disappear, as it has disappeared in Spain, where it survived till lately, a relic of the eighteenth century's bad taste.

Now, as regards Spain at least, Homeric laughter greets the speaker who indulges in fine words, and so, no doubt, will be the case in Mexico when education in the true sense extends. The same applies to the phenomenon seen throughout Mexico and South America of railways made in districts without roads, in palaces of stucco, electric lighting in a town with unpaved streets, and generally all the outside of European civilisation, and nothing of its, perhaps hypothetical, interior grace. The virtues and the vices of the Mexican are set down, without extenuation, as the writer sees them, and he concludes in a most sympathetic passage: "Here is the material of a vigorous and prolific race, which may be destined to bulk largely—like the whole of Spanish America—in the future régime of the civilisation of the white man."

How that same civilisation may eventually pan out no one can tell, but it is evidence of progress to see so eminently an Anglo-Saxon writer as is the author of the book, confess that anything can possibly be good outside the limits of his race.

Chapters on social life, on progress, with the due columns of figures of exports and of imports, are excellent and interesting to those who care about such things. There is the usual praise, although a little guarded in this case, of Don Porfirio Diaz, also a chapter upon bull-fighting, describing it, as if no one had ever heard of it before, and rightly censuring its cruelty. In this connection it is a pity the author did not, in a note, put in a word about tame stag-baiting, or pheasant-shooting, or the delightful spectacle of a fox torn to pieces by the hounds, whilst women look on with delight, and have their children's faces smeared with the fox's blood.

Perhaps this was a little too much to expect; but still I live in hopes that some day a writer will appear who sees, not only the bull-fighting beam in the Castilian's eye, but the mote in the Anglo-Saxon cornea of what is known as "sport." For those who care about it, there is a chapter upon horsemanship, accurate and interesting, and quite devoid of prejudice, and for a wonder, all the nonsense usually talked about the jaw-breaking (sic) bit and the huge spurs is contradicted, and, marvellous to tell, nothing is said about fox-hunting, and we are not informed that, after all, a fine fox-hunter is the best horseman upon earth. The writer sees each style is best for what it aims at, and sensibly leaves well alone.

Taken as a whole, the book is interesting, well written, and contains a mine of information, as well as a good map, and clearly shows the enormous progress on the material side, that Mexico has made in the last twenty years.

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

---

THE FREE CATHOLIC CHURCH.*

The "Free Catholic Church," of Mr. Lloyd-Thomas, which was so widely and appreciatively noticed in the Press on its first appearance, has now been done into Italian by Sig. Fantoni Sellon, with an introduction by an anonymous Roman ecclesiastic, dealing with the actual state of Italian Catholicism.

The Modernist movement, with its suggestion of a possible separation of the dead and living elements of existing Catholicism, has roused a considerable amount of interest among the more thoughtful and learned leaders of Nonconformity in this country, of whom Mr. Lloyd-Thomas is one. A deeper knowledge of the origin and development of the Christian religion, combined with a philosophy based on a comparative study of religion in general, has made it difficult to rest contentedly in any sort of exclusive sectarianism or in anything short of a religion that is one and catholic, just because truth is one and catholic, and not the monopoly of an elect few. The attempt, however confused and abortive, to actuate such an ideal on the part of those who profess and call themselves Catholic, must evoke a certain sympathy from minds so prepared, especially from one so entirely hopeful and constructive as that of Mr. Lloyd-Thomas. Like every prophet, he may be disposed to foreshorten the weary time that lies between to-day and the expected Parusia, to overlook the ranges of hills and valleys that separate him from the distant peak of his aspiration. But who shall say that the failures of past strivings for a Catholic unity point to an inexorable law of failure? Have not new intuitions, discoveries, events, personalities repeatedly belied laws hitherto deemed inexorable? Were not man's efforts to understand and control the conditions of his bodily life once as hopelessly chaotic, discordant, and barren as his present efforts to control his spiritual life? But, with the conception of science, of law and order, a new epoch dawned. Science, so far as it is scientific, is one, catholic and perpetual. Astrology and alchemy were as discordant and manifold as man's dreamings. Purged of the subjective or dream-element, they gave place to a catholic astronomy and chemistry. The authority of big names yielded to that of the freely formed and freely criticised collective mind, and the unity long sought was found at last.

Is it not then possible that in the measure in which religion comes to be recognised as an universal attribute of human nature, growing with the growth of man's mind, from its grotesque embryonic state up to its rational and orderly maturity, and in the measure that its phenomena are classified and co-ordinated and its uniformities recognised, it, too, may enter upon a new epoch and realise its confused dreams of unity, catholicity, and progressive perpetuity? There is more hope of this than of the unity to be reached by cancelling all the work of religious thought and effort and returning to the barren simplicity of an undifferentiated religiosity—by ceasing to believe in our differences. Still less feasible is a violent syncretism of forms that exist in virtue of their incompatibility and definitely exclusive character—a mere logical unity of species under one genus. The subtlety of its subject-matter, the consecrated force of habit and tradition, the prejudices of nationality, the vested interests of individuals and corporations, these and a thousand other causes offer an obstruction to religious unification that science had not to encounter in anything like the same degree. But it is only a difference of degree—a demand for more time.

In the introduction, an anonymous Roman ecclesiastic shows us the last despairing effort of that short-cut method which would realise unity and catholicity by means of a quasi-military dictatorship—by the subjection of the world to the private will and judgment of a single individual, presented as the counterpart of God's will and judgment. As long as faith could accept this pretension and support an obedience as absolute as the authority claimed by the Pope, the system produced a mechanical uniformity within the limits of the resulting sect that was as like the ancient Catholicism as a stone idol is to the living God.

The introduction shows us this system in collapse for lack of an obedience proportionate to its claims. It is the pathetic story of the struggles of Pius X. to reverse the course of the sun, to defy the tide of science and democracy. Honestly convinced that his cause is the cause of God, he fights for it as saints and martyrs fight, scorning the weapons of carnal wisdom, and undaunted by the steady failure of project after project. Left to himself, he would quickly bring the truth to light by a reductio ad absurdum. But his utterly unworthy entourage is crafty enough to thwart so unworldly a policy where its own interests are threatened. Yet the days of Ultramontanism are numbered. It remains to be seen whether the underlying Catholicism of the Roman communion be dead or only dying, and, if the latter, whether it be strong enough to recover its primitive freedom, and to recognise as its supreme authority the freely formed and freely criticised mind of the whole body of the Church—lay and cleric.

* "Una Libera Chiesa Catholica." Opera di J. M. Lloyd-Thomas, tradotta dal Cab. Prof G. A. S. Fantoni Sellon. Firenze: Bemporad & Figlio.

G. Tyrrell.

SIDE LIGHTS ON ROMAN HISTORY.*

Under this rather vague title Signor Ferrero has collected a number of lectures delivered recently in Paris and various American cities. The author is favorably known by his work entitled "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," a book the merits of which have been fully recognised in the columns of this journal. But we must say regretfully that we fear the present volume will not, at least among serious scholars, add to the respect felt for the gifted author. The effort to make the life of the ancient world known to those who cannot study the original sources is entirely praiseworthy, and English scholars have done a great deal in the last few years to diffuse such a knowledge. But they have shown that interest may be excited without the sensational art which deals in thumping emphasis, in advertising, as original discoveries, ideas which have been long the possession of the learned, in unqualified and paradoxical assertion as to characters and periods where the scrupulous scholar, knowing the paucity or suspicious character of his authorities, speaks with a delicate reserve. It is all very well to interest people in the story of the past, but, in doing so, inference or hypothesis, however brilliant, should not be proclaimed as certain fact, and sign-painting should not take the place of portraiture.

We should be sorry to say that Signor Ferrero has been guilty of these faults in their vulgarest form. A scholar of his rank cannot so far forget the dignity and duty of scholarship. But in these lectures he has sometimes, no doubt from a praiseworthy desire to show how the shadow of Roman destiny projects itself even over the twentieth century, got perilously near to the edge. Is it necessary for a man of his mark to advertise again and again his great work as a new revelation on the meaning of Roman history, yet one apparently so Delphic in its utterances that the leaders of French parties have, as he tells us, each found in it historical support for their conflicting theories of the State? Again and again we are told that the author at the fated moment has found the key to some enigmatic problem, that he has at last discovered the law among the maze of phenomena. We do not deny—indeed, we have in former reviews emphatically asserted—that Signor Ferrero has often put the facts of Roman history in a most fresh and suggestive way. But a scholar does not advance his reputation by proclaiming his own originality and wishing to stand alone. The greatest scholars have always respected the solidarity of their class and the services of their contemporaries and their predecessors. In his chapter on Roman corruption the author seems to be unaware that the idea or law on which he prides himself as an original discovery has been expounded with ample illustration by writers in recent years both here and abroad. To speak of Mommsen and Duruy as laid upon the shelf and never read, is both contrary to fact and to good taste. The name of Mommsen is already securely enshrined beside those of Scaliger and Casaubon and Bentley.

Signor Ferrero rightly claims that there is a certain unity of idea running through at least three of these lectures. He wishes to show in concrete form, and to invest with personal interest, that great conflict between old Roman conservatism and the Greek and Oriental spirit, which appeared at least as early as the Second Punic War. It is a subject which has been treated by masterly hands, and not least ably by Mommsen. Signor Ferrero has given the subject a fresh interest, even if he does not add to our knowledge, and although some of his conclusions may seem rather precarious. The best chapter seems to us to be that on Tiberius and Julia, in which the two movements are seen incarnate in the gloomy Emperor and his emancipated wife, in which some puzzles are ingeniously resolved, and both Tiberius and Julia are in the end shown to have been doomed to infamy by the fierce collision of the great forces that were rending Roman society. The chapter on Antony and Cleopatra summarises the view of their relations given in the author's third volume. The idea that their relation was far more politic than sentimental, that the Egyptian Queen wished to steady her throne by a powerful alliance, while the triumvir hoped, by placing Egypt under a Roman protectorate, to shift the political centre to the East, and prepare for the conquest of Persia, is certainly probable hypothesis, and does credit to its author's ingenuity. The chapter on Nero gives on the whole a sound view of his character and reckless impulses. But the interpretation of Agrippina as the champion of old Roman ideals of morality, and frugal, sober government is certainly not supported by our authorities. And the close of the lecture is characterised by a sensational extravagance which lowers the dignity of history. To represent the hated Antichrist, by reason of his taste for spurious art, as unconsciously working for the triumph of the Medieval Church, and so a fellow-laborer with St. Paul, whom he may have burnt, is surely paradox run mad.

